GREAT AMERICAN DEBATES

PREFACE OF THE SERIES

[INCLUDING BIBLIOGRAPHY]

ONE of the most notable scenes in ancient history was the joint debate between Demosthenes and Æschines, "On the Crown." The point at issue was whether a civic crown should be granted to Demosthenes, the Athenian premier, for his policy toward Philip of Macedon, who was attempting to subvert the liberties of the peninsular Greeks. Æschines, the leader of the anti-administration party, opposed the grant, having deposited a large sum that he would prove his charge of corruption against Demosthenes. The result of the debate would be either that the whole national policy would be reversed, and the man responsible for it be deposed and disgraced, or that it would be vindicated and its impugner driven from the city a penniless exile. It was the latter event which occurred.

So great and so widespread was the interest in the debate that the open-air theater in which it was held was packed with thousands of people, including visitors from the farthest borders of the Greek world who had been drawn to the capital by the importance of the issue and the fame of the debaters. Under all these circumstances the two great statesmen, each a finished rhetorician and a master of all the arts of public controversy, as well as profoundly versed in constitutional law, made the supreme efforts of their long and brilliant careers. Each point in the speeches was thoroughly comprehended by the audience, and every oratorical period appreciated at its true æsthetic value, for the ancient Greeks had developed to the highest two kindred passions, that for controversy and that for rhetoric, both particularly in the domain of politics. Every man being an intense partisan, stormy gusts of cheers and derisive shouts swept again and again in conflicting waves over the vast assembly, while the unperturbed speakers paused for their subsidence. In its physical aspect this was the greatest debate in all history.

But only in this aspect, for, despite a prevalent impression (based on the impossibility of paralleling such a spectacle in the modern world) that debate is in decay, never was forensic contest more keen than now, and never did it have more interested or appreciative auditors, nor—and this is the point of superiority over the ancients—has it ever had by millions so many.

When a statesman rises to-day in the American Congress, or the British Parliament, or any national assembly in the world, to speak upon a great issue, if this is vital to his country the mind of every patriot within the land attends, and if the question is one of world politics the furthest corner of the earth is agog to catch his utterance.

The telegraph, and its record, the newspaper, are the instruments which give such a speaker an audience larger and more representative of every shade of belief and form of interest than all the hearers combined who hung on the words of the entire roll of ancient orators.

Occasionally outside of the national capital there will be a debate between statesmen on a vital question, and, for the time, the place where it occurs, however insignificant otherwise, will be the Mecca of the nation, toward which the eyes of the faithful are turned. Such a place was Freeport, Illinois, where Abraham Lincoln by clever finesse forced from Stephen A. Douglas the proposal of "unfriendly legislation" toward slavery in the Territories, and thereby caused the ultimate schism in the Democratic party, and the triumph of the Republican party under his own leadership. The "Freeport doctrine" this proposal was called, and the name will be forever recorded in American political history.

However, it is Washington at which, with few exceptions, the great debates in American history have occurred. To our mind the academic discussion of some general principle which may take place in any non-legislative forum, including that of the magazine and newspaper, is not properly a political debate. No debate is complete unless it is followed by some concrete political action, preferably a vote upon a measure embodying the principle discussed. With such decision in prospect the controversy acquires the aspect of a real bout, a duel if there are two contestants, a field contest if there are many, and if these are, as is usually the case, divided into two parties, with the individual members of each so united in principle and program as to supplement the efforts of one another.

The duel, however, is the typical form of debate. Indeed, a field contest, in its general aspect of "team play," is a duel of one group against another, and in detail is a number of duels between coupled antagonists.

Each contestant maneuvers to gain the superior position over his adversary, and, when this is attained, to drive home his advantage. Direction is given his efforts by the fixed end in view, which, in both parliamentary law and finesse, is the question to be voted upon. Therefore, debate is law in the making, and legislation is the essence of political history.

All great historians recognize this, and so from Thucydides down have studied legislative debates. To what degree they have done so is probably the most accurate test of the value of their work. Certainly it is so in the case of American historians, for the United States is in all political aspects a constitutional democracy, and every important political event must be related to some legislative act, passed almost invariably after discussion, or to some constitutional function, which was originally a legislative act passed after extended debate.

Debate is thus the crucible of law, which is the metal of history. This symbol of the fusing pot is particularly apt in the case of American debate, for almost all the results of Congressional discussion have been of the nature of compromises. Even when a minority has been overborne, its protest has, if not at once some time thereafter, become effective in toning down the original purpose of the majority. Thus the overwhelming and

Thomas H. Benton's abridgment of Congressional debates down to the close of the first half of the nineteenth century saved recourse to the official reports. Benton's book can hardly be called a compilation, since it follows the chronological order of the Annals of Congress and the Congressional Globe, from which its material was taken, and merely reduces these official records by excision and condensation. It is a digest rather than a selection.

Although the need of a new selection and abridgment of American debates grew cumulatively greater with every year that followed Benton's work, the labor of preparing one increased apace, deterring editors from the task, and none appeared before the present year (1913).

It is true that the list of books relating to American eloquence forms one of the largest bibliographies of works published in the United States; and in this list collections of political orations are notable for their number and extent. But these are disiecta membra of debates, and, while inciting the reader with desire to possess the complete body, do not in any degree satisfy the desire. Even when a debate is ostensibly presented in one of these compilations, it is invariably the rhetorical, rather than argumentative, passages which are extracted and set over against each other. This is notably the case with the "classic" debate between Senators Webster and Hayne.

Believing that the practical American mind prefers argument, the clash of mind against mind, to mere rhetoric, which in its most interesting phase, the revelation of personality, is as far below debate as contrast is below contest, and realizing the entire absence of any work to satisfy this desire, Dr. Edward J. Wheeler, the editor of Current Opinion, several years ago planned a compilation of the great debates in our country's history from colonial times to the present, which should contain in logical arrangement selected public discussions of the most important national events, and forensic controversies over leading political issues, as conducted by our ablest and most brilliant statesmen.

imperious Radical majority in Congress after the Civil War failed to impeach President Johnson, and could not fasten permanently upon the South the Federal control of elections.

If, then, the historian profits by the study of debate, why should not everyone interested in politics follow his example? Why should he, too, not enjoy the enthusiasm of discovering the original materials of history and forming his own conclusions thereon?

Heretofore there has been a conclusive reason why this pleasure and profit, this high culture of intellectual insight and judgment, have been denied him. It has been impossible, without devoting, like the historian, many years to research work, and an equal period to comparison and selection, to acquire a discriminating knowledge of the debates in Congress and of their relation to each other. The records of our national assembly are presented in about five hundred large tomes, each averaging a thousand pages of two thousand words, making an approximate total of one billion words. Beginning with the Annals of Congress, and continuing with the Congressional Globe and the Congressional Record, this record is in strict chronological order, routine business being mingled with debates in a fashion most provoking to the investigator. Furthermore, it takes an expert to follow a subject through its widely separated installments by means of the index. Even when he has acquired this facility, the reader must dig his way through a mass of worthless material to find the vein of golden thought for which he is seeking.

Undoubtedly the superior grounding of our early statesmen in their subjects of discussion was due simply to the fact that the literature of debate was still of moderate extent, so that they could compass all that had been said before them on any given question. "Elliott's Debates," especially after their inclusion of the Madison Papers, rounded up the debates of the Confederation and the Constitutional Convention, although in undigested form. The Annals of Congress contained digests rather than verbatim reports of the debates in Congress for the first quarter of a century, and Senator

Dr. Wheeler honored me by asking that I compile this important work. Accepting the pleasing but onerous task, I set to work quarrying material in the rough out of the rich and well-nigh inexhaustible mines of colonial historical records and the official proceedings of Congress. Going over hundreds of volumes each of about a thousand pages, almost literally leaf by leaf, in order that no debate of prime importance should slip by, I unearthed at least a thousand debates all of interest to-day to the student of politics and economics. From these, with Dr. Wheeler's assistance, and that of Albert Ellery Bergh, the editor of "The World's Great Classics" and other important compilations, whom Dr. Wheeler called into consultation, I selected the two hundred or more which appear in the present work. While a very profound delver into American political history may regret to find that some debate which he considers of importance has been omitted, nevertheless the editor insists that, taking every element of selection into consideration, the inclusion of any such debate would have forced a better one out of a work which is necessarily limited in its extent.

These are the standards by which the selection has been made. They are arranged in the order of precedence:

1. Importance of the historical event, the legislative act, or the political or economic issue which forms the subject of the debate.
2. Argumentative force of the speeches.
3. Rhetorical brilliance of the speeches.
4. Distinguished rank of the speakers among American statesmen, with a minor preference for men of original views and interesting personality.

In preparing these debates the editor has faithfully tried to follow Herbert Spencer's great principle of literary composition: "economy of the reader's attention," and to this end has endeavored to give only that information which is essential to a proper understanding of each issue, and to present this in the place most available to the reader, whether it be preceding, during the debate, or following it. The work is not intended as a political history (although it is calculated to form a valuable supplement to such a history) and therefore only that information is presented which will connect the debate in hand with others related to it, and which will save the reader recourse to other works in order to understand the political situation at the time of the debate, and the unexplained allusions of the debaters. In this way it is believed that the ends of readability and reference are both attained.

In further obedience to this law, he has abandoned the rule, common among editors of speeches, of indicating omissions by asterisks. Had he continued this practice, so numerous were the omissions, owing to the great exigency of condensation, that the reader might at times think he was contemplating an astronomical chart rather than surveying the galaxy of American forensic eloquence.

In similar consideration, no less for the author quoted than for the reader, the editor has interpolated as an intrinsic part of the speeches certain phrases bridging over the omitted portions. Then, too, except where a grammatical solecism was plainly intended by a speaker, or is indicative of his personality, such a slip has been corrected. In so doing the editor has followed the example of the best Congressional reporters, certainly a sufficient, if not imperative, precedent in the case of editing Congressional speeches. Sticklers for exact phraseology may readily find this in the Congressional records themselves, by using the dates of the present work as indicators. In this connection it may be claimed that, on the important questions for which these vast and voluminous records are consulted in nine cases out of ten, the present work forms a very simple and practical guide book.

Where the substance of a speech, in whole or in part, is given by the editor, this is distinguished typographically from speeches or parts of speeches reported as delivered. However, condensations of speeches, changed from direct to indirect discourse, which was the rule in early reporting before the days of verbatim presentation, are represented in the same type as speeches printed as delivered.

Owing to this form of indirect discourse, the early speeches are not as lively as the later, but the reader should remember that what is lost in brilliance is more than compensated for by concentration of thought. In this work, as in any selection of American forensic oratory, there is fine rhetoric in overflowing measure for those who desire it, but, as has already been stated, "Great Debates" is intended for readers who primarily want clear and forcible argument.

SOURCES OF MATERIAL

In gathering material resource was had to the many collected works of great American statesmen, such as John Adams, Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, Thomas Corwin, Joshua R. Giddings, William H. Seward, Abraham Lincoln, Charles Sumner, et al., all of which will be found in the public libraries by the student who desires to read in full the speeches represented in this work.

Many collections of speeches were resorted to, of which it will be well to mention a few of the early ones which have been drawn upon by all the editors of the later collections. The chief early compilations are: "Eloquence of the United States," edited by E. B. Williston: Middletown, Ct., 1827, and "American Eloquence," edited by Frank Moore, and published by D. Appleton & Company, New York, 1857.

One of the modern compilations deserves special mention for the admirable taste shown in its selection of representative speeches, its illuminating notes, and its well-written biographies of the orators. This is "American Orations," edited by Professors Alexander Johnston of Princeton and James Albert Woodburn of Indiana University, and published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. The first copyright was in 1896.

Professor Charles Kendall Adams, then of the University of Michigan, had compiled in similar manner "British Orations," published by the Putnams in 1884.

This has been largely drawn upon by the present editor in preparing the debates in Parliament on Colonial Rights.

The chief source of material for the debates in America during the Colonial and Revolutionary periods, the régime of the Confederation, and the administration of Washington, is "A Political and Civil History of the United States . . . to the close of the administration of President Washington," written by Timothy Pitkin, and published at New Haven, Ct., in 1828.

Mr. Pitkin was a representative in Congress, and took a leading part in its discussions. His biography will be found in the Index of Proper Names in Volume XIV. He shines as an editor no less than as an historian, since his work contains not only copious extracts from speeches, but also judicious selections of all the important protests and petitions of the Colonial legislatures, and the state papers of the Continental Congress, of the Congress under the Confederation, and those of the Washington Administration. The papers of the colonial legislatures and of the Continental Congress, being both argumentative in character and rhetorical in style, have been largely drawn upon in the present work, owing to the lack of preservation of the debates of this period.

For the period of the Revolution and the Confederation the "Journals of the Continental Congress 1774-1789," published by the Government Printing Office, 1906, have furnished considerable material.

Coming to the formation of the Constitution we find that "Debates on the Federal Constitution," by Jonathan Elliott (copyright 1836, and enlarged thereafter; now published by J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia), is the standard work on its subject, being referred to constantly by both Northern and Southern statesmen from the time of its publication until the Civil War, upon the great questions of State Rights and Slavery. Abraham Lincoln made an exhaustive study of this work in preparing his great speech at Cooper Union in February, 1861, on "Slavery as the Fathers Viewed It."

Elliott (born in England 1784; died in Washington, D. C., 1846) emigrated to America about 1802, became a printer, and then a soldier, fighting for South American liberty, 1810-1813, and serving in the American army in the War of 1812. In 1814 he settled in Washington, editing for thirteen years the "Washington Gazette." He published a number of statistical and documentary works relating to American politics, chief of which is his famous "Debates." He also edited the "Madison Papers" (1845), published by the Government. Of the five volumes of the Debates the first contains Ante-Revolutionary history, the documents relating to American independence, and the documents and speeches relating to the Confederation and the Constitution, including Judge Yates's Minutes of the Convention of 1787; the second, third, and beginning of the fourth, the debates in the State legislatures and conventions in the ratification of the Constitution; the rest of the fourth, the documents, speeches, and judicial decisions relating to Constitutional questions debated in Congress 1789-1836; and the fifth, Madison's report of debates in the Congress of the Confederation and in the Constitutional Convention of 1787.

Recently the gaps in "Elliott's Debates" have been filled by "The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787," edited by Max Farrand, Professor of History in Yale University, and published by the Yale University Press, New Haven, Ct., in 1911. It is an exhaustive monograph on the subject, including most interesting notes on the speakers in the Convention made by agents of the French government in America and preserved in that government's archives. These vivacious pen-sketches appear in Volume XIV of "Great Debates" in connection with the biographies of the statesmen referred to. They were translated for us by Mrs. Helen E. Meyer, who has admirably preserved the sparkling spirit of the original French.

The official and semi-official records of Congress from the adoption of the Constitution to the present time (1912) have furnished, with a few exceptions such as the Lincoln-Douglas joint debates, the material for all the volumes after the first. The Lincoln-Douglas debates have been abridged from the complete report in "The Life and Works of Abraham Lincoln" (1907), produced by the editor and publishers of the present work. This collection has also been used to supply introductory matter for various other speeches of Lincoln, and the debates in his administration.

The first records of Congress were "The Debates and Proceedings in the Congress of the United States, Compiled from Authentic Materials," edited and published in Washington by two Congressional reporters, Gales and Seaton. The first two volumes appeared in 1834, and the five remaining volumes in 1849-51. These records, known by the briefer title of Annals of Congress, have supplied the materials in the present work of all the Congressional debates down to 1824, with the exception of certain speeches, such as Daniel Webster's, where recourse has been had to fuller reports in published works.

Most of the speeches were reported in the Annals in condensed form, where indirect discourse was generally adopted, though the speeches of the more distinguished and rhetorical statesmen were presented as delivered, if not in full, at least by extracts of the important passages. The selection of these passages and the abstracting of the other speeches are remarkably well done, Joseph Gales, Sr., in particular having a keen eye for salient points of argument.

The Annals is thoroughly indexed by subjects, and has an appendix containing the important state papers and public documents and all laws of a public nature. Gales and Seaton were aided in their work by the suggestion and advice of a number of statesmen, notably Madison, whose experience covered the history of Congress from the beginning.

Francis Blair, Sr. (see biography in Volume XIV), and John Cook Rives, a departmental clerk at Washington, founded the Congressional Globe in the early part of Jackson's administration. Rives soon became sole proprietor, and continued so until 1864, when he retired with a fortune, of which he gave liberally to the wives of enlisted soldiers, and for the equipment of regiments. There was less editing done by Blair and Rives than to print" their speeches, in order that they might "frank" these to their constituents. Another practice which arose at this period was that of speakers "incorporating" in their remarks speeches of persons, chiefly candidates for office, who were not members of Congress, articles from magazines, and even entire books. One notable instance of the latter was the division of "Protection and Free Trade," written by Henry George, into six parts, and the incorporation of each by a Representative in his remarks on the McKinley Bill, the whole book thus becoming a public document, more than a million copies of which were franked by the so-called Free Trade Democrats all over the country, with the intention, and it is claimed, with the effect, of promoting the election of an anti-protection Congress.

The Record has thus become a great storehouse of valuable material of every sort of subject: political, social and economic. The present work makes available a select portion of its mass of heterogeneous information and argument, but this is necessarily in slight ratio to the whole. It would be a laudable act if Congress ordered a digest of the whole work arranged according to subjects. Failing this, the Government should certainly publish a logical index of all its published proceedings, with indications of what phase of each subject is treated on each page, that such an issue as the Tariff, for instance, could be intelligently followed by the student, with a great saving of his time and his temper.

WORKS OF REFERENCE

In view of the vast number of admirable treatises on American politics it seems invidious to single out any as specially helpful to readers of the present work who desire to pursue their researches beyond its pages. But the fact that a few works have been of special assistance to the editor should justify their mention.

The book which chiefly guided the author in the selection of debates before the Civil War is the "Constitutional and Political History of the United States" by Gales and Seaton, the reports becoming more and more verbatim, until finally they were wholly so. The Globe continued until late in its life the practice of the Annals in recording the important public laws of Congress.

In 1857 Ex-Senator Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, published an "Abridgment of the Debates of Congress from 1789 to 1856": D. Appleton and Company, New York.

Senator Benton derived the material for the first part of his work from the Annals of Congress, and for the latter part from the Congressional Globe.

These "Abridgments" are notable specimens of editing, as might be expected of a statesman of such profound ability and long service, as well as of the experienced author of "The Thirty Years' View." Nevertheless he slighted certain discussions which, owing to circumstances, have become of greater interest to readers of the present day than they were to those of his own era, and for these the present editor has reverted to the original sources. It should be remarked in this connection that many American historians have evidently been misled by following Benton. Thus Alexander Johnston, in his "American Political History," gives James Madison and Thomas Jefferson the credit for first presenting, in the Kentucky and Virginia Resolutions and the controversy concerning them, leading constitutional arguments against the Alien and Sedition Laws, which arguments, says Johnston, had been overlooked by the Anti-Federalist statesmen in Congress. Now the Annals of Congress show that Albert Gallatin and Edward Livingston had presented these very arguments most ably and completely. Benton, however, did not preserve them in his "Abridgement."

The Congressional Record succeeded the Globe on March 4th, 1873. As in the later issues of the Globe, the laws of Congress were omitted from its appendixes, since these now appeared by themselves in another form of public documents. Nevertheless the appendixes in time became larger than before, owing to the increasing practice of speakers, especially in the House, asking "leave by Dr. Hermann von Holst, published by Callaghan and Company, Chicago, in 1889.

This is a work typical of German scholarship, containing views whose prevailing soundness is the almost mechanical result of a vast reading of original documents. Unfortunately the learned author's mind works along a line of thought the methodical principle of which it is difficult for the average American reader to perceive. Conclusions are often stated in advance of the information upon which they are based, so that the reader does not fully understand one point until he is in the throes of puzzlement over a new one. But, although the work is thus rendered difficult to read, it will repay study, so just are the author's judgments on both the political issues and the character of statesmen.

As has been mentioned, Senator Benton published a work entitled "Thirty Years' View": D. Appleton and Company, New York, 1854. This is a history of Congress from 1820 to 1850, during which period the author was a Senator from Missouri. He thus speaks of his qualifications:

I was in the Senate the whole time of which I write—an active business member, attending and attentive—in the confidence of half the administrations, and a close observer of the others—had an inside view of transactions of which the public only saw the outside, and of many of which the two sides were very different—saw the secret springs and hidden machinery by which men and parties were to be moved, and measures promoted or thwarted—saw patriotism and ambition at their respective labors, and was generally able to discriminate between them. So far, I have one qualification; but Mr. Macaulay says that Lord Lytton had the same, and made but a poor history, because unable to use his material. So it may be with me; but, in addition to my senatorial means of knowledge, I have access to the unpublished papers of General Jackson, and find among them some that he intended for publication, and which will be used according to his intention.

This work has been used by the present editor not only for historical reference, but also as a source of material, since it contains copious extracts from important debates, chiefly on Slavery and Finance. He has, however, reduced somewhat the part which Senator Benton represented himself as performing in these controversies—the story is characteristic, if not well authenticated, that the Senator once condescendingly remarked of President Jackson that “Old Hickory” had been of “considerable assistance” to him (“Old Bullion”) in the war against the United States Bank.

For the political history of the Civil War and the causes leading up to it, “The American Conflict,” by Horace Greeley (published by O. D. Case and Company, Hartford, Ct., in 1865) is, though biased in favor of the North, a work which cannot be overlooked by any author, editor, or student dealing with the subject. It has furnished the present editor not only with information for use in introductions, but also with the text of several controversial speeches delivered outside of Congress.

Of the many books containing digests of the speeches at the outbreak of the Civil War, the “History, Civil, Political, and Military, of the Southern Rebellion,” by Orville J. Victor (published by J. D. Torrey, New York, in 1861) should be here mentioned, as it was largely used by the present editor in preparing the debates on the proposals of Conciliation made in Congress in 1860-61.

In similar fashion the “History of the Thirty-ninth Congress,” by William H. Barnes (Harper and Brothers, New York, 1868) was of great assistance in the preparation of the debates on Reconstruction, etc., in the period immediately following the Civil War.

The chief guide to the debates of the entire Reconstruction period was “Twenty Years of Congress,” by James G. Blaine (Henry Bell Publishing Company, Norwich, Ct., 1884). On the issues subsequent to Reconstruction the book was unfortunately of little assistance, for the last twelve years of the period discussed were summarily disposed of in less than one-fourth of the work, the author having apparently constructed the beginning on the basis of at least a four-volume book, only to decide later to close it in two volumes. Thus the

This historical treatise sets forth the documentary evidence as to Pelatiah Webster’s “invention” of the plan of Federal Government, afterwards adopted in the main in the Constitution, and also discusses the adoption of the Constitution, and the constitutional issues in subsequent American political history. The documents appear in the appendix, and are very thoroughly annotated, the Constitution of the United States and its Amendments having citations appended of legal decisions concerning the same.

SCHEME OF THE SERIES

A logical order has been adopted for the presentation of the debates, which adheres so far as possible to the chronological order. Fortunately in presenting the early debates the logical and chronological orders exactly coincide, the subjects of Colonial Rights, Independence and Formation of the Constitution coming in causative succession, uninterrupted by any other issues. Volume I thus forms, as it were, an introduction to all the rest of the work. Having this character, those great documents of American constitutional history, the Declaration of Independence, the Articles of Confederation, and the Constitution, which are constantly referred to in the debates in the later volumes, are here inserted, as also are minor related state papers, such as the addresses of colonial assemblies, of the Continental Congresses, and of State Legislatures, an example of the last being the Virginia Bill of Rights. The “Federalist Papers” are also presented in the form of a digest, with a two-fold justification for their insertion: they are referred to constantly by the later debaters as the earliest and most authoritative commentaries on the Constitution, and have themselves the character of debates, since they quote and answer prevalent objections to the Constitution.

Formal debates were infrequent in colonial America, and only the substance of the few that occurred has been preserved. Accordingly it is to the recorded debates on colonial affairs, which took place in the British great question of the Free Coinage of Silver, which arose in the closing part of the author’s Congressional career, is hardly touched upon. Up to the close of Johnson’s Administration, however, the work forms one of the best examples of American political history, so clear is the exposition of situations, so judicious the selection of argumentative points, so admirable the digest of speeches, and so sound are the author’s own comments thereon.

A very valuable general guide to the editor was “American Political History, 1763-1876,” by the editors of “American Orations,” Professors Johnston and Woodburn [G. P. Putnam’s Sons, 1905]. This work is logically arranged, covering the subject of the Revolution, the Constitution, the Growth of Nationality, Slavery, Civil War, and Reconstruction. The information is compact and well selected, and presented in clear and orderly fashion. The editorial conclusions, which are founded upon the historical statements, are convincing in tone, and can be overthrown or modified only by a more complete presentation of the basic facts.

As accompanying and supplementing this work almost down to date, the reader will find a little primer entitled “American Politics,” by Professor Johnston and Professor Winthrop M. Daniels, also of Princeton, to be of great value for ready reference, the subject being treated by Presidential Administrations. Useful lists, such as of Cabinet officers, are included in the Appendix. The work is published by Henry Holt and Company, New York.

The larger work of Professor Johnston, “American Political History,” contains extensive bibliographies upon each of its subjects, including almost every important book on American politics and economics which was published before 1905.

With this reference the reader will excuse us for not enlarging the present bibliography, beyond noting one important work recently published. This is “The Origin and Growth of the American Constitution,” by Hannis Taylor, LL.D., ex-Minister to Spain: Houghton, Mifflin Company, Boston, 1911.

Parliament, that we must chiefly turn, presenting the single speeches of American orators and the even more argumentative protests of the colonial assemblies as a supplement to the arguments of the British contenders for American rights. Volume I is therefore a record of public controversies, as well as of debates proper, and as such is more historical in character than the remaining volumes.

Since the most vital questions, when our new Government was struggling to establish its place among the nations of the earth, were those dealing with Foreign Relations, Volumes II and III contain the great debates upon this subject from Washington’s Administration to the war with Spain and the diplomatic questions connected with the Panama Canal. Various debates on Foreign Affairs are inserted in other volumes because of their intimate connection with the subjects of these. Thus the Koszta affair appears in the first volume on Civil Rights.

Because our domestic history for the first three-quarters of our Constitutional history largely centered around slavery, this subject is taken up in Volume IV. The volume closes with the debate on the Dred Scott decision, and Volume V, reverting to the early debates on State’s Rights Not Connected with Slavery (such as the Webster-Hayne debate), comes quickly down to the Lincoln-Douglas debates, the result of which precipitated upon the country the question of secession, in connection with slavery. The volume continues the debates on Secession and Slavery down to, and including, the debate on the Conciliation bill in the closing months of Buchanan’s Administration.

Volume VI contains the debates of Lincoln’s Administration, or the Civil War period, with the exceptions of debates on Reconstruction, which will be found in the succeeding volume on Civil Rights, and of debates on Revenue and Finance, which will be found in Volumes XII and XIII, bearing these titles.

Volumes VII and VIII are on Civil Rights. The first reverts to the early discussions on Naturalization, continues with the famous debates on the Alien and Sedition Laws, and the related question of State Rights, and, touching upon the question of Nativism (the "Know-Nothing" movement), comes down to the Reconstruction period, and, taking up the question of Negro Rights where Volume VI left it, presents the debates on the Fourteenth Amendment. Volume VIII contains the debates on Negro Suffrage, ending with the Fifteenth Amendment, and then, the discussion of the negro being closed, takes up the debates on Indian Rights. The question of Woman's Rights is then presented, and the volume closes with debates on Polygamy, which, in its constitutional aspect, is a question of Civil Rights.

Volume IX contains debates on the powers and functions of the Departments of Government, Executive (President, Army, Navy), Legislative (Senate, House) and Judicial (Supreme Court), as well as debates on the related question of Civil Service Reform, and on the governmental powers and functions of the sovereign behind all the Departments—the People. Subjects treated in the last connection are Popular Election of President and Senators, Direct Legislation, and Recall of Judges and Judicial Decisions.

Volumes X and XI are on Economic and Social problems. In the first are debates on the Land Question (including the Homestead and Conservation laws and the Single Tax theory), and on the Railroad Question (centering around the power of the Federal Government over Interstate Commerce). The second volume contains debates on the Federal control of Trusts, on Labor legislation, on Socialism, Prohibition of the Liquor Traffic, National Regulation of Foods, etc.

Volume XII contains debates on Revenue, the chief subject being the Tariff, all the tariff acts from the revenue measures of the First Congress to the Payne-Aldrich Act being presented in chronological order, each clearly delimited from the rest by its specific issue. In close connection with the particular tariff or revenue bills which presented them, the subjects of Internal Revenue, Income, Inheritance and Corporation Taxes, and of Reciprocity with Canada are treated.

ILLUSTRATIONS

The volumes are illustrated with scenes of great debates and portraits of leading debaters, and with contemporary political cartoons relating to the subjects of the debate and the personality of the debaters. Indeed, the term "illustrated" is too weak a term to state the connection of the pictures with the text, for an apt cartoon is in itself the most effective of arguments, often exceeding in results the longest and most learned demonstration of an orator. Thomas Nast's cartoons of the Reconstruction period appealed on behalf of the Negro more movingly even than the pathetic periods of Charles Sumner, and Homer Davenport's symbolization of the Trust as a brutal giant was more convincing than the diatribes of any of the Populist orators against the "soulless corporations."

In this connection acknowledgment is made of the courtesy extended by the New York Public Library and the New York Historical Society in permitting the reproductions of many of the cartoons in their collections. To W. F. Brainard, of New York City, well known as an expert in "book-building," I would also extend thanks, for sifting the large number of editorially appropriate cartoons through the meshes of artistic and mechanical availability.

In conclusion I would express my appreciation of the services of my editorial assistant, Wilbert W. Blake-man. In such portions of the work as the early debates on the Tariff he has shown ability unusual in a young editor by selecting those points of the subject which are vital to-day, and reducing to the essential minimum those points which tempt the editor by their historical significance to expatiate upon them. By such procedure he has saved much needed space for the more important tariff debates of recent times.

Volumes XIII and XIV contain debates on Finance. The main subjects of the first volume are Public Credit [questions of Repudiation, etc.], National Banks, "Greenback" or Specie Currency. The last volume deals exclusively with the Silver Question.

Volume XIV also contains the General Index of the Series. This is divided into two parts: an Index of Proper Names (persons and places), and an Index of Subjects.

These indexes are synoptical in character, enabling the reader to prepare from them his own debates, biographical sketches of debaters, etc.

INTRODUCTIONS

Never before, it is believed, has a work of this nature possessed as its editorial contributors persons of the eminence and authority which distinguish the authors of the introductions of the volumes of the present series. Here they are: the President of the United States; the two living ex-Presidents; the Secretary of State; two Senators, one a noted historian, and the other an eminent financial expert; three university presidents and one professor of economics, each an authority in the subject which he discusses; the dean of American journalists, and a woman whose rank both as a journalist and economic historian is exceeded by no other writer in America; and two representative men of letters, the one the chief living member of the most distinguished family of New England, the other the scion of an old Virginia house noted for service to nation and State—he himself being the American Ambassador to the Court of St. James.

Some of the introductions were written after the author had carefully read the proof sheets of the volume in which the introduction was to appear; others were composed upon a general knowledge of the contents of the volume, and the rest were adapted by the authors from former addresses or articles on subjects appropriate to the volume. Thanks for permission to use the adapted articles are herewith extended to the publishers as well as to the authors.

VOLUME ONE
COLONIAL RIGHTS—THE REVOLUTION
THE CONSTITUTION

INTRODUCTION

THE CONSTITUTION AND ITS MAKERS¹

BESIDE the question of the maintenance or destruction of the Constitution of the United States all other questions of law and policy sink into utter insignificance. In its presence party lines should disappear and all sectional differences melt away like the early mists of dawn before the rising sun. The Constitution is our fundamental law. Upon its provisions rests the entire fabric of our institutions. It is the oldest of written constitutions. It has served as a model for many nations, both in the Old World and in the New. It has disappointed the expectations of those who opposed it, convinced those who doubted, and won a success beyond the most glowing hopes of those who put faith in it. Such a work is not to be lightly cast down or set aside, or, which would be still worse, remade by crude thinkers and by men who live only to serve and flatter in their own interest the emotion of the moment. We should approach the great subject as our ancestors approached it—simply as Americans with a deep sense of its seriousness and with a clear determination to deal with it only upon full knowledge and after the most mature and calm reflection. The time has come to do this, not only here and now, but everywhere throughout the country.

Let us first consider who the men were who made the Constitution and under what conditions they worked. Then let us determine exactly what they meant to do—a most vital point, for much of the discussion to which we have been treated thus far has proceeded upon a complete misapprehension of the purpose and intent of the framers of the Constitution. Finally, let us bring their work and their purposes to the bar of judgment, so that we may decide whether they have failed, whether in their theory of government they were right or wrong then and now, or whether their work has stood the test of time, is broad based on eternal principles of justice, and, if rent or mangled or destroyed, would not in its ruin bring disaster and woes inestimable upon the people who shall wreck their great inheritance and, like

The base Indian, throw a pearl away,
Richer than all his tribe.

First, then, of the men who met in Philadelphia in May, 1787, with doubts and fears oppressing them, but with calm, high courage and with a noble aspiration to save their country from the miseries which threatened it, to lead it out from the wilderness of distractions in which it was wandering blind and helpless, into the light, so that the chaos, hateful alike to God and men, might be ended and order put in its place. It is the fashion just now to speak of the framers of the Constitution as worthy, able, and patriotic persons whom we are proud to have embalmed in our history, but toward whom no enlightened man would now think of turning seriously for either guidance or instruction, so thoroughly has everything been altered and so much has intelligence advanced. It is commonly said that they dealt wisely and well with the problems of their day, but that of course they knew nothing of those which confront us, and that it would be worse than folly to be in any degree governed by the opinions of men who lived under such wholly different conditions. It seems to me that this view leaves something to be desired and is not wholly correct or complete. I certainly do not think that all wisdom died with our fathers, but I am quite sure that it was not born yesterday. I fully realize that in saying even this I show myself to be what is called old fashioned, and I know that a study of history, which has been one of the pursuits of my life, tends to make a man give more weight to the teachings of the past than it is now thought they deserve. Yet, after all allowance is made, I can not but feel that there is something to be learned from the men who established the Government of the United States, and that their opinions, the result of much and deep reflection, are not without value, even to the wisest among us.

On questions of this character, I think, their ideas and conclusions are not lightly to be put aside; for, after all, however much we may now gently patronize them as good old patriots long since laid in their honored graves, they were none the less very remarkable men, who would have been eminent in any period of history and might even, if alive now, attain to distinction. Let us glance over the list of delegates to the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia in 1787. I find, to begin with, that their average age was 43, which is not an extreme senectitude, and the ages range from Franklin, who was 81, to John Francis Mercer, of Virginia, who was 28. Among the older men who were conspicuous in the convention were Franklin, with his more than 80 years; Washington, who was 55; Roger Sherman, who was 66; and Mason and Wythe, of Virginia, who were both 61. But when I looked to see who were the most active forces in that convention, I found that the New Jersey plan was brought forward by William Paterson, who was 42; that the Virginia plan was proposed by Edmund Randolph, who was 34; while Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, whose plan played a large part in the making of the Constitution, was only 29. The greatest single argument, perhaps, which was made in the convention was that of Hamilton, who was 30. The man who contributed more, possibly, than any other to the daily labors of the convention and who followed every detail was Madison, who was 36. The Connecticut compromise was very largely the work of Ellsworth, who was 42; and the committee on style, which made the final draft, was headed by Gouverneur Morris, who was 35. Let us note, then, at the outset that youth and energy, abounding hope, and the sympathy for the new 1787, would seek to make it over with all modern improvements, and who with unconscious humor declare that they are engaged in the restoration of popular government.

That phrase is in itself suggestive. That which has never existed cannot be restored. If popular government is to be restored in the United States it must have prevailed under the Constitution as it is, and yet those who just now are so devoured by anxiety for the rights of the people propose to effect the restoration they demand by changing the very Constitution under which popular government is admitted by their own words to have existed. I will point out presently the origin of this confusion of thought. It is enough to say now that for more than a century no one questioned that the government of the Constitution was in the fullest sense a popular government. In 1863 Lincoln, in one of the greatest speeches ever uttered by man, declared that he was engaged in trying to save government by the people. Nearly thirty years later, when we celebrated the one hundredth anniversary of the Constitution, the universal opinion was still the same. All men then agreed that the Government which had passed through the fires of civil war was a popular government. Indeed, this novel idea of the loss of popular government which it is proposed to restore by mangling the Constitution under which it has existed for more than a century is very new; in fact, hardly ten years old.

This first conception of our Constitution as an instrument of popular government, so long held unquestioned, was derived from the framers of the Constitution themselves. They knew perfectly well that they were founding a government which was to be popular in the broadest sense. The theory now sedulously propagated, that these great men did not know what they were about, or were pretending to do one thing while they really did another, is one of the most fantastic delusions with which agitators have ever attempted to mislead or perplex the public mind. The makers of the Constitution may have been right or they may have been wrong in the principles upon which they acted or in the times stretching forward into the great and uncharted future, as well as high ability, were conspicuous among the men who framed the Constitution of the United States.

Their presiding officer was Washington, one of the great men of all time, who had led the country through seven years of war, and of whom it has been said by an English historian that "no nobler figure ever stood in the forefront of a nation's life." Next comes Franklin, the great man of science, the great diplomatist, the great statesman and politician, the great writer; one of the most brilliant intellects of the eighteenth century, who in his long life had known cities and men as few others have ever known them. There was Hamilton, one of the greatest constructive minds that modern statesmanship has to show, to whose writings German statesmen turned when they were forming their empire forty years ago, and about whom in these later days books are written in England, because Englishmen find in the principal author of "The Federalist" the great exponent of the doctrines of successful federation. There, too, was Madison, statesman and lawmaker, wise, astute, careful, destined to be, under the Government which he was helping to make, Secretary of State and President. Roger Sherman was there, sagacious, able, experienced; one of the leaders of the Revolution and a signer of the Declaration of Independence, as he was of the Constitution. Great lawyers were present in Philadelphia in that memorable summer of 1787, such men as Ellsworth and Wilson and Mason and Wythe. It was, in a word, a very remarkable body which assembled to frame a constitution for the United States. Its members were men of the world, men of affairs, soldiers, lawyers, statesmen, diplomatists, versed in history, widely accomplished, deeply familiar with human nature. I think that, without an undue or slavish reverence for the past or for the men of a former generation, we may fairly say that in patriotism and in intellect, in knowledge, experience, and calmness of judgment, these framers of the Constitution compare not unfavorably with those prophets and thinkers of to-day who decry the work of work they accomplished, but they knew precisely what they meant to do and why they did it. No man in history ever faced facts with a clearer gaze than George Washington, and when, after the adjournment of the convention, he said, "We have raised a standard to which the good and wise can repair; the event is in the hands of God," he labored under no misapprehension as to the character of the great instrument where his name led all the rest.

It is the fashion to say that since then great changes have occurred and wholly new conditions have arisen of which the men of 1787 could by no possibility have had any knowledge or anticipation. This is quite true. They could not have foreseen the application of steam to transportation, or of electricity to communication, which have wrought greater changes in human environment than anything which has happened to man since those dim, prehistoric, unrecorded days when some one discovered the control of fire, invented the wheel, and devised the signs for language, masterpieces of intelligence with which even the marvels of the last century cannot stand comparison. The men of the Constitution could as little have foreseen what the effects of steam and electricity would be as they could have anticipated the social and economic effects of these great inventions or the rapid seizure of the resources of nature through the advances of science and the vast fortunes and combinations of capital which have thus been engendered. Could they, however, with prophetic gaze have beheld in a mirror of the future all these new forces at work, so powerful as to affect the very environment of human life, even then they would not, I think, have altered materially the Constitution which they were slowly and painfully perfecting. They would have kept on their way, because they would have seen plainly what is now too often overlooked and misunderstood, that all the perplexing and difficult problems born of these inventions and of the changes, both social and economic, which have followed were subjects to be dealt with by laws as the questions arose, and laws and policies were not their business. They were not making laws to regulate or to affect either social or economic conditions. Their work was not only higher but far different. They were laying down certain great principles upon which a government was to be built and by which laws and policies were to be tested as gold is tested by a touchstone.

There is no greater fallacy than to suppose that new and fundamental principles of government are constantly to be invented and wrought out. Laws change and must change with the march of humanity across the centuries as it alteration finds in the conditions about it, but fundamental principles and theories of government are all extremely old.

If you will read "The Republic" and "The Laws" of Plato and supplement that study by an equally careful examination of what Aristotle has to say on government you will find that those great minds have not only influenced human thought from that time to this, but that there is little which they left unsaid. It is the fashion, for example, to speak of socialism as if it were something new, a radiant discovery of our own time which is to wipe away all tears. The truth is that it is very old, as old in essence as human nature, for it appeals to the strong desire in every man to get something for nothing and to have someone else bear his burdens and do his work for him. As a system it is amply discussed by Plato, who, in "The Republic," urges measures which go to great extremes in this direction. In the fourth century of our era a faction called the Circumcellions were active as socialists and caused great trouble within the weakening Empire of Rome. The real difficulty historically with the theories of socialism is not that they are new, but that they are very, very old, and wherever they have been put in practical operation on a large scale they have resulted in disorder, retrogression, and in the arrest of civilization and progress.

In order to reach the essence of what the makers of the Constitution tried and meant to do, which it is most important to know and reflect upon deeply before we seek to undo their work, let us begin by dismissing from our consideration all that is unessential or misleading.

INTRODUCTION

affect the fundamental principles on which the Government rests.

By making these omissions we come now to the vital point, which is, What kind of a government did the makers of the Constitution intend to establish and how did they mean to have it work? They were, it must be remembered, preparing a scheme of government for a people peculiarly fitted to make any system of free institutions work well. The people of the United Colonies were homogeneous. They came in the main from Great Britain and Ireland, with the addition of the Dutch in New York, of some Germans from the Palatinate, and of a few French Huguenots, whose ability and character were as high as their numbers were relatively small. But an overwhelming majority of the American people in 1787 were of English and Scotch descent, and they, as well as the others from other lands, were deeply imbued with all those principles of law which were the bulwarks of English liberty. In this new land men had governed themselves and there was at that moment no people on earth so fit or so experienced in self-government as the people of the thirteen colonies. Their colonial governments were representative and in essence democratic. They became entirely so when the Revolution ended and the last English governor was withdrawn. In the four New England colonies local government was in the hands of the town meetings, the purest democracies then or now extant, but it is best to remember, what the men of 1787 well knew, that these little democracies moved within fixed bounds determined by the laws of the States under which they had their being.

For such a people, of such a character, with such a past and such habits and traditions, only one kind of government was possible, and that was a democracy. The makers of the Constitution called their new Government a republic, and they were quite correct in doing so, for it was of necessity republican in form. But they knew that what they were establishing was a democracy. One has but to read the debates to see how constantly present that fact was to their minds. Democracy was

Let us lay aside first the word republic, for a republic denotes a form and not a principle. A republic may be democratic like ours, or an autocracy like that of Augustus Caesar, or an oligarchy like Venice, or a changing tyranny like some of those visible in South America. The word has become as inaccurate, scientifically speaking, as the word monarchy, which may be in reality a democracy as in England or Norway, constitutional as in Italy, or a pure despotism as in Russia. Let us adhere in this discussion to the scientifically exact word "democracy." Next let us dismiss all that concerns the relations of the States of the National Government. Federation was the great contribution of the Philadelphia convention to the science of government. The framers of the Constitution, if they did not invent the principle, applied it on such a scale and in such a way that it was practically a discovery, a venture both bold and new, as masterly as it was profoundly planned. With the love of precedents characteristic of their race they labored to find authority and example in such remote and alien arrangements as the Achaian League and the Amphictyonic Council, but the failure of these precedents as such was the best evidence of the novelty and magnitude of their own design. Their work in this respect has passed through the ordeal of a great war; it has been and is to-day the subject of admiration and study on the part of foreign nations, and not even the most ardent reformer of this year of grace would think, in his efforts to restore popular government, of assailing the Union of Sovereign States. Therefore we may pass by this great theme which was the heaviest part of the task of our ancestors.

In the same way we may dismiss, much as it troubled the men of 1787, all that relates to the machinery of government, such as the electoral college, the tenure of office, the methods of electing Senators and Representatives, and the like. These matters are important; many active thinkers in public life seek to change them, not for the better, as I believe, but none the less these provisions concern only the mechanism of government; they do not go to the root of the matter, they do not then a very new thing in the modern world. As a system it had not been heard of, except in the fevered struggles of the Italian city republics, since the days of Rome and Greece, and although the convention knew perfectly well that they were establishing a democracy and that it was inevitable that they should do so, some of them regarded it with fear and all with a deep sense of responsibility and caution. The logical sequence as exhibited in history and as accepted by the best minds of the eighteenth century, struggling to give men a larger freedom, was democracy—anarchy—despotism. The makers of the Constitution were determined that so far as in them lay the American Republic should never take the second step, never revolve through the vicious circles which had culminated in empire in Rome, in the tyrants of the Grecian and the despots of the Italian cities, which is their turn had succumbed to the absolutism of foreign rulers.

The vital question was how should this be done; how should they establish a democracy with a strong government—for after their experience of the Confederation they regarded a weak government with horror—and at the same time so arranged the Government that it should be safe as well as strong and free from the peril of lapsing into an autocracy on the one hand, or into disorder and anarchy on the other? They did not try to set any barrier in the way of the popular will, but they sought to put effective obstacles in the path to sudden action which was impelled by popular passion, or popular whim, or by the excitement of the moment. They were the children of the "Great Rebellion" and the "Blessed Revolution" in the England of the seventeenth century, and they were steeped in the doctrine of limiting the power of the King. But here they were dealing with a sovereign who could not be limited, for, while a king can be limited by transferring his power to the people, when the people are sovereign their powers cannot be transferred to anybody. There is no one to transfer them to, and if they are taken away the democracy ceases to exist and another government, fundamentally different, takes its place.

The makers of the Constitution not only knew that the will of the people must be supreme, but they meant to make it so. That which they also aimed to do was to make sure that it was the real will of the people which ruled and not their momentary impulse, their well-considered desire and determination and not the passion of the hour, the child, perhaps, of excitement and mistake inflamed by selfish appeals and terrorized by false alarms. The main object, therefore, was to make it certain that there should be abundant time for discussion and consideration, that the public mind should be thoroughly and well informed, and that the movements of the machinery of government should not be so rapid as to cut off due deliberation. With this end in view they established with the utmost care a representative system with two chambers and an executive of large powers, including the right to veto bills. They also made the amendment of the Constitution a process at once slow and difficult, for they intended that it should be both, and indeed that it should be impracticable without a strong, determined, and lasting public sentiment in favor of change.

Finally they established the Federal judiciary, and in the Supreme Court of the United States they made an addition to the science of government second only in importance to their unequalled work in the development of the principle of federation. That great tribunal has become in the eyes of the world the most remarkable among the many remarkable solutions devised by the convention of 1787 for the settlement of the gravest governmental problems. John Marshall, with the intellect of the jurist and the genius of the statesman, saw the possibilities contained in the words which called the court into being. By his interpretation and that of his associates and their successors the Constitution attained to flexibility and escaped the rigidity which then and now is held up as the danger and the defect of a written instrument. In their hands the Constitution has been expanded to meet new conditions and new problems as they have arisen. In their hands also the Constitution has been the protection of the rights of States and the

THE STAMP ACT

Proposal in the British Parliament of a Colonial Stamp Act—Colonial Opposition—Passage of the Act: in favor, Sir George Grenville and Sir Charles Townshend; opposed, Gen. Henry Seymour Conway, Alderman Beckford, Mr. Jackson, Sir William Meredith, and Col. Isaac Barré—Tilt between Townshend and Barré—Debate on the Resolutions of Patrick Henry against the Act in the Virginia Assembly: in favor, Mr. Henry, George Johnson and Richard Henry Lee; opposed, Peyton Randolph—Stamp Act Congress—Boycott of Stamps—Sons of Liberty—Speech of John Adams [Mass.]: "Our Blood-bought Liberty"—Daniel Dulany [Md.] on the Stamp Act Riots.

THE acts of Parliament restraining the trade and manufacture of the colonies were deemed by the colonists, in some instances, a violation of their rights, and in others an unnecessary and improper sacrifice of their interest to the supposed interest of the parent country, or some other more favored part of the British empire; and they had, accordingly, been very little regarded.

A distinction had been made by the colonists between what were called external and internal taxes, the former being considered as imposed for the regulation of the trade of the empire, and not for the purpose of revenue. Plans of laying internal taxes and of drawing a revenue from the colonies had been at times suggested to the ministry, and particularly to Sir Robert Walpole and Mr. William Pitt during their respective administrations, but these statesmen were too wise and sagacious to adopt them.

The first attempt to draw a revenue directly from the colonies was made after the power of the French in America had been reduced. This was deemed a favorable moment to call upon the Americans for taxes to rights of men, and laws which violated its principles and its provisions have been set aside.

By making the three branches of the Government, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial, entirely separate and yet coördinate, and by establishing a representative system and creating a Supreme Court of extraordinary powers, the framers of the Constitution believed that they had made democracy not only all powerful but at the same time safe and that they had secured it from gradual conversion into autocracy on the one hand and from destruction by too rapid motion and too quick response to the passions of the moment on the other. If ever men were justified by results they have been. The Constitution in its development and throughout our history has surpassed the hopes of its friends and utterly disappointed the predictions and the criticisms of its foes. Under it the United States has grown into the mighty republic we see to-day. New States have come into the Union, vast territories have been acquired, population and wealth have increased to a degree which has amazed the world, and life, liberty, and property have been guarded beneath the flag which is at once the symbol of the country and of the Constitution under which the nation has risen to its high success.

assist in the payment of a debt which had been incurred, as was alleged, in a great measure for their protection against a powerful enemy, who was now no longer an object of their dread.

Soon after George Grenville became Prime Minister, the project of imposing internal taxes in America was carried into effect. In the winter of 1764 that minister called together the agents of the colonies, and gave them notice of his intention of drawing a revenue from the colonies, saying that for this purpose he should in the ensuing session of Parliament propose a duty on stamps.

Soon after this, resolutions were passed in the House of Commons continuing and making perpetual the duties on sugar, molasses, and some other articles imported into the colonies, with additions and amendments.

MEMORIALS OF THE COLONIES

These ministerial and parliamentary proceedings were soon communicated to the colonies by their agents. The colonists at once took the alarm, particularly at the contemplated stamp duty; and, instead of yielding to it, or providing an equivalent according to the suggestion of the minister, they reiterated, though in a more full and ample manner, the declarations so often made by their ancestors, that they could be taxed only in their colonial legislatures, where, and where alone, they were represented. The people of Boston, at their meeting in May, 1764, instructed their representatives to the general court on this important subject. In these instructions (which were drawn by Samuel Adams, one of the committee appointed for that purpose), after commenting on the sugar and molasses act, they proceed to observe:

But our greatest apprehension is that these proceedings may be preparatory to new taxes; for, if our trade may be taxed, why not our lands? Why not the products of our lands and every thing we possess or use? This, we conceive, annihilates our charter rights to govern and tax ourselves. It strikes at our British privileges, which, as we have never forfeited, we hold in common with our fellow subjects who are natives of Britain. If taxes are laid upon us, in any shape, without our having a legal representation where they are laid, we are reduced from the character of free subjects to the state of tributary slaves.

We, therefore, earnestly recommend it to you to use your utmost endeavors to obtain from the general court all necessary advice and instruction to our agent at this most critical juncture. We also desire you to use your endeavors that the other colonies, having the same interests and rights with us, may add their weight to that of this province; that by united application of all who are aggrieved all may obtain redress.

This was the first public act in the colonies in opposition to the ministerial plans of drawing a revenue directly from America; and it contained the first suggestion of the propriety of that mutual understanding and correspondence among the colonies which laid the foundation of their future confederacy.

The House of Representatives of Massachusetts, in June following, declared:

That the sole right of giving and granting the money of the people of that province was vested in them, or their representatives; and that the imposition of duties and taxes by the Parliament of Great Britain upon a people not represented in the House of Commons is absolutely irreconcilable with their rights. That no man can justly take the property of another without his consent; upon which original principles the power of making laws for levying taxes, one of the main pillars of the British constitution, is evidently founded.

The same sentiments are expressed, though in stronger language, in their letter of instructions to their agent:

If the colonists are to be taxed at pleasure without any representatives in Parliament, what will there be to distinguish them, in point of liberty, from the subjects of the most absolute prince? If we are to be taxed, at pleasure, without our consent, will it be any consolation to us that we are to be assessed by an hundred instead of one? If we are not represented we are slaves.

that when, as subjects, all have equal merits, a fatal, nay the most odious, discrimination should nevertheless be made between them, no sophistry can recommend to the sober impartial decision of common sense.

While the Assembly of New York acknowledged that Parliament had a right to regulate the trade of the colonies, they declared that, in doing this, they had not the right of imposing duties for the purpose of revenue.

On this subject, they say to the House of Commons with equal boldness:

But a freedom to drive all kinds of traffic, in subordination to, and not inconsistent with, the British trade, and an exemption from all duties in such a course of commerce, is humbly claimed by the colonies as the most essential of all the rights to which they are entitled as colonists and connected in the common bond of liberty with the free sons of Great Britain. For, with submission, since all impositions, whether they be internal taxes, or duties paid for what we consume, equally diminish the estates upon which they are charged, what avails it to any people by which of them they are impoverished?

Everything will be given to preserve life; and, though there is a diversity in the means, yet the whole wealth of a country may be as effectually drawn off by the exaction of duties as by any other tax upon their estates.

In conclusion the Assembly declare:

They have no desire to derogate from the power of the Parliament of Great Britain; but they cannot avoid deprecating the loss of such rights as they have hitherto enjoyed, rights established in the first dawn of our constitution, founded upon the most substantial reasons, confirmed by invariable usage, conducive to the best ends; never abused to bad purposes, and with the loss of which, liberty, property, and all the benefits of life tumble into insecurity and ruin; rights, the deprivation of which will dispirit the people, abate their industry, discourage trade, introduce discord, poverty and slavery; or, by depopulating the colonies, turn a vast, fertile, prosperous region into a dreary wilderness, impoverish Great Britain, and shake the power and independence of the most opulent and flourishing empire in the world.

The House at the same time appointed a committee to sit in the recess of the court, to write to the other colonies requesting them to join in applying for a repeal of the sugar act, and in preventing the passage of the act laying stamp duties, or any other taxes, on the American provinces.

In the course of the year 1764 petitions to the King and both houses of Parliament were prepared in many of the colonies, and sent to their agents.

The petitions of the Assembly of New York were drawn with great ability, and breathed a spirit more bold and decided than those from any other colony.

An exemption from the burden of ungranted and involuntary taxes must be the grand principle of every free state. Without such a right vested in themselves, exclusive of all others, there can be no liberty, no happiness, no security; it is inseparable from the very idea of property; for who can call that his own which may be taken away at the pleasure of another and so evidently does this appear to be the natural right of mankind, that even conquered tributary states, though subject to the payment of a fixed periodical tribute, never were reduced to so absolute and forlorn a condition as to yield to all the burdens which their conquerors might, at any future time, think fit to impose. The tribute paid, the debt was discharged; and the remainder they would call their own.

And if conquered vassals, upon the principle of mutual justice, may claim a freedom from assessments, unbounded and unassented to, without which they would suffer the loss of everything, and life itself become intolerable, with how much propriety and boldness may we proceed to inform the Commons of Great Britain, who to their distinguished honor in all ages asserted the liberties of mankind, that the people of this colony nobly disdain the thought of claiming that exemption as a privilege. They found it on a basis more honorable, solid, and stable; they challenge it and glory in it, as their right. That right their ancestors enjoyed in Great Britain and Ireland, their descendants returning to these kingdoms enjoy it again, and that it may be exercised by his Majesty's subjects at home, and justly denied to those who submitted to poverty, barbarian wars, loss of blood, loss of money, personal fatigues and ten thousand unutterable hardships, to enlarge the trade, wealth and dominion of the nation; or, to speak with the most incontestable modesty,

While the colonists in their various petitions denied the right of Parliament to tax them without their consent, they expressed their willingness to grant aids to the Crown according to their abilities through their own legislatures, whenever such aids should be required in the usual constitutional mode. As all aids granted to the Crown, agreeably to the British constitution, were the free gifts of the people, the colonists claimed the right of judging as to the amount and manner of these gifts; and were, therefore, unwilling indirectly to acknowledge or countenance the right of Parliament to tax them, by proposing any substitute for the stamp duty, which substitute Parliament might accept or reject at pleasure.

In the winter of 1764-1765 Dr. Benjamin Franklin and other agents of the colonies had a conference with Mr. Grenville on the subject of the stamp duty. They informed the minister of the great opposition to the proposed tax in America, and most earnestly entreated him that, if money must be drawn from the colonies by taxes, to leave it with the colonists to raise it among themselves in such manner as they should think proper and best adapted to their circumstances and abilities.

DEBATE BETWEEN TOWNSHEND AND BARRÉ

When the bill for laying the contemplated duties was brought before the House of Commons, it met with strong opposition. Though Mr. Pitt was absent on this occasion, confined to his bed by sickness, and General Conway and Alderman Beekford were the only persons in the House who opposed the bill on the ground that Parliament had no right to tax the colonies, Col. Isaac Barré, Mr. Jackson, Sir William Meredith, and others were against it on the ground of expediency, alleging generally that it was to the last degree impolitic, as well as unjust, for Great Britain to impose direct taxes upon the colonists while she retained the monopoly of their commerce. Sir George Grenville and Sir Charles Townshend were the principal supporters of the bill.

Mr. Townshend, in the conclusion of a speech in favor of the measure delivered on February 7, 1765, exclaimed, "And now these Americans, planted by our care, nourished up by our indulgence, until they are grown to a degree of strength and importance, and protected by our arms—will they grudge to contribute their mite to relieve us from the heavy burden we lie under?" To this Col. Barré, in a style and manner peculiar to himself, instantly replied:

They planted by your care! No; your oppressions planted them in America! They fled from your tyranny to a then uncultivated and inhospitable country, where they exposed themselves to almost all the hardships to which human nature is liable; and, among others, to the cruelties of a savage foe, the most subtle, and I will take upon me to say the most formidable, of any people upon the face of the earth; and yet, actuated by principles of true English liberty, our American brethren met all the hardships with pleasure, compared with those they suffered in their own country from the hands of those that should have been their friends.

They nourished by your indulgence! They grew by your neglect of them. As soon as you began to take care about them; that care was exercised in sending persons to rule them in one department and another, who were deputies of deputies to some members of this house, sent to prey upon them; men whose behavior, on many occasions, has caused the blood of those sons of liberty to recoil within them; men promoted to the highest seats of justice, some [who], to my knowledge, were glad, by going to a foreign country, to escape being brought to a bar of justice in their own.

They protected by your arms! They have nobly taken up arms in your defence, have exerted their valor, amidst their constant and laborious industry, for the defence of a country whose frontier was drenched in blood, while its interior parts yielded all its little savings to your emolument.

And, believe me, that same spirit of freedom which actuated that people at first will accompany them still. But prudence forbids me to explain myself further.

God knows, I do not at this time speak from party heat. However superior to me in general knowledge and experience the respectable body of this house may be, yet I claim to know more of America than most of you, having seen and been conversant with that country. The people, I believe, are as truly loyal as any subjects the King has; but [they are] a people jealous of their liberties, and who will vindicate them if ever they should be violated—but the subject is too delicate, I will say no more.

REJECTION OF PETITIONS

The House was very forcibly struck with these sentiments, thrown out without premeditation, and for a while sat amazed and without answering a word. But when the petitions from Virginia, Connecticut, and South Carolina were offered in opposition to the bill, the House refused to receive them; in the first place because they questioned or denied the right of Parliament to pass the bill; and in the second place because it was contrary to an old standing rule of the House, "that no petition should be received against a money bill." The majority against receiving the petitions was very large, and those from the other colonies were not offered. The petition from New York was expressed in such strong language that no member of the House could be prevailed upon to present it. The bill passed the House 250 to 50; was adopted in the House of Lords with great unanimity, and on the 22d of March, 1765, received the royal sanction.

The act imposed duties on most of the instruments used in judicial and commercial proceedings, and, indeed, in almost all the ordinary transactions in the colonies; nor were pamphlets, newspapers and almanacs excepted. The literature of the colonists did not escape the notice of the ministers. A duty of two pounds sterling was required for every degree conferred by seminaries of learning. The ministry affected to believe, and indeed declared, that the act embraced so many objects that it would "execute itself." Apprehensive, however, of opposition, the government passed a bill during the same session authorizing the quartering of the troops in the colonies, and directing the assemblies to furnish them with certain articles of provisions not before usually required. During the pendency of this bill it was proposed that the troops might be quartered in private houses. This, however, was too palpable and flagrant a violation of the sacred rights of individuals to be adopted, and the proposition was finally given up. No act of the parent country ever excited such universal alarm in the colonies as this. The colonists saw and felt that the act was not only a violation of their rights, but a fatal blow aimed at the future peace and prosperity of their country.

AMERICAN OPPOSITION TO THE ACT

The assembly of Virginia was the first public body that met after the news of the Stamp Act reached America. Those who had heretofore taken the lead in the popular branch of that body, the House of Burgesses, seemed unwilling to approach the subject. It was not until near the close of the session, about the first of May, that an action was taken regarding the act.

Then it was that a young lawyer from Hanover County, who had taken into his confidence only one or two of his colleagues, arose and introduced a set of resolutions, the boldness of which struck the timid assembly with consternation, although at the same time it excited their awe and admiration.

The speaker was Patrick Henry, who, though he was reputed the most eloquent speaker in the colony, had hitherto not distinguished himself in the assembly.

RESOLUTIONS OF PATRICK HENRY

The following are the resolutions which Mr. Henry introduced in the House of Burgesses on the Stamp Act:

Whereas the honorable House of Commons in England have of late drawn into question how far the General Assembly of this colony hath power to make laws for laying taxes and imposing duties, payable by the people of this His Majesty's most ancient colony; for settling and ascertaining the same to all future times, the House of Burgesses of the present General Assembly have come to the following resolutions.

Resolved, that the first adventurers and settlers of this, His Majesty's colony and dominion, brought with them, and transmitted to their posterity and all other His Majesty's subjects since inhabiting in this His Majesty's said colony, all the privileges, franchises, and immunities that have, at any time, been held, enjoyed, and possessed by the people of Great Britain.

Resolved, that by two royal charters granted by King James I, the colonists aforesaid are declared entitled to all the privileges, liberties, and immunities of denizens and natural born subjects, to all intents and purposes as if they had been abiding and born within the realm of England.

Resolved, that the taxation of the people by themselves, or by persons chosen by themselves to represent them, who can only know what taxes the people are able to bear, and the easiest mode of raising them, and are equally affected by such taxes themselves, is the distinguishing characteristic of British freedom, and without which the ancient constitution cannot subsist.

Resolved, that His Majesty's liege people of this most ancient colony have uninterruptedly enjoyed the right of being thus governed by their own Assembly, in the article of their taxes and internal police; and that the same hath never been forfeited, or any other way given up, but hath been recognized by the King and people of Great Britain.

Resolved, therefore, that the General Assembly of this colony have the sole right and power to lay taxes and impositions upon the inhabitants of this colony; and that every attempt to vest such power in any person or persons whatever, other than the General Assembly aforesaid, has a manifest tendency to destroy British as well as American freedom.

The above resolutions were found among the papers of Patrick Henry, after his death, sealed up, and with the following indorsement, "Inclosed are the resolutions of the Virginia assembly, concerning the Stamp Act. Let my executors open this paper."¹

Chief Justice John Marshall, in his "Life of Washington," gives the resolutions which received the sanction of the Assembly with the third resolution omitted, and with slight differences in the phraseology of the others.

Judge Marshall adds, "Such were the resolutions as agreed to by that part of the Assembly which was most timid. The following resolutions were also introduced by Mr. Henry, and passed the committee, but were disagreed to in the House:

"Resolved, that His Majesty's liege people, the inhabitants

To prevent the success of this unjust system, an union of counsel and action among all the colonies is undoubtedly necessary. The politician of Italy delivered the result of reason and experience when he proposed the way to conquest, by division. How to effect this union, in the wisest and firmest manner, perhaps, time and much reflection only can show. But well to understand each other, and timely to be informed of what passes both here and in Great Britain, it would seem that not only select committees should be appointed by all the colonies, but that a private correspondence should be conducted between the lovers of liberty in every province.

Peyton Randolph was one of those who opposed Henry's resolutions as precipitate. Indeed, he was greatly alarmed at their probable effect in angering Parliament. As they were leaving the hall, Jefferson heard him say, referring to the closeness of the vote by which the resolutions were carried, "By God, I would have given five hundred guineas for a single vote!"

The proceedings of Virginia were immediately circulated through the colonies, and roused them to action. The various assemblies, at the suggestion of Massachusetts, determined upon a Stamp Act congress of the colonies, to be held at New York on the first Tuesday of October, 1765.

THE STAMP ACT CONGRESS

This was the first general meeting of the colonies for the purpose of considering their rights and privileges, and obtaining a redress for the violation of them on the part of the parent country.

The commissioners were generally instructed to prepare suitable petitions and representations to the King and Parliament on the subject of the late acts regarding the colonies, and to pray for relief.

After having duly organized, and resolved that the commissioners of each colony should have "one voice" only in determining questions that should arise, this congress, on the 8th of October, took into consideration "the rights and privileges of the colonists, with the several inconveniences and hardships to which they were of this colony, are not bound to yield obedience to any law or ordinance whatsoever, designed to impose any taxation whatsoever upon them, other than the laws and ordinances of the General Assembly aforesaid.

"Resolved, that any person who shall, by speaking or writing, maintain that any person or persons, other than the General Assembly of this colony, have any right or power to lay any taxation whatsoever on the people here, shall be deemed an enemy to this His Majesty's colony."

DEBATE ON THE RESOLUTIONS

Some of the resolutions offered by Mr. Henry occasioned a most violent and, as has been said by one who was present, a "most bloody" debate in that house. They were seconded by George Johnson, who was an able constitutional lawyer, and opposed by those who had before taken the lead, because not sufficiently conciliatory. The bold and powerful eloquence of the mover, however, prevailed over all opposition, though the most objectionable were carried by a single vote only. Mr. Henry did not hesitate to declare that the act imposing internal duties on the colonists was tyrannical, and that the king in assenting to it had acted the part of a tyrant; and when, in the heat of debate, alluding to the fate of other tyrants, he exclaimed, "Cæsar had his Brutus, Charles I his Cromwell, and George III"—he was interrupted by the speaker and others, with the cry of "Treason!" Mr. Henry, pausing for a moment, and fixing his eye on the speaker, deliberately concluded—"may profit by their example; if this be treason, make the most of it."

Henry was strongly supported in this debate by Richard Henry Lee. Says a historian of the time, "People knew not which most to admire: the overwhelming might of Henry, or the resistless persuasion of Lee." Mr. Lee also wrote many powerful articles upon the Stamp Act to the newspapers, as well as letters to patriots in the other colonies counseling a union of interests. In a letter to John Dickinson, dated July 25, 1768, on Parliament's declaration of its supremacy over the colonies, he wrote:

and must be subjected by the Stamp Act and other late acts of Parliament." This important subject was under consideration until the 19th of October, when a declaration of the rights and grievances of the colonists was agreed to.

In this declaration, consisting of fourteen articles, after acknowledging their allegiance to the King, and "all due subordination" to Parliament, they, among other things, assert and declare that the colonists are entitled to all the inherent rights and liberties of His Majesty's natural born subjects in the kingdom of Great Britain; and that it is inseparably essential to the freedom of a people, and the undoubted right of Englishmen, that no taxes be imposed on them but with their own consent, given personally or by their representatives—that the colonists are not and, from their local circumstances, cannot be represented in the House of Commons in Great Britain—that the only representatives of the people of these colonies are persons chosen therein by themselves, and that no taxes ever have been or can be constitutionally imposed on them but by their respective legislatures—that, all supplies to the Crown being the free gifts of the people, it is unreasonable and inconsistent with the principles and spirit of the British constitution for the people of Great Britain to grant to His Majesty the property of the colonists—that trial by jury is the inherent and invaluable right of every British subject in the colonies, and that the Stamp Act, and other acts extending the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court beyond its ancient limits, "have a manifest tendency to subvert the rights and liberties of the colonists."

They also declared that the restrictions imposed by several late acts of Parliament on the trade of the colonies were burdensome, and would render them unable to purchase the manufactures of Great Britain; and that it was the indispensable duty of the colonies to the best of sovereigns, to the mother country, and to themselves, to endeavor by a loyal and dutiful address to the King and humble application to Parliament to procure a repeal of the act imposing stamp duties, of all parts of such acts as extend the admiralty jurisdiction, and of the other late acts for the restriction of American commerce.

This congress then prepared an address to the King, and a petition to each house of Parliament, drawn by committees appointed for that purpose. The committee to draw an address to the King were Robert R. Livingston, William S. Johnson, and William Murdock; to draw the petition to the House of Lords were John Rutledge, Edward Tilghman, and Philip Livingston; and to draw the petition to the House of Commons were Thomas Lynch, James Otis, and Thomas McKean.

These state papers evince the talents as well as firmness, tempered with wisdom and moderation, of this first American congress; composed as it was of some of the most distinguished statesmen from the several colonies therein represented.

ADDRESS TO THE KING

In their address to the King, drawn up principally by Mr. Johnson from Connecticut, one of the ablest lawyers and most accomplished scholars in America, the congress remind him that:

Animated with the spirit of liberty, encouraged by his predecessors, and confiding in the public faith, their ancestors, for the enjoyment of all the rights essential to freedom, emigrated to the American continent; and in the midst of innumerable dangers and difficulties, and at a great expense of their blood and treasure, added "these vast and valuable dominions to the empire of Great Britain." That, for the enjoyment of their rights and privileges, governments were early formed in the colonies with full powers of legislation, agreeably to the principles of the English constitution; and that, under these governments, the liberties, thus vested in their ancestors, and transmitted to their posterity, have been exercised and enjoyed, and by the inestimable blessings thereof, under the favor of Almighty God, the inhospitable deserts of America have been converted into flourishing countries. Science, humanity, and the knowledge of divine truths have been diffused through remote regions of ignorance, infidelity, and barbarism; the number of British subjects wonderfully increased; and the wealth and power of Great Britain proportionally augmented. That, by means of these settlements, and the unparalleled success of His Majesty's arms, a foundation was now laid for rendering the British empire the most extensive and powerful of any recorded in history.

"Our connection," they add, "with this empire we esteem our greatest happiness and security, and humbly conceive it may

"That the balance of trade will ever be much against the colonies, and in favor of Great Britain, while we consume her manufactures, the demand for which must ever increase in proportion to the number of inhabitants settled here with the means of purchasing them. We therefore humbly conceive it to be the interest of Great Britain to increase, rather than diminish, these means, as the profits of all the trade of the colonies ultimately center there to pay for her manufactures, as we are not allowed to purchase elsewhere; and by the consumption of which, at the advanced prices the British taxes oblige the makers and vendors to put on them, we eventually contribute very largely to the revenues of the crown.

"That from the nature of American business, the multi-

This, with most humble submission to Your Majesty, we apprehend will be most effectually accomplished by fixing the pillars thereof on liberty and justice, and securing the inherent rights and liberties of your subjects here, upon the principles of the English constitution." To this constitution, they say, "these two principles are essential, the right of your faithful subjects freely to grant to Your Majesty such aids as are required for the support of your government over them and other public exigencies, and trial by their peers. By the one they are secured from unreasonable impositions, and by the other from arbitrary decisions of executive power. The continuance of these blessings to the inhabitants of America we ardently implore as absolutely necessary to unite the several parts of your widely extended dominions in that harmony so essential for the preservation of the whole."

PETITION TO PARLIAMENT

In their petition to the House of Commons they claim the same rights as in their address to the King; and they complain not only of the act imposing the stamp duties, but of several other acts imposing duties in the colonies, and laying their trade under burdensome restrictions.

They stated "that the remote situation and other circumstances of the colonies render it impracticable that they should be represented but in their respective subordinate legislatures"; and they "humbly conceived that the Parliament, adhering strictly to the principles of the constitution, have never hitherto taxed any but those who were actually therein represented; for this reason, we humbly apprehend they never have taxed Ireland, or any other of the subjects without the realm.

"But were it ever so clear," they add, "that the colonies might in law be represented in the honorable House of Commons, yet we conceive that very good reasons, from inconvenience, from the principles of true policy, and from the spirit of the British constitution, may be adduced to show that it would be for the real interest of Great Britain, as well as her colonies, that the late regulations should be rescinded, and the several acts of Parliament imposing duties and taxes on the colonies, and extending the jurisdiction of the courts of admiralty here beyond their ancient limits, should be repealed.

plicity of suits and papers used in matters of small value, in a country where freeholds are so minutely divided, and property so frequently transferred, a stamp duty must ever be very burdensome and unequal.

"That it is extremely improbable that the honorable House of Commons should, at any time, be thoroughly acquainted with our condition, and all facts requisite to a just and equal taxation of the colonies.

"It is also humbly submitted, whether there be not a material distinction in reason and sound policy, at least, between the necessary exercise of parliamentary jurisdiction in general acts, for the amendment of the common law, and the regulation of trade and commerce through the whole empire, and the exercise of that jurisdiction, by imposing taxes on the colonies."

With the exception of the foregoing petitions, address and general declaration of rights, little is known or has been collected with respect to the proceedings of this first American congress. But James Otis of Massachusetts is remembered to have been particularly distinguished for his eloquence and thorough knowledge of American rights. In the margin of Ramsay's "History of the American Revolution," Mr. Rodney, one of the commissioners from Delaware, made the following entry, "The historian passes by this congress in a very light manner. It was this congress in which James Otis, of Boston, displayed that light and knowledge of the interest of America, which, shining like a sun, lit up those stars which shone on this subject afterward."

This congress adjourned on the 25th of October, and their proceedings were approved by all the members except Mr. Ruggles of Massachusetts, and Mr. Ogden of New Jersey, both of whom left New York without signing the address and petitions. The commissioners from South Carolina and Connecticut were limited by their instructions to make report to their respective legislatures, and the committee of New York, who had been admitted as members, had authority to apply to the King or Parliament. The address and petitions were, therefore, signed by the commissioners from only six of the colonies. The proceedings of the congress, however, were afterward sanctioned and approved by the assemblies not only of South Carolina, Connecticut and New York, but of the colonies not therein represented.

PROTESTS OF COLONIAL LEGISLATURES

The subject of the stamp duties was not left with the congress alone; it was taken up by the colonial legislatures, either before or subsequent to the meeting of that body.

The Legislature of Connecticut, in their instructions to their agent at London, after declaring the act laying internal duties to be "an infringement of the essential liberties of the colonists," proceed to say, "we can by no means be content that you should give up the matter of right, but must beg you would on all proper occasions claim and firmly insist on the exclusive right of the colonies to tax themselves, and the privilege of trial by jury; and to maintain these principles in the most effectual manner possible as what we can never recede from."

Opposition to the stamp duties was not confined to legislative resolutions and declarations. Numerous individuals in every part of the country held meetings, and in bold and decided language expressed, not only their detestation of the act, but their unalterable determination that the same should never be carried into effect.

ADDRESS OF PLYMOUTH, MASS.

The instructions given to their representative in the assembly by the inhabitants of the town of Plymouth, the immediate descendants of the Pilgrims who first planted New England, will be read with peculiar interest.

After expressing their esteem for the British constitution, and stating their grievances, they say to their representative, Mr. Foster, "You, sir, represent a people who are not only descended from the first settlers of this country, but inhabit the very spot they first possessed. Here was first laid the foundation of the British empire in this part of America, which, from a very small beginning, has increased and spread in a manner very surprising, and almost incredible; especially when we consider that all this has been effected without the aid and assist-

BOYCOTT OF THE STAMPS

Many of the resolutions adopted at these meetings of the citizens were of an inflammatory character.

The following declaration of the freemen of the County of Essex, in New Jersey, and of Talbot County, in Maryland, will serve, among thousands of others of a similar cast, to show the spirit then universally prevailing in America against stamps and stamp officers.

After declaring the act itself unconstitutional, they add, "that they will detest, abhor, and hold in contempt all and every person or persons who shall merely accept of any employment or office relating to the said Stamp Act, or shall take any shelter or advantage of the same, and all and every stamp-pimp, informer, and encourager of the execution of said act; and that they will have no communication with any such persons, unless it be to inform them of their villainy."

The merchants of New York, on the 31st of October, nobly sacrificed their interest on this occasion by entering into an agreement or association to have no goods shipped from Great Britain, unless the Stamp Act should be repealed.

The merchants of Philadelphia and Boston soon after joined those of New York in similar associations.

Another association of a different and, indeed, of a novel character was in December entered into by some of the citizens of New York and Connecticut, who were called the "Sons of Liberty," the object of which association was in reality to prevent, by force if necessary, the execution of the act, under the pretence of maintaining unimpaired the principles of the British constitution, of which they declared the act to be a violation. In this association the act is thus noticed:

And whereas, a certain pamphlet has appeared in America in the form of an act of Parliament called and known by the name of the Stamp Act, but has never been legally published or introduced, neither can it, as it would immediately deprive them of the most invaluable part of the British constitution, viz. the trial by juries, and the most just mode of taxation in the world, that is of taxing themselves; rights that every British ance of any power on earth; that we have defended, protected, and saved ourselves against the incursions and cruelty of savages, and the subtlety and inhumanity of our inveterate and natural enemies the French; and all this without the appropriation of any tax by stamps, or stamp act laid upon our fellow subjects, in any part of the King's dominions, for defraying the expenses thereof.

"This place, sir, was at first the asylum of liberty, and, we hope, will ever be preserved sacred to it; though it was then no more than a forlorn wilderness, inhabited by savage men and beasts. To this place our fathers (whose memory be revered), possessed of the principles of liberty in their purity, disdaining slavery, fled to enjoy those privileges which they had an undoubted right to, but were deprived of by the hands of violence and oppression in their native country. We, sir, their posterity, the freeholders and other inhabitants of this town, legally assembled for that purpose, possessed of the same sentiments, and retaining the same ardor for liberty, think it our indispensable duty on this occasion to express to you these our sentiments of the Stamp Act and its fatal consequences to this country, and to enjoin upon you, as you regard not only the welfare, but the very being of this people, that you (consistent with our allegiance to the King and relation to the government of Great Britain), disregarding all proposals for that purpose, exert all your power and influence in relation to the Stamp Act, at least, until we hear the success of our petitions for relief. We likewise, to avoid disgracing our ancestors, as well as the reproaches of our own consciences, and the curses of posterity, recommend it to you to obtain, if possible, in the honorable House of Representatives of the people a full and explicit assertion of our rights, and to have the same entered on their public records that all generations yet to come may be convinced that we have not only a just sense of our liberties, but that we never (with submission to divine Providence) will be slaves to any power on earth; and, as we have at all times an abhorrence of tumults and disorders, we think ourselves happy in being at present under no apprehensions of any, and in having good and wholesome laws, sufficient to preserve the peace of the province in all future times, unless provoked by some imprudent measures; so we think it by no means advisable for you to interest yourself in the protection of stamp papers or stamp officers."

subject becomes heir to as soon as born. For the preservation of which and every part of the British constitution, they do reciprocally resolve and determine to march with the utmost dispatch, at their own proper cost and expense, on the first proper notice (which must be signified to them by at least six of the Sons of Liberty) with their whole force, if required and it can be spared, to the relief of those that shall, are, or may be in danger from the Stamp Act, or its aiders or abettors, or anything relative to it, on account of anything that may have been done in opposition to its obtaining; and they do mutually and most fervently recommend it to each other to be vigilant in watching all those who, from the nature of their offices, vocations, or dispositions, may be the most likely to introduce the use of stamped paper, to the total subversion of the British constitution and American liberty; and the same, when discovered, immediately to advise each other of, let them be of what rank or condition soever; and they also do agree that they will mutually, and to the utmost of their power, by all just ways and means, endeavor to bring all such betrayers of their country to the most condign punishment; and further they do mutually resolve to defend the liberty of the press in their respective colonies from all unlawful violations and impediments whatever on account of said act, as the only means (under divine Providence) of preserving their lives, liberties and fortunes, and the same, in regard to the judges, clerks, attorneys, etc., that shall proceed without any regard to the Stamp Act, from all pains, fines, mulcts, penalties, or any other molestation whatever; and, finally, that they will, to the utmost of their power, endeavor to bring about, accomplish, and perfect the like association with all the colonies on the continent, for the like salutary purposes and no other.

This singular association was afterward extended to some of the other colonies, and but for a repeal of the act would, no doubt, have been generally adopted.

These various associations and resolutions were encouraged and supported, and the spirit of the people kept alive, by the numerous publications in the newspapers in America, most of which were enlisted in favor of the colonists in this controversy.

The pens of American patriots in favor of liberty and in opposition to the claim of Parliament during the year 1765 were not confined to newspaper publications.

An "Essay on the Canon and Feudal Law," by John Adams; "Considerations on the Propriety of Imposing Taxes on the British Colonies, for the Purpose of Raising a Revenue by Act of Parliament," by Daniel Dulany of Maryland, and "An Enquiry into the Rights of the British Colonies," by Theodorick Bland of Virginia, are most notable.

"OUR BLOOD-BOUGHT LIBERTY"

JOHN ADAMS

"Be it remembered," says Mr. Adams, "that liberty must, at all hazards, be supported! We have a right to it, derived from our Maker! but, if we had not, our fathers have earned it and bought it for us, at the expense of their ease, their estates, their pleasure, and their blood. Is there not something extremely fallacious," he adds, "in the commonplace images of mother country and children colonies? Are we children of Great Britain, any more than the cities of London, Exeter, and Bath? Are we not brethren and fellow subjects with those in Britain, only under a somewhat different method of legislation, and a totally different method of taxation? But, admitting we are children, have not children a right to complain when their parents are attempting to break their limbs, to administer poison, or to sell them to enemies for slaves?"

"Let the pulpit," he concludes, "resound with the doctrines and sentiments of religious liberty. Let us hear the danger of thralldom to our consciences from ignorance, extreme poverty, and dependence, in short from civil and political slavery. Let us see delineated before us the true map of man. Let us hear the dignity of his nature, and the noble rank he holds among the works of God! that consenting to slavery is a sacrilegious breach of trust, is offensive in the sight of God as it is derogatory from our honor, our interest, or happiness; and that God Almighty has promulgated from heaven liberty, peace, and good will to man.

"Let the bar proclaim, 'the laws, the rights, the generous plan of power' delivered down from remote antiquity; inform the world of the mighty struggles and numberless sacrifices, made by our ancestors, in the defense of freedom. Let it be known that British liberties are not the grants of princes or parliaments, but original rights, conditions of original contracts, coequal with prerogative and coeval with government. That former not only proved the illegality of the Stamp Act, and the evils the Americans must experience from the new parliamentary regulations of the colonial trade, whereby they were rendered unable to pay for the large balances always due for English manufactures; but pointed out a remedy for these evils in future. The remedy suggested was domestic industry, which, he said, would render the American colonists less dependent on the mother country for articles either of necessity or luxury.

"Let the manufacture of America," says this enlightened statesman, "be the symbol of dignity, the badge of virtue, and it will soon break the fetters of distress. A garment of linsey-woolsey, when made the distinction of patriotism, is more honorable, and attractive of respect and veneration, than all the pageantry, and the robes, and the plumes, and the diadem of an emperor without it. Let the emulation be, not in the richness and variety of foreign productions, but in the improvement and perfection of our own—let it be demonstrated that the subjects of the British empire in Europe and America are the same, that the hardships of the latter will ever recoil on the former.

"In theory it is supposed that each is equally important to the other, that all partake of the adversity and depression of any. The theory is just, and time will certainly establish it; but if another principle should be hereafter adopted in practice, and a violation deliberate, cruel, ungrateful, and attended with every circumstance of provocation be offered to our fundamental rights, why should we leave it to the slow advances of time (which may be the great hope and reliance, probably, of the authors of the injury, whose view it may be to accomplish their selfish purposes in the interval) to prove what might be demonstrated immediately? Instead of moping, and puling, and whining, to excite compassion; in such a situation, we ought with spirit, and vigor, and alacrity to bid defiance to tyranny by exposing its impotence, by making it as contemptible as it would be detestable. By a vigorous application to manufactures, the consequence of oppression in the colonies to the inhabitants of Great Britain would strike home, and immediately. None could mistake it. Craft and subtlety would not be able to impose on the most ignorant and credulous; for, if any should be so weak of sight as not to see, they would not be so callous as not to feel it. Such conduct would be the most dutiful and beneficial to the mother country. It would point out the distemper when the many of our rights are inherent and essential, agreed on as maxims, and established as preliminaries, even before a parliament existed: Let them search for the foundation of British laws and government in the frame of human nature, in the constitution of the intellectual and moral world. There let us see that truth, liberty, justice, and benevolence are its everlasting basis; and that, if these could be removed, the superstructure is overthrown of course."

After stating that the "encroachments upon liberty, in the reigns of James I and Charles I, first turned the attention of learned men to government, and produced the greatest number of statesmen ever seen in any age or nation," Mr. Adams says, "the prospect now before us in America ought in the same manner to engage the attention of every man of learning to matters of power and right, that we may be neither led nor driven blindfolded to irretrievable destruction. Nothing less than this seems to have been meditated for us by somebody or other in Great Britain. There seems to be a direct and formal design on foot to enslave all America. This, however, must be done by degrees. The first step that is intended seems to be an entire subversion of the whole system of our fathers by the introduction of the canon and feudal law into America. The canon and feudal systems, though greatly mutilated in England, are not yet destroyed. Like the temples and palaces in which the great contrivers of them were once worshiped and inhabited, they exist in ruins; and much of the domineering spirit of them still remains. The designs and labor of a certain society to introduce the former of them into America have been well exposed to the public by a writer of great abilities; and the further attempts to the same purpose, that may be made by that society, or by the ministry or Parliament, I leave to the conjecture of the thoughtful. But it seems very manifest from the Stamp Act itself that a design is formed to strip us, in a great measure, of the means of knowledge, by loading the press, the colleges, and even an almanac and a newspaper, with restraints and duties; and to introduce the inequalities and dependencies of the feudal system by taking from the poorer sort of people all their little subsistence, and conferring it on a set of stamp officers, distributors and their deputies."

DULANY ON THE ACT

Mr. Dulany and Mr. Bland were among the most distinguished lawyers and statesmen in America. The remedy might be easy, and a cure at once effected by a simple alteration of regimen."¹

Bland's book, published in 1766, was the first written on colonial rights. He was regarded as an authority on the subject, his knowledge of Virginia matters in particular gaining him the title of the "Virginia Antiquary."

A statement of the public sentiment and feeling in America, in relation to the Stamp Act, was, in a variety of ways, communicated to the ministry and people of Great Britain. A person high in office, in New York, in November of this year, writes to a nobleman in England, "Depend upon it, they will suffer no man to execute any law to raise internal taxes, unimposed by their own assemblies. None of the distributors durst act; and that man's heart must be fortified with tenfold steel who ventures to approve the doctrine that the Parliament hath a right to give away the estates of the colonists without their consent."²

STAMP ACT RIOTS

The indignation of the people against the act, unfortunately, was not confined to resolutions and agreements; but in some of the colonies broke out into acts of violence and unjustifiable outrage against the persons and property of its supporters. These outrages were carried to the greatest length in Boston. The house of Chief-Justice Thomas Hutchinson was attacked in a riotous manner, his furniture and pictures destroyed, and his valuable library and manuscripts, in a wanton manner, either burnt or thrown into the street. Mr. Hutchinson was very obnoxious to the people of Massachusetts not only for favoring the execution of the Stamp Act, but because he was instrumental in enforcing the acts of trade. The houses of several revenue officers, among them that of Mr. Oliver, the distributor of stamps, were also injured. These riotous acts were, however, disapproved by the great mass of the people of Boston, and of the province generally.

Such was the general determination of the people against the execution of the act that the distributors of the stamp paper who did not voluntarily resign were compelled so to do, either by threats or force. On the 1st of November, the day the act was to take effect, neither stamps nor stamp officers were to be found in the colonies. The courts of justice were for a time closed, vessels did not depart from American ports, and business of various kinds was interrupted. This state of things, however, remained for a short period only; business by general consent soon resumed its usual course without the aid of stamp paper.

CHAPTER II

THE SUPREMACY OF PARLIAMENT

[DEBATES IN PARLIAMENT]

Debate on the Right to Tax America between George Grenville and William Pitt. I.—Debate on the Resolution Declaring the Supremacy of Parliament: in favor, Gen. Henry Seymour Conway and the Marquis of Rockingham; opposed, Col. Isaac Barré and William Pitt—Examination of Dr. Benjamin Franklin—Debate on the Repeal of the Stamp Act: in favor, Gen. Conway, Mr. Pitt, and Col. Barré; opposed, Mr. Grenville—Debate in the House of Lords between Lords Camden and Mansfield on the Supremacy of Parliament—Stamp Act Repealed and Supremacy of Parliament Asserted.

WHILE this measure of the British Government was thus agitating the colonies a change took place in the British ministry. The immediate authors of the measure itself were removed from the councils of the King, and others, supposed more favorable to the American interest, came into office.

On the 14th of January, 1766, the American papers relating to the origin, progress, and tendency of the disturbances in the colonies were laid before the House of Commons. These papers the House determined to take into consideration on the 28th of the same month.

Upon the day of the submission of the American papers occurred the great debate between George Grenville and William Pitt on the right of Parliament to tax America.

Pitt's speeches were extemporaneous, and, since verbatim reporting was not practiced in his time, are not preserved in the exact form in which they were delivered. Of all his speeches, that on the Stamp Act, reported by Sir Robert Dean and Lord Charlemont, is said to be closest in verbiage to the actual oration, with perhaps the exception of his Address to the Throne concerning Affairs in America, reported by Hugh Boyd and corrected by Pitt.

THE RIGHT TO TAX AMERICA

PITT VS. GRENVILLE

Mr. PITT arose from his place in the House and said:

It is a long time, Mr. Speaker, since I have attended in Parliament. When the resolution was taken in this House to tax America I was ill in bed. If I could have endured to be carried in my bed—so great was the agitation of my mind for the consequences—I would have solicited some kind hand to have laid me down on this floor, to have borne my testimony against it! It is now an act that has passed. I would speak with decency of every act of this House; but I must beg the indulgence of the House to speak of it with freedom.

I hope a day may soon be appointed to consider the state of the nation with respect to America. I hope gentlemen will come to this debate with all the temper and impartiality that his Majesty recommends, and the importance of the subject requires; a subject of greater importance than ever engaged the attention of this House, that subject only excepted when, near a century ago, it was the question whether you yourselves were to be bond or free. In the meantime, as I cannot depend upon my health for any future day (such is the nature of my infirmities), I will beg to say a few words at present, leaving the justice, the equity, the policy, the expediency of the act to another time.

I will only speak to one point—a point which seems not to have been generally understood—I mean to the right. Some gentlemen [alluding to Mr. Nugent] seem to have considered it as a point of honor. If gentlemen consider it in that light, they leave all measures of right and wrong, to follow a delusion that may lead to destruction. It is my opinion that this kingdom has no right to lay a tax upon the colonies. At the same time, I assert the authority of this kingdom over the colonies to be sovereign and supreme, in every circumstance of government and legislation whatsoever. They are the subjects of this kingdom; equally entitled with yourselves to all the natural rights of mankind and the peculiar privileges of Englishmen; equally bound by its laws, and equally participating in the constitution of this free country. The Americans are the sons, not the bastards of England! Taxation is no part of the governing or legislative power. The taxes are a voluntary gift and grant of the Commons alone. In legislation the three estates of the realm are alike concerned; but the concurrence of the peers and the Crown to a tax is only necessary to clothe it with the form of a law. The gift and grant is of the Commons alone. In ancient days the Crown, the barons, and the clergy possessed the lands. In those days the barons and the clergy gave and granted to the Crown. They gave and granted what was their own! At present, since the discovery of America, and other circumstances permitting, the commons are become the proprietors of the land. The Church (God bless it!) has but a pittance. The property of the lords, compared with that of the commons, is as a drop of water in the ocean; and this House represents those commons, the proprietors of the lands; and those proprietors virtually represent the rest of the inhabitants. When, therefore, in this House, we give and grant, we give and grant what is our own. But in an American tax what do we do? "We, your Majesty's commons for Great Britain, give and grant to your Majesty"—what? Our own property! No! "We give and grant to your Majesty" the property of your Majesty's commons of America! It is an absurdity in terms.

The distinction between legislation and taxation is essentially necessary to liberty. The Crown and the peers are equally legislative powers with the Commons. If taxation be a part of simple legislation the Crown and the peers have rights in taxation as well as yourselves; rights which they will claim, which they will exercise, whenever the principle can be supported by power.

There is an idea in some that the colonies are virtually represented in the House. I would fain know by whom an American is represented here. Is he represented by any knight of the shire in any county in this kingdom? Would to God that respectable representation was augmented to a greater number! Or will you tell him that he is represented by any representative of a borough? a borough which, perhaps, its own representatives never saw! This is what is called the rotten part of the constitution. It cannot continue a century.¹ If it does not drop it must be amputated. The idea of a virtual representation of America in this House is the most contemptible idea that ever entered into the head of a man. It does not deserve a serious refutation.

The commons of America, represented in their several assemblies, have ever been in possession of the exercise of this, their constitutional right, of giving and granting their own money. They would have been slaves if they had not enjoyed it! At the same time, this kingdom, as the supreme governing and legislative power, has always bound the colonies by her laws, by her regulations, and restrictions in trade, in navigation, in manufactures, in everything, except that of taking their money out of their pockets without their consent.

At the conclusion of Mr. Pitt's remarks, Mr. Grenville arose in behalf of the government. He began by severely censuring the ministry for not giving Parliament earlier notice of the disturbances in America. "They began," said he, "in July, and now we are in the middle of January; lately they were only occurrences; they are now grown to disturbances, to tumults and riots. I doubt they border on open rebellion; and, if the doctrine I have heard this day be confirmed, I fear they will lose that name to take that of revolution. The government over them being dissolved, a revolution will take place in America."

Then, applying himself to the issue of the debate, namely, the distinction between internal and external taxation, Mr. Grenville continued:

I cannot understand the difference between external and internal taxes. They are the same in effect, and differ only in name. That this kingdom has the sovereign, the supreme legislative power over America is granted; it cannot be denied; and taxation is a part of that sovereign power. It is one branch of the legislation. It is, it has been, exercised over those who are not, who were never, represented. It is exercised over the India Company, the merchants of London, the proprietors of the stocks, and over many great manufacturing towns. It was exercised over the county palatine of Chester, and the bishopric of Durham, before they sent any representatives to Parliament. I appeal for proof to the preambles of the acts which gave them representatives; one in the reign of Henry VIII, the other in that of Charles II. [Mr. Grenville then quoted the acts, and so clamorous for Mr. Pitt! Mr. Pitt! that the speaker was obliged to call to order. Mr. Pitt said:

"Right lies wholly neither with one side nor the other."

I do not apprehend I am speaking twice. I did expressly reserve a part of my subject, in order to save the time of this House; but I am compelled to proceed in it. I do not speak twice; I only finish what I designedly left imperfect. But if the House is of a different opinion, far be it from me to indulge a wish of transgression against order. I am content, if it be your pleasure, to be silent.

Here he paused. The House resounding with Go on! go on! he proceeded:

Gentlemen, sir, have been charged with giving birth to sedition in America. They have spoken their sentiments with freedom against this unhappy act, and that freedom has become their crime. Sorry I am to hear the liberty of speech in this House imputed as a crime. But the imputation shall not discourage me. It is a liberty I mean to exercise. No gentleman ought to be afraid to exercise it. It is a liberty by which the gentleman who calumniates it might have profited. He ought to have desisted from his project. The gentleman tells us America is obstinate; America is almost in open rebellion. I rejoice that America has resisted. Three millions of people, so dead to all the feelings of liberty as voluntarily to submit to be slaves, would have been fit instruments to make slaves of the rest. I come not here armed at all points, with law cases and acts of Parliament, with the statute book doubled down in dog's ears, to defend the cause of liberty. If I had, I myself would have cited the two cases of Chester and Durham. I would have cited them to show that, even under former arbitrary reigns, Parliaments were ashamed of taxing a people without their consent, and allowed them representatives. Why did the gentleman confine himself to Chester and Durham? He might have taken a higher example in Wales—Wales, that never was taxed by Parliament till it was incorporated.¹ I would not debate a particular point of law with the gentleman. I know his abilities. I have been obliged to his diligent researches. But, for the defence of liberty, upon a general principle, upon a constitutional principle, it is a ground on which I stand firm—on which I dare meet any man.

desired that they might be read; which being done, he said:] When I proposed to tax America I asked the House if any gentleman would object to the right; I repeatedly asked it, and no man would attempt to deny it. Protection and obedience are reciprocal. Great Britain protects America; America is bound to yield obedience. If not, tell me when the Americans were emancipated? When they want the protection of this kingdom they are always very ready to ask it. That protection has always been afforded them in the most full and ample manner. The nation has run herself into an immense debt to give them their protection; and now, when they are called upon to contribute a small share toward the public expense—an expense arising from themselves—they renounce your authority, insult your officers, and break out, I might almost say, into open rebellion. The seditious spirit of the colonies owes its birth to the factions in this House. Gentlemen are careless of the consequences of what they say, provided it answers the purposes of opposition. We were told we trod on tender ground. We were bid to expect disobedience. What is this but telling the Americans to stand out against the law, to encourage their obstinacy with the expectation of support from hence? "Let us only hold out a little," they would say, "our friends will soon be in power." Ungrateful people of America! Bounties have been extended to them. When I had the honor of serving the Crown, while you yourselves were loaded with an enormous debt, you gave bounties on their lumber, on their iron, their hemp, and many other articles. You have relaxed in their favor the Act of Navigation, that palladium of the British commerce; and yet I have been abused in all the public papers as an enemy to the trade of America. I have been particularly charged with giving orders and instructions to prevent the Spanish trade, and thereby stopping the channel by which alone North America used to be supplied with cash for remittances to this country. I defy any man to produce any such orders or instructions. I discouraged no trade but what was illicit, what was prohibited by an act of Parliament. I desire a West India merchant [Mr. Long], well known in the city, a gentleman of character, may be examined. He will tell you that I offered to do every thing in my power to advance the trade of America. I was above giving an answer to anonymous calumnies; but in this place it becomes one to wipe off the aspersion.

Here Mr. Grenville ceased. Several members got up to speak, but Mr. Pitt seeming to rise, the House was

The gentleman tells us of many who are taxed, and are not represented—the India company, merchants, stockholders, manufacturers. Surely many of these are represented in other capacities, as owners of land, or as freemen of boroughs. It is a misfortune that more are not equally represented. But they are all inhabitants, and as such, are they not virtually represented? Many have it in their option to be actually represented. They have connections with those that elect, and they have influence over them. The gentleman mentioned the stockholders. I hope he does not reckon the debts of the nation as a part of the national estate.

Since the accession of King William, many ministers, some of great, others of more moderate abilities, have taken the lead of government. [Here Mr. Pitt went through the list of them, bringing it down till he came to himself, giving a short sketch of the characters of each, and then proceeded:] None of these thought, or even dreamed, of robbing the colonies of their constitutional rights. That was reserved to mark the era of the late administration. Not that there were wanting some, when I had the honor to serve His Majesty, to propose to me to burn my fingers with an American stamp act. With the enemy at their back, with our bayonets at their breasts, in the day of their distress, perhaps the Americans would have submitted to the imposition; but it would have been taking an ungenerous, an unjust advantage. The gentleman boasts of his bounties to America! Are not these bounties intended finally for the benefit of this kingdom? If they are not, he has misapplied the national treasures!

I am no courtier of America. I stand up for this kingdom. I maintain that the Parliament has a right to bind, to restrain America. Our legislative power over the colonies is sovereign and supreme. When it ceases to be sovereign and supreme I would advise every gentleman to sell his lands, if he can, and embark for that country. When two countries are connected together like England and her colonies, without being incorporated, the one must necessarily govern. The greater must rule the less. But she must so rule it as not to contradict the fundamental principles that are common to both.

If the gentleman does not understand the difference between external and internal taxes, I cannot help it. There is a plain distinction between taxes levied for the purposes of raising a revenue and duties imposed for the regulation of trade, for the accommodation of the subject; although, in the consequences, some revenue may incidentally arise from the latter.

The gentleman asks, When were the colonies emancipated? I desire to know, when were they made slaves? But I dwell not upon words. When I had the honor of serving His Majesty I availed myself of the means of information which I derived from my office. I speak, therefore, from knowledge. My materials were good. I was at pains to collect, to digest, to consider them; and I will be bold to affirm that the profit to Great Britain from the trade of the colonies, through all its branches, is two millions a year. This is the fund that carried you triumphantly through the last war. The estates that were rented at two thousand pounds a year, threescore years ago, are at three thousand at present. Those estates sold then from fifteen to eighteen years purchase; the same may now be sold for thirty. You owe this to America. This is the price America pays you for her protection. And shall a miserable financier come with a boast that he can bring "a pepper-corn" into the exchequer by the loss of millions to the nation? I dare not say how much higher these profits may be augmented. Omitting the immense increase of people, by natural population, in the northern colonies, and the emigration from every part of Europe, I am convinced on other grounds that the commercial system of America may be altered to advantage. You have prohibited where you ought to have encouraged. You have encouraged where you ought to have prohibited. Improper restraints have been laid on the continent in favor of the islands. You have but two nations to trade with in America. Would you had twenty! Let acts of Parliament in consequence of treaties remain; but let not an English minister become a custom-house officer for Spain, or for any foreign power. Much is wrong! Much may be amended for the general good of the whole!

Does the gentleman complain he has been misrepresented in the public prints? It is a common misfortune. In the Spanish affair of the last war I was abused in all the newspapers for having advised his Majesty to violate the laws of nations with regard to Spain. The abuse was industriously circulated even in hand-bills. If administration did not propagate the abuse administration never contradicted it. I will not say what advice I did give the King. My advice is in writing, signed by myself, in the possession of the Crown. But I will say what advice I did not give to the King. I did not advise him to violate any of the laws of nations.

SUPREMACY OF PARLIAMENT

plunderer; a gentleman [Colonel Draper], whose noble and generous spirit would do honor to the proudest grandes of the country? The Americans have not acted in all things with prudence and temper: they have been wronged; they have been driven to madness by injustice. Will you punish them for the madness you have occasioned? Rather let prudence and temper come first from this side. I will undertake for America that she will follow the example. There are two lines in a ballad of Prior's, of a man's behavior to his wife, so applicable to you and your colonies, that I cannot help repeating them:

Be to her virtues very kind."

Upon the whole, I will beg leave to tell the House what is my opinion. It is that the Stamp Act be repealed absolutely, totally, and immediately. That the reason for the repeal be assigned, viz., because it was founded on an erroneous principle. At the same time, let the sovereign authority of this country over the colonies be asserted in as strong terms as can be devised, and be made to extend to every point of legislation whatsoever; that we may bind their trade, confine their manufactures, and exercise every power whatsoever, except that of taking their money out of their pockets without their consent.

DEBATE ON THE SUPREMACY OF PARLIAMENT

On the 27th of January, 1766, the petition of the American Congress was offered to the House of Commons. Several objections to receiving it were immediately made, such as that it came from an unauthorized and unconstitutional assembly; and that to receive a petition from persons thus assembled without any authority from the Crown would give countenance to such illegal meetings in future. Such meetings, it was said, were pregnant with danger to His Majesty's authority and government. Another strong objection to the reception of the memorial arose from the petitioners denying the right of Parliament to impose internal taxes, and questioning their right even to lay duties for the regulation of trade in the colonies. This, it was said, struck at the very vitals of legislative authority, and strongly pointed to a state independent of the mother country.

Finally, after an examination of the petition in com-

As to the report of the gentleman's preventing in some way the trade of bullion with the Spaniards, it was spoken of so confidently that I own I am one of those who did believe it to be true.

The gentleman must not wonder he was not contradicted when, as minister, he asserted the right of Parliament to tax America. I know not how it is, but there is a modesty in this House which does not choose to contradict a minister. Even your chair, sir, looks too often toward St. James'.¹ I wish gentlemen would get the better of this modesty. If they do not perhaps the collective body may begin to abate of its respect for the representative. Lord Bacon has told me that a great question would not fail of being agitated at one time or another. I was willing to agitate such a question at the proper season, viz., that of the German war—my German war, they called it! Every session I called out, Has anybody any objection to the German war? Nobody would object to it, one gentleman only excepted, since removed to the Upper House by succession to an ancient barony [Lord Le Despencer, formerly Sir Francis Dashwood]. He told me he did not like a German war. I honored the man for it, and was sorry when he was turned out of his post.

A great deal has been said without doors of the power, of the strength of America. It is a topic that ought to be cautiously meddled with. In a good cause, on a sound bottom, the force of this country can crush America to atoms. I know the valor of your troops. I know the skill of your officers. There is not a company of foot that has served in America out of which you may not pick a man of sufficient knowledge and experience to make a governor of a colony there. But on this ground, on the Stamp Act, which so many here will think a crying injustice, I am one who will lift up my hands against it.

In such a cause your success would be hazardous. America, if she fell, would fall like the strong man; she would embrace the pillars of the state, and pull down the constitution along with her. Is this your boasted peace—not to sheathe the sword in its scabbard, but to sheathe it in the bowels of your countrymen? Will you quarrel with yourselves, now the whole house of Bourbon is united against you; while France disturbs your fisheries in Newfoundland, embarrasses your slave trade to Africa, and withholds from your subjects in Canada their property stipulated by treaty; while the ransom for the Manillas is denied by Spain, and its gallant conqueror basely traduced into a mean mittee of the whole, which lasted three or four days, Secretary Henry Seymour Conway moved a resolution declaring "that the King's Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords, spiritual and temporal, and Commons of Great Britain, in Parliament assembled, had, hath, and, of right, ought to have full power and authority to make laws and statutes of sufficient force and validity to bind the colonies and people of America subjects of Great Britain, in all cases whatsoever."

This resolution was followed by four others, declaring that the tumults and insurrections in the colonies were in open defiance of His Majesty's government; and, the same being encouraged by sundry votes and resolutions in the colonial assemblies, proper recompense must be made to those who had suffered in their persons and property.

The ministry had now determined to procure a repeal of the acts relating to stamps; and at the same time to assert in the most unqualified manner the absolute supremacy of Parliament over the colonies.

In introducing the first resolution, Gen. Conway and the Marquis of Rockingham, chancellor of the exchequer, said they were induced to offer the proposition in so extensive a manner not only as necessary to meet the resolutions and language of several of the colonies, but because, upon the fullest enquiry into the constitution of Great Britain, they were convinced that, in point of law, the King, Lords, and Commons were undoubtedly possessed of that power, though in point of policy, justice, or equity, it was a power they ought to exercise, but in the most extraordinary cases only.

Col. Barré moved to strike out the words in the declaratory resolution, "in all cases whatsoever"; he should then, he said, have no objection to it. He was seconded by Mr. Pitt.

This brought up directly the great question of the right of Parliament to tax the colonists, and the long and animated debate which followed was principally confined to this point alone.

Those in favor of the motion said, among other things, that the emigrants to the colonies carried with them every right the crown could grant, and every right of British subjects. That they carried with them the common law of the land; and that by this common law, and the spirit of the constitution, no man could be taxed without being represented—that the people of America could not, with the least propriety, be said to be represented in the Parliament of Great Britain; and it was representation alone which gave the right and power to the Commons of imposing taxes. This, they said, was the foundation of all the arguments and reasoning of Mr. Locke on the subject; and greater authority could not be produced. That the principles of taxation as distinguished from legislation were as distinct principles and powers as any two propositions under the sun; and had been so considered uniformly by their ancestors for many ages—that the counties palatine of Chester and Durham had always taxed themselves by writs of requisition, and on that account, when the grant of a charter was made out erecting Lancaster into a county palatine, there was an express reservation of the power of Parliament to impose taxes upon the people of that county; which would have been unnecessary if the power of Parliament was such as contended for.

That the clergy formerly taxed themselves; for, though the archbishops and others sat in Parliament, it was not as representatives of the clergy; the body of the clergy, therefore, separately and by themselves, granted subsidies to the Crown, and neither Lords nor Commons attempted to alter or vary them; and that this was a strong authority to show the difference between taxation and legislation.

That, by the principles of the constitution, the Commons alone made grants to the Crown—that all bills which passed both houses of Parliament remained in the Upper House for the fiat of the King, except bills of subsidy and taxes, which, when passed by the Lords, were again sent down to the Commons, and by the speaker presented to the sovereign as the free gift of the Commons; and of the Commons alone the King asks for a supply, and to them only he renders his thanks when granted. That by solemn compacts express powers had been granted to the colonists; powers repeatedly recognized by Parliament. It was evidently intended that the Americans should be as free as other British subjects: they have the power of raising and granting their money—a power which constitutes the essence of Parliament—if this is taken from them the very existence, the very essence, of assemblies is destroyed. The colonists, therefore, whosoever the sovereignty of the Crown extended—that the colonists in their new settlements owed the same subjection and allegiance to the supreme power as when residing in Great Britain—that no time or distance could terminate this subjection and allegiance, and which, by the law of the land, must descend to their posterity. That no compact made between the Crown and his subjects upon their emigration could have destroyed their relation with this supreme sovereign power. That Parliament should have the power to alter or change their property, to enact laws for the punishment of great offences and, in particular, of high treason, by which they might be divested of their property, their inheritances taken away, without their immediate consent; and yet not have power to impose a tax upon that property seemed, they said, an extraordinary proposition. That, after the Revolution of 1688, upon an application to have the judgment reversed, which in 1684 had adjudged the charter of Massachusetts null and void, on a writ of quo warranto the agents urged the illegality of the proceedings, and insisted that the judgment should be reversed on that account, and their charter restored; yet Pollexfen and Holt were of opinion that, if the judgment should be reversed, and the charter restored, they must still expect to have it repealed, because in making the extensive grants contained in it the Crown had exceeded its authority. That in the year 1713, also, a bill was brought into Parliament for the purpose of raising a revenue in the province of New York which had been refused by the assembly there for the support of His Majesty's government; that this bill was prepared by Sir Edward Northey and Lord Raymond, who were not only able lawyers, but great supporters and defenders of the rights of the subjects. That in 1716 a bill was introduced into Parliament by the great Secretary Stanhope for resuming the powers granted in the colony charters; and that in this, and other similar cases, the power of Parliament to revoke these charters, or resume the powers therein granted, was not questioned. If Parliament, they said, could take away the charters themselves under which the colonists claimed the exclusive right of laying taxes it must have the power of taxation itself. As to representation, they said, whether actual or virtual, it was by no means the sole and ancient basis of the supreme power and authority of Parliament; the clergy, it was true, for a time taxed themselves, but not because they were unrepresented in Parliament. Gentlemen conversant with the true ancient history of Great Britain could not be ignorant, they said, of the former extensive power of the church in this kingdom; that among other exertions of this power the Pope, at the instance of the clergy, issued his mandate exempting their lands from taxation, because appropriated to the maintenance of holy church; but, not having exempted their chattels, Parliament afterward was about to tax these, when a compact was made between the Crown and the Pope (to whom the clergy had again complained) that the bill should be rescinded, and the clergy yield a contribution to government, provided it should be made by themselves separately. This, they said, was the foundation of the clergy's subsidizing their lands and property, separate and apart, an undoubted infraction of the constitution; and this power, in after and more enlightened days, was restored. The supreme power, they said, must be complete and entire in taxation as well as legislation; that indulgence had been given to some subordinate districts and governments to raise money by way of taxation for local purposes; yet that indulgence could not abridge the supreme legislature of any of its powers and authority. Upon this principle, they stated, the Parliament of Great Britain alone could, and actually did (Ireland having that indulgence granted), absolve the people of Ireland from duties due to the Crown imposed by acts passed in their own Parliament; on the same principle the Commons of England directed that the charge of the army, kept up for the security and defence of the kingdom, should be provided for by the people of Ireland; leaving such provision to be made by the Irish Parliament; which, if not complied with, would have been enforced by a law of Great Britain, and this was so understood at the time in both kingdoms. That all the ancient subsidy acts declared that the subsidies laid and imposed were to be paid by his Majesty's subjects within the realm and in all the King's domains; though particular parts and places were sometimes expressly excepted, as Wales constantly before the statute of Henry VIII, Ireland, the counties Palatine, upon whom the charge of defending the northern frontier was imposed by their charter, Calais, Guienne, Gascony, and particular corporations, for certain reasons; and that if those places had not been excepted they must have paid the subsidy, though not represented in Parliament. The strength of the empire in America itself, they also declared, depended on an exact and entire obedience to the supreme authority in Great Britain; that if this authority should be infringed in any instance confusion must inevitably follow; that cases might, and undoubtedly would, happen to puzzle the ablest lawyers, to distinguish the difference between duties and taxation, between the right of laying the one or the other; that this was settled and es-have a right to consider the Stamp Act as a grievance which should be removed. The justice of the claim upon the colonies for contribution, it was said, could not be denied; but the mode in which this contribution should be made was a distinct thing. That with respect to taxes Great Britain and the colonies might have opposing interests; and there was a possibility that the burdens of the one might be relieved at the expense and oppression of the other—that the circumstances and abilities of the colonists could never be so justly and truly known to the Commons of England as to their own Assemblies—there they can enjoy the exercise of that fundamental right of British subjects, to have some one to speak for them when their property is called for by way of taxes, and to represent their condition and abilities. This in Parliament is impracticable, and they are, thereby, deprived of a most important privilege. The supreme power, wherever lodged, must always be controlled by reason, by the principles of justice and humanity—the distance and situation of the colonists, however, were such that the greatest caution could not exempt them from oppression. A lenient, humane, and magnanimous conduct, it was said, did more to secure and preserve to Rome her distant colonies than all the legions she was ever mistress of, or could at any time command. Should the House, after all, be of opinion that Parliament possessed this summum jus, it should be remembered, they said, that summa injuria was its well-known offspring.

The opponents of the motion of Col. Barré rejoiced that the debate was now confined to the single question of power and right in Parliament to pass the law, so loudly complained of, without intermingling in the debate the expediency of its repeal; which would be a proper subject for consideration another day. In opposition to the motion it was observed that the establishment of the colonies was originally by license from the Crown—that, on account of the distance of the emigrants from the great executive power of the realm, the Crown granted them charters investing them with powers of government necessary for their protection, defence, and for the support of civil authority among them—that these powers were of the same nature with those granted to the East India company and to the great cities and corporations in England; each having power to raise money for their support, but neither, by any grant the King could make, could be exempted from the supreme authority of King, Lords, and Commons—that the Crown was but a part of the supreme power of the realm, and could not grant that which belonged to the supreme legislative power, which extended dom; that among other exertions of this power the Pope, at the instance of the clergy, issued his mandate exempting their lands from taxation, because appropriated to the maintenance of holy church; but, not having exempted their chattels, Parliament afterward was about to tax these, when a compact was made between the Crown and the Pope (to whom the clergy had again complained) that the bill should be rescinded, and the clergy yield a contribution to government, provided it should be made by themselves separately. The supreme power, they said, must be complete and entire in taxation as well as legislation; that indulgence had been given to some subordinate districts and governments to raise money by way of taxation for local purposes; yet that indulgence could not abridge the supreme legislature of any of its powers and authority. Upon this principle, they stated, the Parliament of Great Britain alone could, and actually did (Ireland having that indulgence granted), absolve the people of Ireland from duties due to the Crown imposed by acts passed in their own Parliament; on the same principle the Commons of England directed that the charge of the army, kept up for the security and defence of the kingdom, should be provided for by the people of Ireland; leaving such provision to be made by the Irish Parliament; which, if not complied with, would have been enforced by a law of Great Britain, and this was so understood at the time in both kingdoms. The strength of the empire in America itself, they also declared, depended on an exact and entire obedience to the supreme authority in Great Britain; that if this authority should be infringed in any instance confusion must inevitably follow; that cases might, and undoubtedly would, happen to puzzle the ablest lawyers, to distinguish the difference between duties and taxation, between the right of laying the one or the other; that this was settled and es-established to be one entire power lodged in the commons of England in the time of William III, between the House of Lords and Commons when the Lords were disposed to establish a difference between duties and impositions on merchandize, and the grant of taxes and subsidies, with a view to confirm the power of the Commons to the latter only; but the Commons, from the long and uniform usage of Parliament, claimed this power entire and in its full extent. It was for the welfare and happiness of the whole, as well as for the dignity and honor of Parliament, it was also said, that the power now questioned by the colonists should be supported with firmness and resolution. It was not a little extraordinary that it should be now disputed by the Americans. At so late as the year 1755 a general complaint was transmitted to Great Britain against the assembly of Pennsylvania for not making the necessary provision for the defence and protection of that colony; and, but for particular circumstances, Parliament would then have interfered. That in consequence of some provincial differences Maryland, as was said, did not contribute her proportion toward the general expense of the late war, and that the other colonies had contemplated sending a representation against that colony, praying the interposition of Parliament. The Americans must then have had different views of the power which they now deny. That government is founded in trust, and that this trust, wherever placed, was absolute and entire; that the kingdom and colonies composed one great political body; and, though the jealous language of liberty could not but be admired by all who loved the constitution, yet when that jealousy was carried so far as to tell the sovereign power we will not trust you unless you give up that power, it became alarming, and called for the exertion of wisdom and spirit. Ask France, they said, what occasion for your destruction she would wish; she will answer, divisions between you and your colonies; she would desire the diminution of your authority over the colonies as one of the surest means of accomplishing the great object of her ambition. To preserve this sovereignty entire is then so essentially necessary for the advantage and happiness of both America and Great Britain that, if once abridged, or the entire dependency of the colonies given up, your power and authority as a great and respected kingdom and empire are gone; no friend will trust you, no enemy will fear you.

This debate was considered so important and was of such absorbing interest that it did not end until four in the morning, when the motion of Col. Barré was nega-amend"; this was negatived, 275 to 167, and decided the fate of the resolution. In this, as well as in the preceding debates on American affairs, Mr. Grenville and his adherents were opposed to the claims of the colonists, and strongly urged the execution of the Stamp Act at every hazard. Mr. Pitt, afterward Lord Chatham, and Col. Barré were the chief opponents of Mr. Grenville.

From the collection in the New York Public Library

The bill repealing the Stamp Act was passed by the Commons, together with the declaration of the right of Parliament to tax America, and on March 5, 1766, both bills were sent to the House of Lords.

The declaration of the Supremacy of Parliament had already been debated in the House of Lords. On February 3 a motion was made declaring the right of Great Britain to tax America. In the debate which followed the American cause was supported by the powerful talents of Charles Pratt, Lord Camden. As a consequence of this generous advocacy the noble lord became very popular in the colonies, many towns and counties being named in his honor.

tived by a very large majority, few voices answering in the affirmative.¹

EXAMINATION OF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

The resolutions of General Conway were reported to the House on the 10th of February and agreed to; and the next day an inquiry began on the subject of repealing the law complained of. This inquiry and examination continued until the 18th of the same month. Dr. Benjamin Franklin among others was called before the House, and underwent a long examination. No person was better acquainted with the circumstances and internal concerns of the colonies, the temper and disposition of the colonists toward the parent country, or their feelings in relation to the late measures of Parliament. His answers to the numerous questions put to him in the course of this inquiry not only show his extensive acquaintance with the internal state of the colonies, but evince his sagacity as a statesman. To the question whether the Americans would submit to pay the stamp duty if the act were modified and the duty reduced to a small amount, he answered, "No, they never will submit to it." British statesmen were extremely desirous that the colonial assemblies should acknowledge the right of Parliament to tax them, and rescind and erase from their journals their resolutions on this subject. To a question, whether the American assemblies would do this, Dr. Franklin answered, "They never will do it, unless compelled by force of arms."

THE COMMONS REPEAL THE STAMP ACT

Soon after this examination was finished, Gen. Conway proposed a resolution to repeal the act imposing stamp duties in America. This produced another debate, and the same arguments were renewed. The sense of the house was first taken on a motion to strike out the word "repeal" and insert "explain and

PARLIAMENT MAY NOT CONTRAVENE NATURAL RIGHTS

LORD CAMDEN

The noble lord denied the right of Parliament to tax America, because unrepresented, saying:

My position is this—I repeat it—I will maintain to the last hour taxation and representation are inseparably connected. God has joined them, no British Parliament can separate them; to endeavor to do so is to stab our vitals. This position is founded in the law of nature. It is more, it is in itself an eternal law of nature. For whatever is a man's own is absolutely his own. No man has a right to take it from him without his consent either expressed by himself or his representative. Whoever attempts to do this attempts an injury. Whoever does it commits a robbery.

Therefore, my Lords, in my opinion the Legislature have no right to make this law. The sovereign authority, the omnipotence of the Legislature, is a favorite doctrine; but there are some things which you cannot do. You cannot take away a man's property without making him a compensation. You have no right to condemn a man by bill of attainder without hearing him. But, though Parliament cannot take away a man's property, yet every subject must make contributions, and this he consents to do by his representative. Notwithstanding the King, Lords, and Commons could in ancient times tax other people, they could not tax the clergy.

Lord Camden then repeated Pitt's argument relative to Wales and other regions of the greater island that had not been taxed when unrepresented in Parliament, and added to these the case of Ireland, of which the same was true.

He was replied to by William Murray, Lord Mansfield, whose speech is by far the ablest presentation of the affirmative side of the supremacy of Parliament. It was really directed against Pitt, though formally against Camden, whose arguments were largely repetitions of Pitt's.

NECESSITY OF A SUPREME LEGISLATURE

LORD MANSFIELD

My LORDS—I shall speak to the question strictly as a matter of right; for it is a proposition in its nature so perfectly distinct from the expediency of the tax, that it must necessarily be taken separate, if there is any true logic in the world; but of the expediency or in expediency I will say nothing. It will be time enough to speak upon that subject when it comes to be a question.

I shall also speak to the distinctions which have been taken, without any real difference, as to the nature of the tax; and I shall point out, lastly, the necessity there will be of exerting the force of the superior authority of government, if opposed by the subordinate part of it.

I am extremely sorry that the question has ever become necessary to be agitated, and that there should be a decision upon it. No one in this House will live long enough to see an end put to the mischief which will be the result of the doctrine which has been inculcated; but the arrow is shot and the wound already given. I shall certainly avoid personal reflections. No one has had more cast upon him than myself; but I never was biased by any consideration of applause from without, in the discharge of my public duty; and, in giving my sentiments according to what I thought law, I have relied upon my own consciousness. It is with great pleasure I have heard the noble Lord who moved the resolution express himself in so manly and sensible a way when he recommended a dispassionate debate, while, at the same time, he urged the necessity of the House coming to such a resolution, with great dignity and propriety of argument.

I shall endeavor to clear away from the question all that mass of dissertation and learning displayed in arguments which have been fetched from speculative men who have written upon the subject of government, or from ancient records, as being little to the purpose. I shall insist that these records are no proofs of our present constitution. A noble Lord has taken up his argument from the settlement of the constitution at the Revolution [of 1688]; I shall take up my argument from the constitution as it now is. The constitution of this country has been always in a moving state, either gaining or losing something, and with respect to the modes of taxation, when we get beyond the reign of Edward I, or of King John, we are all in doubt and obscurity. The history of those times is full of uncertainties.

sons placed in the principal towns of the conquered provinces. The states of Holland were not colonies of Spain; they were states dependent upon the house of Austria in a feudal dependence. Nothing could be more different from our colonies than that flock of men, as they have been called, who came from the North and poured into Europe. Those emigrants renounced all laws, all protection, all connection with their mother countries. They chose their leaders, and marched under their banners to seek their fortunes and establish new kingdoms upon the ruins of the Roman empire.

But our colonies, on the contrary, emigrated under the sanction of the Crown and Parliament. They were modeled gradually into their present forms, respectively, by charters, grants, and statutes; but they were never separated from the mother country, or so emancipated as to become sui juris. There are several sorts of colonies in British America. The charter colonies, the proprietary governments, and the King's colonies. The first colonies were the charter colonies, such as the Virginia Company; and these companies had among their directors members of the privy council and of both houses of Parliament; they were under the authority of the privy council, and had agents resident here, responsible for their proceedings. So much were they considered as belonging to the Crown, and not to the King personally (for there is a great difference, though few people attend to it), that when the two houses, in the time of Charles the First, were going to pass a bill concerning the colonies, a message was sent to them by the King that they were the King's colonies, and that the bill was unnecessary, for that the privy council would take order about them; and the bill never had the royal assent. The Commonwealth Parliament, as soon as it was settled, were very early jealous of the colonies separating themselves from them; and passed a resolution or act (and it is a question whether it is not in force now) to declare and establish the authority of England over its colonies.

But if there was no express law, or reason founded upon any necessary inference from an express law, yet the usage alone would be sufficient to support that authority; for have not the colonies submitted ever since their first establishment to the jurisdiction of the mother country? In all questions of property the appeals from the colonies have been to the privy council here; and such causes have been determined, not by the law of the colonies, but by the law of England. A very little while ago there was an appeal on a question of limitation in a devise of land with remainders; and, notwithstanding the intention of the

In regard to the writs upon record they were issued some of them according to law, and some not according to law; and such [i. e., of the latter kind] were those concerning ship-money, to call assemblies to tax themselves, or to compel benevolences. Other taxes were raised from escuage, fees for knights' service, and by other means arising out of the feudal system. Benevolences are contrary to law; and it is well known how people resisted the demands of the Crown in the case of ship-money, and were persecuted by the Court; and if any set of men were to meet now to lend the King money it would be contrary to law, and a breach of the rights of Parliament.

I shall now answer the noble Lord particularly upon the cases he has quoted. With respect to the Marches of Wales, who were the borderers, privileged for assisting the King in his war against the Welsh in the mountains, their enjoying this privilege of taxing themselves was but of a short duration, and during the life of Edward the First, till the Prince of Wales came to be the King; and then they were annexed to the Crown, and became subject to taxes like the rest of the dominions of England; and from thence came the custom, though unnecessary, of naming Wales and the town of Monmouth in all proclamations and in acts of Parliament. Henry the Eighth was the first who issued writs for it to return two members to Parliament. The Crown exercised this right ad libitum, from whence arises the inequality of representation in our Constitution at this day. Henry VIII. issued a writ to Calais to send one Burgess to Parliament. One of the counties palatine [I think he said Durham] was taxed fifty years to subsidies before it sent members to Parliament. The clergy were at no time unrepresented in Parliament. When they taxed themselves it was done with the concurrence and consent of Parliament, who permitted them to tax themselves upon their petition, the Convocation sitting at the same time with the Parliament. They had, too, their representatives always sitting in this House, bishops and abbots; and, in the other House, they were at no time without a right of voting singly for the election of members; so that the argument fetched from the case of the clergy is not an argument of any force, because they were at no time unrepresented here.

The reasoning about the colonies of Great Britain, drawn from the colonies of antiquity, is a mere useless display of learning; for the colonies of the Tyrians in Africa, and of the Greeks in Asia, were totally different from our system. No nation before ourselves formed any regular system of colonization but the Romans; and their system was a military one, and of garri-testator appeared very clear, yet the case was determined contrary to it, and that the land should pass according to the law of England. A very little while ago there was an appeal on a question of limitation in a devise of land with remainders; and, notwithstanding the intention of the testator appeared very clear, yet the case was determined contrary to it, and that the land should pass according to the law of England. The colonies have been obliged to recur very frequently to the jurisdiction here, to settle the disputes among their own governments. I well remember several references on this head, when the late Lord Hardwicke was attorney general, and Sir Clement Wearg solicitor general. New Hampshire and Connecticut were in blood about their differences; Virginia and Maryland were in arms against each other. This shows the necessity of one superior decisive jurisdiction, to which all subordinate jurisdictions may recur. Nothing, my Lords, could be more fatal to the peace of the colonies at any time than the Parliament giving up its authority over them; for in such a case there must be an entire dissolution of government. Considering how the colonies are composed, it is easy to foresee there would be no end of feuds and factions among the several separate governments, when once there shall be no one government here or there of sufficient force or authority to decide their mutual differences; and, government being dissolved, nothing remains but that the colonies must either change their Constitution, and take some new form of government, or fall under some foreign power. At present the several forms of their Constitution are very various, having been produced, as all governments have been originally, by accident and circumstances. The forms of government in every colony were adopted, from time to time, according to the size of the colony; and so have been extended again, from time to time, as the numbers of their inhabitants and their commercial connections outgrew the first model. In some colonies at first there was only a governor assisted by two or three counsel; then more were added; afterward courts of justice were erected; then assemblies were created. Some things were done by instructions from the secretaries of state; other things were done by order of the King and council; and other things by commissions under the great seal. It is observable that in consequence of these establishments from time to time, and of the dependency of these governments upon the supreme Legislature at home, the lenity of each government in the colonies has been extreme toward the subject; and a great inducement has been created for people to come and settle in them. But, if all those governments which are now independent of each other should become independent of the mother country, I am afraid that the inhabitants of the colonies are very little aware of the consequences. They would feel in that case very soon the hand of power more heavy upon them in their own governments than they have yet done, or have ever imagined.

The constitutions of the different colonies are thus made up of different principles. They must remain dependent, from the necessity of things, and their relations to the jurisdiction of the mother country; or they must be totally dismembered from it, and form a league of union among themselves against it, which could not be effected without great violence. No one ever thought the contrary till the trumpet of sedition was blown. Acts of Parliament have been made, not only without a doubt of their legality, but with universal applause, the great object of which has been ultimately to fix the trade of the colonies, so as to center in the bosom of that country from whence they took their original. The Navigation Act shut up their intercourse with foreign countries. Their ports have been made subject to customs and regulations which have cramped and diminished their trade. And duties have been laid, affecting the very inmost parts of their commerce, and, among others, that of the post; yet all these have been submitted to peaceably, and no one ever thought till now of this doctrine, that the colonies are not to be taxed, regulated, or bound by Parliament. A few particular merchants were then, as now, displeased at restrictions which did not permit them to make the greatest possible advantages of their commerce in their own private and peculiar branches. But, though these few merchants might think themselves losers in articles which they had no right to gain, as being prejudicial to the general and national system, yet I must observe that the colonies, upon the whole, were benefited by these laws. For these restrictive laws, founded upon principles of the most solid policy, flung a great weight of naval force into the hands of the mother country, which was to protect its colonies. Without a union with her the colonies must have been entirely weak and defenceless, but they thus became relatively great, subordinately, and in proportion as the mother country advanced in superiority over the rest of the maritime powers in Europe, to which both mutually contributed, and of which both have reaped a benefit, equal to the natural and just relation in which they both stand reciprocally, of dependency on one side and protection on the other.

With respect to what has been said or written upon this subject I differ from the noble Lord, who spoke of Mr. Otis and his book¹ with contempt, though he maintained the same doctrine in some points, while in others he carried it farther than Otis himself, who allows everywhere the supremacy of the Crown over the colonies. No man, on such a subject, is contemptible. Otis is a man of consequence among the people there. They have chosen him for one of their deputies at the Congress and general meeting from the respective governments. It was said the man is mad. What then? One madman often makes many. Masaniello² was mad. Nobody doubts it; yet, for all that, he overturned the government of Naples. Madness is catching in all popular assemblies and upon all popular matters. The book is full of wildness. I never read it till a few days ago, for I seldom look into such things. I never was actually acquainted with the contents of the Stamp Act till I sent for it on purpose to read it before the debate was expected. With respect to authorities in another House, I know nothing of them. I believe that I have not been in that House more than once since I had the honor to be called up to this; and, if I did know any thing that passed in the other House, I could not and would not mention it as an authority here. I ought not to mention any such authority. I should think it beneath my own and your Lordship's dignity to speak of it.

I am far from bearing any ill will to the Americans; they are a very good people, and I have long known them. I began life with them, and owe much to them, having been much concerned in the plantation causes before the privy council; and so I became a good deal acquainted with American affairs and people. I dare say their heat will soon be over, when they come to feel a little the consequences of their opposition to the Legislature. Anarchy always cures itself; but the ferment will continue so much the longer, while hot-headed men there find that there are persons of weight and character to support and justify them here.

Indeed, if the disturbances should continue for a great length of time force must be the consequence, an application adequate to the mischief, and arising out of the necessity of the case; for

There can be no doubt, my Lords, but that the inhabitants of the colonies are as much represented in Parliament as the greatest part of the people of England are represented; among nine millions of whom there are eight which have no votes in electing members of Parliament. Every objection, therefore, to the dependency of the colonies upon Parliament, which arises to it upon the ground of representation, goes to the whole present Constitution of Great Britain; and I suppose it is not meant to new-model that, too. People may form speculative ideas of perfection, and indulge their own fancies or those of other men. Every man in this country has his particular notion of liberty; but perfection never did, and never can, exist in any human institution. To what purpose, then, are arguments drawn from a distinction—in which there is no real difference—of a virtual and actual representation? A member of Parliament, chosen for any borough, represents not only the constituents and inhabitants of that particular place, but he represents the inhabitants of every other borough in Great Britain. He represents the city of London, and all the other commons of this land, and the inhabitants of all the colonies and dominions of Great Britain; and is, in duty and conscience, bound to take care of their interests.

I have mentioned the customs and the post tax. This leads me to answer another distinction, as false as the above; the distinction of internal and external taxes. The noble Lord who quoted so much law, and denied upon those grounds the right of the Parliament of Great Britain to lay internal taxes upon the colonies, allowed at the same time that restrictions upon trade, and duties upon the ports, were legal. But I cannot see a real difference in this distinction; for I hold it to be true that a tax laid in any place is like a pebble falling into and making a circle in a lake, till one circle produces and gives motion to another, and the whole circumference is agitated from the center. For nothing can be more clear than that a tax of ten or twenty per cent. laid upon tobacco, either in the ports of Virginia or London, is a duty laid upon the inland plantations of Virginia, a hundred miles from the sea, wheresoever the tobacco grows.

I do not deny but that a tax may be laid injudiciously and injuriously, and that people in such a case may have a right to complain. But the nature of the tax is not now the question; whenever it comes to be one I am for lenity. I would have no blood drawn. There is, I am satisfied, no occasion for any to be drawn. A little time and experience of the inconveniences and miseries of anarchy may bring people to their senses.

force is only the difference between a superior and subordinate jurisdiction. In the former the whole force of the Legislature resides collectively, and when it ceases to reside the whole connection is dissolved. It will, indeed, be to very little purpose that we sit here enacting laws, and making resolutions, if the inferior will not obey them, or if we neither can nor dare enforce them; for then, and then, I say, of necessity, the matter comes to the sword. If the offspring are grown too big and too resolute to obey the parent you must try which is the strongest, and exert all the powers of the mother country to decide the contest.

I am satisfied, notwithstanding, that time and a wise and steady conduct may prevent those extremities which would be fatal to both. I remember well when it was the violent humor of the times to decri standing armies and garrisons as dangerous and incompatible with the liberty of the subject. Nothing would do but a regular militia. The militia are embodied; they march; and no sooner was the militia law thus put into execution, but it was then said to be an intolerable burden upon the subject, and that it would fall, sooner or later, into the hands of the Crown. That was the language, and many counties petitioned against it. This may be the case with the colonies. In many places they begin already to feel the effects of their resistance to government. Interest very soon divides mercantile people; and, although there may be some mad, enthusiastic, or ill-designing people in the colonies, yet I am convinced that the greatest bulk, who have understanding and property, are still well affected to the mother country. You have, my Lords, many friends still in the colonies; and take care that you do not, by abdicating your own authority, desert them and yourselves, and lose them forever.

In all popular tumults the worst men bear the sway at first. Moderate and good men are often silent for fear or modesty, who, in good time, may declare themselves. Those who have any property to lose are sufficiently alarmed already at the progress of these public violence and violations, to which every man's dwelling, person, and property are hourly exposed. Numbers of such valuable men and good subjects are ready and willing to declare themselves for the support of government in due time, if government does not fling away its own authority.

My Lords, the Parliament of Great Britain has its rights over the colonies; but it may abdicate its rights.

There was a thing which I forgot to mention. I mean, the manuscript quoted by the noble Lord. He tells you that it is there said that, if the act concerning Ireland had passed, the Parliament might have abdicated its rights as to Ireland. In the first place, I heartily wish, my Lords, that Ireland had not been named, at a time when that country is of a temper and in a situation so difficult to be governed; and when we have already here so much weight upon our hands, encumbered with the extensiveness, variety, and importance of so many objects in a vast and too busy empire, and the national system shattered and exhausted by a long, bloody, and expensive war, but more so by our divisions at home, and a fluctuation of counsels. I wish Ireland, therefore, had never been named.

I pay as much respect as any man to the memory of Lord Chief Justice Hale; but I did not know that he had ever written upon the subject; and I differ very much from thinking, with the noble Lord, that this manuscript ought to be published. So far am I from it that I wish the manuscript had never been named; for Ireland is too tender a subject to be touched. The case of Ireland is as different as possible from that of our colonies. Ireland was a conquered country; it had its pacta conventa and its regalia. But to what purpose is it to mention the manuscript? It is but the opinion of one man. When it was written, or for what particular object it was written, does not appear. It might possibly be only a work of youth, or an exercise of the understanding, in sounding and trying a question problematically. All people, when they first enter professions, make their collections pretty early in life; and the manuscript may be of that sort. However, be it what it may, the opinion is but problematical; for the act to which the writer refers never passed, and Lord Hale only said that if it had passed the Parliament might have abdicated their right.

But, my Lords, I shall make this application of it. You may abdicate your right over the colonies. Take care, my Lords, how you do so, for such an act will be irrevocable. Proceed, then, my Lords, with spirit and firmness; and, when you shall have established your authority, it will then be a time to show your lenity. The Americans, as I said before, are a very good people, and I wish them exceedingly well; but they are heated and inflamed. The noble Lord who spoke before ended with a prayer. I cannot end better than by saying to it Amen; and in the words of Maurice, Prince of Orange, concerning the Hollanders: "God bless this industrious, frugal, and well-meaning, but easily deluded people." to superintend the execution of all the laws of Parliament relating to American trade.

The Stamp Act was repealed, and the Declaratory Act was passed, each by a large majority.

These acts created a great stir in the colonies. John Dickinson of Pennsylvania wrote in a homely style, calculated to appeal to the common people, "Letters of a Pennsylvania Farmer," which presented the unconstitutionality as well as the injustice of the acts. They were universally read in America, and, translated into French, they greatly inclined the people of France toward the American cause.

Josiah Quincy, Jr., a young Boston lawyer, published in the Boston Gazette a series of extremely able articles against the "Townshend Acts," under the pen-name of "Hyperion."

The most eloquent of these articles was Quincy's "Appeal," which appeared in the Boston Gazette of October 3, 1768.

APPEAL TO AMERICANS

JOSIAH QUINCY, JR.

If ever there was a time, this is the hour for Americans to rouse themselves and exert every ability. Their all is at a hazard, and the die of fate spins doubtful! In vain do we talk of magnanimity and heroism; in vain do we trace a descent from the worthies of the earth, if we inherit not the spirit of our ancestors. Who is he who boasteth of his patriotism? Has he vanquished luxury, and subdued the worldly pride of his heart? Is he not yet drinking the poisonous draught and rolling the sweet morsel under his tongue? He who cannot conquer the little vanity of his heart, and deny the delicacy of a debauched palate, let him lay his hand upon his mouth, and his mouth in the dust.

Now is the time for this people to summon every aid, human and divine; to exhibit every moral virtue, and call forth every Christian grace. The wisdom of the serpent, the innocence of the dove, and the intrepidity of the lion, with the blessing of God, will yet save us from the jaws of destruction.

Where is the boasted liberty of Englishmen, if property may be disposed of, charters suspended, assemblies dissolved, and every valued right annihilated, at the uncontrollable will of an external power? Does not every man who feels one ethereal

IN July, 1766, a new administration was formed in the British Government under the direction of William Pitt, who was made Earl of Chatham. Composed of men of different political parties, the Tory element was strong enough to revive the subject of taxing America. In May, 1767, Charles Townshend, chancellor of the exchequer, under the instigation of Ex-Minister George Grenville, submitted to the House of Commons a bill imposing duties on glass, paper, painters' materials, and tea, imported into the colonies, its preamble declaring that the impost was to defray the expenses of defending these provinces. Owing probably to Lord Chatham's absence from sickness, the bill passed both Houses without much opposition in June. Royal commissioners were appointed for the colonies spark yet glowing in his bosom find his indignation kindle at the bare imagination of such wrongs? What would be our sentiments were this imagination realized?

Did the blood of the ancient Britons swell our veins, did the spirit of our forefathers inhabit our breasts, should we hesitate a moment in preferring death to a miserable existence in bondage? Did we reflect on their toils, their dangers, their fiery trials, the thought would inspire unconquerable courage.

Who has the front to ask, "wherefore do you complain"? Who dares assert everything worth living for is not lost when a nation is enslaved? Are not pensioners, stipendiaries, and salary men (unknown before) hourly multiplying on us, to riot in the spoils of miserable America? Does not every eastern gale waft us some new insect, even of that devouring kind which eat up every green thing? Is not the bread taken out of the children's mouths, and given unto the dogs? Are not our estates given to corrupt sycophants, without a design, or even a pretence, of soliciting our assent, and our lives put into the hands of those whose tender mercies are cruelties? Has not an authority in a distant land, in the most public manner, proclaimed a right of disposing of the all of Americans? In short, what have we to lose—what have we to fear? Are not our distresses more than we can bear; and, to finish all, are not our cities, in a time of profound peace, filled with standing armies, to preclude us from that last solace of the wretched—to open their mouths in complaint, and send forth their cries in bitterness of heart?

But is there no ray of hope? Is not Great Britain inhabited by the children of those renowned barons who waded through seas of crimson gore to establish their liberty; and will they not allow us, their fellow-men, to enjoy that freedom which we claim from nature, which is confirmed by our constitution, and which they pretend so highly to value? Were a tyrant to conquer us, the chains of slavery, when opposition should become useless, might be supportable; but to be shackled by Englishmen—by our equals—is not to be borne!

By the sweat of our brow we earn the little we possess: from nature we derive the common rights of man—and by charter we claim the liberties of Britons! Shall we, dare we, pusillanimously surrender our birthright? Is the obligation to our fathers discharged—is the debt we owe posterity paid? Answer me, thou coward, who hidest thyself in the hour of trial! If there is no reward in this life, no prize of glory in the next, capable of animating thy dastard soul; think and tremble, thou miscreant, at the whips and stripes thy master shall lash thee with on earth—and the flames and scorpions thy second master shall torment thee with hereafter!

Oh, my countrymen! what will our children say, when they read the history of these times, should they find we tamely gave away, without one noble struggle, the most invaluable of earthly blessings? As they drag the galling chain, will they not excrete us? If we have any respect for things sacred; any regard to the dearest treasure on earth—if we have one tender sentiment for posterity; if we would not be despised by the whole world—let us, in the most open, solemn manner, and with determined fortitude, swear we will die, if we cannot live freemen!

Be not lulled, my countrymen, with vain imaginations, or idle fancies. To hope for the protection of heaven, without doing our duty, and exerting ourselves as becomes men, is to mock the Deity. Wherefore had man his reason, if it were not to direct him? Wherefore his strength, if it be not his protection? To banish folly and luxury, correct vice and immorality, and stand immovable in the freedom in which we are free indeed is eminently the duty of each individual, at this day. When this is done we may rationally hope for an answer to our prayers; for the whole counsel of God, and the invincible armor of the Almighty.

However righteous our cause we cannot, in this period of the world, expect a miraculous salvation. Heaven will undoubtedly assist us, if we act like men; but to expect protection from above, while we are enervated by luxury, and slothful in the exertion of those abilities with which we are endued, is an expectation vain and foolish. With the smiles of Heaven, virtue, unanimity, and firmness will ensue success. While we have equity, justice, and God on our side, tyranny, spiritual or temporal, shall never ride triumphant in a land inhabited by Englishmen.

The Massachusetts House of Representatives in January, 1768, protested to the King and the Ministry against the new taxes, on the ground that the colonies were not represented in the Parliament which enacted them. They said:

The original contract between the King and the first planters here was a royal promise in behalf of the nation, and which, till very lately, was never questioned, but the King had the power to make, namely, that "if the adventurers would, at their own cost and expense, and at the hazard of their lives, and everything dear to them, purchase a new world, subdue a wilderness, and directing him at the next meeting of the General Assembly of that colony "to require of the House of Representatives, in His Majesty's name, to rescind the resolution which gave birth to the circular letter of the speaker, and to declare their disapprobation of, and dissent to, that rash and hasty proceeding." If the House refused compliance, he was directed immediately to dissolve the Assembly, and to transmit their proceedings to the King, that measures might be taken to prevent for the future "a conduct of so extraordinary and unconstitutional a nature."

A circular letter was, at the same time, addressed to the governors of the other colonies declaring this measure of the people of Massachusetts "to be of a most dangerous and factions tendency, calculated to enflame the minds of His Majesty's good subjects in the colonies, to promote an unwarrantable combination, and to excite and encourage an open opposition to, and denial of, the authority of Parliament, and to subvert the true principles of the constitution"; directing them, also, to exert their utmost influence, to defeat "this flagitious attempt to disturb the public peace," by prevailing upon the assemblies to take no notice of it, and thereby treat it with the contempt it deserved.

REPLIES OF THE COLONIES

The House of Representatives of Massachusetts in June, 1768, peremptorily refused to rescind the proceedings of the preceding Assembly, declaring their right as British subjects in a respectful manner to petition the King and Parliament for a redress of grievances, and to request the other colonies to unite with them for the same purpose. They also addressed a letter to Lord Hillsborough, giving him a detailed account of the transaction, and repelling the suggestion made by him that the same was a rash and flagitious attempt to disturb the public peace. The House viewed the letter of Lord Hillsborough as an unwarrantable attempt on their rights; and, in their answer to the communication of the Governor on this subject, expressed themselves with thereby enlarge the King's dominions, they and their posterity should enjoy such rights and privileges as in their charter are expressed; which are, in general, all the rights, liberties, and privileges of His Majesty's natural born subjects, within the realm."

The principal privileges implied, and in some of their charters expressed, is a freedom from all taxes but such as they shall consent to, in person, or by representatives of their own choice and election.

In reference to the appropriation of the new duties to the support of Crown officers and to the maintenance of troops in America the Assembly said:

Such a power under a corrupt administration, it is feared, would introduce an absolute government in America; at least, it would leave the people in a state of uncertainty of their security, which is far from being a state of civil liberty. The judges in the several colonies do not hold their commissions during good behavior. If, then, they are to have their salaries independent of the people, how easy it will be for a corrupt governor to have a set of judges to his mind, to deprive a bench of justice of its glory and the people of their security.

The House, during the same session, also addressed a circular letter to the colonies, stating the difficulties to be apprehended by the operation of the late acts of Parliament; and requesting their coöperation for redress.

The other colonies approved of the proceedings of Massachusetts, and joined in applying to the King for relief.

THE PETITIONERS REBUKED

The circular letter of Massachusetts created no little alarm in the British cabinet. They viewed it as an attempt to convene another congress, to concert measures in opposition to the authority of Parliament. Union and concert among the colonies was a peculiar object of dread with the ministers; and they were determined, if possible, to prevent every measure leading to it. A letter from Lord Hillsborough, Secretary of State, was therefore addressed to the Governor of Massachusetts, no little warmth. "If the votes of the House were to be controlled by the direction of a minister," said these bold inheritors of the spirit of Pym and Hampden, "we have left us but a shadow of liberty!"

On the question to rescind, James Otis said: "When Lord Hillsborough knows that we will not rescind our acts, let him apply to Parliament to rescind theirs. Let Britain rescind their measures, or they are lost forever."

The ministerial mandate to the other colonies was equally disregarded.

NON-IMPORTATION AGREEMENT

During the summer of this year (1768), the merchants of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York, and, later, of Pennsylvania and other colonies, again had recourse to a non-importation agreement, particularly with respect to the articles on which duties were imposed. This was done, not only to obtain a repeal of the late revenue act, but with a view of encouraging manufactures in the colonies.

ROYAL TROOPS IN THE COLONIES

From 1765, when soldiers had been quartered on some of the colonies by act of Parliament, the provincial assemblies concerned had made repeated protests against their presence, and on constitutional grounds had refused to vote money for their maintenance. This greatly angered the British Government, and in July, 1767, Parliament inhibited the Massachusetts Assembly, which had been particularly obstinate, from passing any act whatever until it had voted supplies to the royal troops.

On the rumor that new troops were coming to Boston to enforce the acts of Parliament, a convention representing 96 Massachusetts towns met in Boston on September 22, 1768, and protested to the King against such coercion. They denied that they were inspired by a desire for independence.

"We clearly hold that the sovereignty of His Sacred Majesty, King George the Third, is entire in all parts of the British empire: God forbid that we should ever act or wish anything in oppugnation of the same. We appear as plain honest men, humbly soliciting peace and order. We wish ever to promote and cultivate a harmony and union between Great Britain and the colonies."

On the 15th of December, 1768, the House of Lords passed a number of resolutions severely censuring the conduct of the people of Massachusetts, and declaring in particular that the proceedings of Boston in calling a convention were subversive of His Majesty's Government and manifested a design to set up a new and unconstitutional authority independent of the Crown of Great Britain; and that the meeting of the convention was a daring insult offered to His Majesty's authority, and an audacious usurpation of the powers of government.

These resolutions were, about the first of February, agreed to by the House of Commons; and a joint address was at the time presented to the King, requesting him to direct the Governor of Massachusetts to transmit to the British Government full information "touching all treasons" in the province, in order that the accused parties might be tried "within the realm," if His Majesty "saw sufficient ground for such a proceeding."

The King in answer to this address assured Parliament of his determination to give the necessary orders for bringing the authors of the unhappy disorders in Massachusetts to condign punishment.

Though these proceedings of Parliament pointed principally to Massachusetts, yet all the colonists considered themselves as deeply affected and were more firmly united than ever in opposition to this extraordinary claim of right to transport the colonists to England for trial for supposed offences committed in America.

The House of Burgesses in Virginia, early in May, 1769, declared that the sending of a colonist suspected of crime "beyond the seas to be tried is highly derogatory."

vindicated themselves and the colonists in general from aspersions cast upon them by Governor Bernard and others, but on the subject of the right of Parliament to impose taxes or duties upon them in any way expressed themselves in bold and determined language:

"Nothing short of a repeal of all the revenue acts, and putting things on the footing they were before the late innovations, can or will satisfy the minds of the people. Fleets and armies may overawe our towns, admiralty courts and boards of commissioners, with their swarms of underlings, may, by a vigorous execution of the same unconstitutional acts, ruin our commerce and render America of little use to the people of Britain; but while every farmer is a freeholder the spirit of liberty will prevail, and every attempt to divest them of their privileges of freedom must be attended with consequences injurious to the colonies and the mother country."

REPEAL OF ALL TAXES SAVE ON TEA

Parliament again met on the 9th of January, 1770, and soon after the Duke of Grafton, First Lord of the Treasury, resigned, and the celebrated Lord North was appointed in his room. Though the speech from the throne declared that combinations still existed to destroy the commercial connection between Great Britain and her colonies, and though America was not yet "prostrate at the feet of the Ministry," Lord North himself, on the 5th of March, 1770, introduced a bill taking off the duties imposed by the act of 1767 on all the articles except tea. This partial repeal, which took place on the 12th of April, though not satisfactory, served in some measure to tranquilize the minds of the Americans. The insignificant duty on tea was continued for the purpose of maintaining the supremacy of Parliament, and, like a peppercorn rent, was reserved to show the tenure by which the colonists held their rights. The House of Burgesses in Virginia in a petition to the King declared that a partial suspension of the duties would not remove their too well grounded fears and apprehensions while that on tea was retained "for the avowed purpose of establishing a precedent against them."

tory of the rights of British subjects, as thereby the inestimable privilege of trial by a jury from the vicinage, as well as the liberty of producing witnesses on such trial, will be taken away from the party accused."

The House of Burgesses also prepared a petition to the King on this subject, couched in strong and feeling language.

DUTIES REMOVED SAVE ON TEA

The British Ministry, becoming alarmed at the spirit of resistance in the colonies, had promised, in a circular letter to the colonial governors, that, as a matter of pure commercial policy, Parliament would remove all taxes save on tea (which was retained to maintain the right of Parliament to tax America). The various assemblies repudiated this as not being a concession of the principle for which they contended.

On October 4, 1769, the people of Boston, in a town meeting, published "An Appeal to the World," in which they not only vindicated themselves from the "false, scandalous and infamous libels" upon them, contained, as they said, in some of the letters of Governor Bernard and others laid before Parliament; but also declared "that the taking off the duties on paper, glass and colors, merely on commercial principles, would not be satisfactory; that it would not relieve trade from its burdens, much less remove the grounds of discontent which prevailed through the continent, upon higher principles."

"Their rights," they said, "are invaded by those acts; therefore until they are all repealed the cause of their just complaints cannot be removed. In short, the grievances which lie heavily upon us we shall never think redressed till every act passed by the British Parliament for the express purpose of raising a revenue upon us without our consent is repealed; till the American board of commissioners of the customs is dissolved, the troops recalled, and things are restored to the state they were in before the late extraordinary measures of administration took place."

The merchants of Philadelphia in November of this year, in a letter to the merchants of London, not only

THE BOSTON MASSACRE

As a result of the irritating presence of the royal troops in Boston a quarrel arose on March 5, 1770, between them and some of the citizens, in which eleven persons were either killed or wounded. Captain Preston and others of the soldiers were indicted for murder, but were acquitted largely owing to the eloquent defence made by their counsel, John Adams and Josiah Quincy, Jr. The anniversary of the event was observed annually for a number of years. The orations upon these occasions were wont to be inflammatory. Speeches by John Hancock and Dr. Joseph Warren were notably so.

THE BOSTON TEA-PARTY

The application by the colonists to the remaining tax, that on tea, caused the importation of the article into the colonies to cease, and the British Ministry began to devise means for forcing its introduction into America that the sovereignty of Parliament might be practically asserted.

In May, 1773, the Ministry procured an act of Parliament permitting the East India Company to export their teas to America, with a drawback of all the duties paid in England. By thus rendering the article cheaper in the colonies than in Great Britain it was supposed the Americans would be induced to pay the small duty upon it.

Concerning this act, a correspondence committee of Massachusetts, instituted for the purpose of fostering a common resistance among the colonies, wrote:

We cannot close without mentioning a fresh instance of the temper and design of the British ministry in allowing the East India Company, with a view of conciliating them, to ship their teas to America. It is easy to see how aptly this scheme will serve both to destroy the trade of the colonies and increase the revenue. How necessary, then, it is that each colony should take effectual methods to prevent this measure from having its designed effects.

In consequence of this act the company shipped large quantities of tea to different parts of the colonies, consigned to their particular friends or the friends of government, to be sold for their benefit. The shipments were principally made to Charleston, Philadelphia, New York and Boston. The colonists at once perceived that if the tea was permitted to be landed the duty must be paid, and that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to prevent its sale and consumption, and so they resolved that the tea should not be landed. On its arrival at Charleston it was indeed landed and put into stores, but the consignees were not permitted to offer it for sale. Such was the determined opposition at Philadelphia and New York that the consignees at these places declined taking charge of it, and the vessels with the tea on board returned to Great Britain without an entry at the custom house. The citizens of Boston held several town meetings at which they passed resolutions declaring that the tea should not be landed, or the duty paid, but be returned in the same vessels in which it came without an entry; they also declared they would support these resolutions at the risk of life and property, and they directed the captains of the vessels not to land the tea, but to apply for clearances without an entry of the vessels or cargoes. The collector, however, refused such applications, and the governor gave orders to Admiral Montague, then in the harbor of Boston, to guard all the passes out, and also directed the com-those measures which must bring on the most trying and terrible struggle this country ever saw.

I see the clouds which now rise thick and fast on the horizon; the thunders roll, and the lightnings play, and to that God who rides on the whirlwind and directs the storm I commit my country.

When it was announced that the governor refused the passport Samuel Adams said, "This meeting can do nothing more to save the country." A war-whoop sounded from the gallery; the meeting was dissolved. Some one remarked, "Who knows how tea will mingle with salt-water!" and immediately after two or three different parties of men, previously selected, no doubt, some of them dressed in the habit of Indians, ran toward the wharves shouting, "To Griffin's wharf! Boston harbor a teapot to-night!" There the people repaired, and in three hours the tea was emptied from its 342 chests into the waters of the ocean in the presence of thousands of spectators. This being done, the people returned quietly to their dwellings. The next day Boston rang its bells, fired guns, and beat drums in celebration of the event. Samuel Adams said, "Oh, this is the most magnificent movement of all!" Lesser celebrations occurred in New York and Philadelphia and even in the Southern cities.

On the 7th of March, 1774, the papers relating to these transactions in America were laid before Parliament by the King. In his message to the two houses His Majesty said that he confided not only in their taking such measures as would "put an immediate stop to the present disorders," but also in their considering "what further provisions may be necessary to be established for securing the execution of the laws, and the just dependence of the colonies upon the Crown and Parliament of Great Britain."

THE BOSTON PORT BILL

Both houses in their answers assured His Majesty of their determination to make such provision as should secure the just dependence of the colonies and due mander of the Castle to suffer no vessel except coasters to pass without a permit signed by himself. In the meantime the people of Boston for many nights kept watch at the wharves to prevent the landing of the tea. In this situation the leaders came to the bold resolution of destroying the tea itself.

On December 16 many thousands of the inhabitants of Boston and its vicinity met in the Old South Meeting-house and confirmed their former resolutions against the landing of the tea. During this meeting the captain of one of the vessels was sent, for the last time, to the governor, then at his seat at Milton, to request a passport.

The patriotic leaders, fully aware of the momentous consequences of the refusal of the Governor, had already anticipated them. During the absence of the messenger, and while the people assembled on the occasion were waiting his return with extreme solicitude, Josiah Quincy, Jr., addressed them.

Mr. Quincy began his speech by reminding his hearers of the consequences of the act which they were about to perform.

LET US LOOK TO THE END

JOSIAH QUINCY, JR.

It is not the spirit that vapors within these walls that must stand us in stead. The exertions of this day will call forth events which will make a very different spirit necessary for our salvation. Look to the end. Whoever supposes that shouts and hosannas will terminate the trials of the day entertains a childish fancy. We must be grossly ignorant of the importance and value of the prize for which we contend; we must be equally ignorant of the powers of those who have combined against us; we must be blind to that malice, inveteracy, and insatiable revenge which actuate our enemies, public and private, abroad and in our bosoms, to hope we shall end this controversy without the sharpest conflicts; to flatter ourselves that popular resolves, popular harangues, popular acclamations, and popular vapor will vanquish our fears. Let us consider the issue. Let us look to the end. Let us weigh and consider before we advance to obedience to the laws throughout all his dominions. On the 31st of March a bill which had passed both houses interdicting all commercial intercourse with the town of Boston, and, after the first of June following, prohibiting the landing or shipping any goods at that port, received the sanction of the King.

REGULATION OF MASSACHUSETTS GOVERNMENT

Soon after the passage of the "Boston Port Bill," as it was called, the Ministry presented a bill "for the better regulating the government of the province of Massachusetts Bay." This bill passed both houses by large majorities, and on the 20th of May became a law by the assent of the King.

By this act the people of Massachusetts were, without a hearing, deprived of some of the most important rights and privileges secured to them by their charter; rights which they had enjoyed from the first settlement of the colony.

The members of the council, heretofore under the charter chosen by the General Assembly, were now to be selected by the King; and the right of selecting jurors by the inhabitants of the several towns was taken from them. No part of this act, however, or, indeed, of any other act of the British Government, was more deeply felt by every freeholder in Massachusetts than that relating to town meetings. The liberty of convening at pleasure, which they considered as their sacred birth-right, was taken from them, for, by this act, no town meeting could be called without leave of the governor, except the annual meeting in March or May.

To secure the due execution of the laws in the colonies some further provision was deemed necessary by Parliament. A third law therefore soon after passed, "for the impartial administration of justice in the cases of persons questioned, for any acts done by them, in the execution of the law, or for the suppression of riots and tumults in the province of Massachusetts Bay."

By this act persons informed against, or indicted for any act done, for the support of the laws of the revenue, or for the suppression of riots in Massachusetts, might, by the governor, with the advice of the council, be sent for trial to any other colony or to Great Britain.

These bills, however, did not pass without opposition in both houses. Col. Barré addressed the Ministry on the last bill in his bold and energetic language.

OLIVE BRANCH OR SWORD?

COL. ISAAC BARRÉ

"You have changed your ground. You are becoming the aggressors," he said, "and offering the last of human outrages to the people of America by subjecting them to military execution. Instead of sending them the olive branch you have sent the naked sword. By the olive branch I mean a repeal of all the late laws, fruitless to you and oppressive to them. Ask their aid in a constitutional manner and they will give it to the utmost of their ability. They never yet refused it when properly required. Your journals bear the recorded acknowledgments of the zeal with which they have contributed to the general necessities of the state. What madness is it that prompts you to attempt obtaining that by force which you may more certainly procure by requisition. They may be flattered into anything, but they are too much like yourselves to be driven. Have some indulgence for your own likeness; respect their sturdy English virtue; retract your odious exertions of authority; and remember that the first step toward making them contribute to your wants is to reconcile them to your government."

COLONIAL OPPOSITION TO THE PORT BILL

General Thomas Gage was appointed governor of Massachusetts. He arrived there about the middle of May, and was politely received by the inhabitants of Boston. The Port Bill came over at the same time, and a meeting of the people of Boston was immediately held to take it into consideration.

They resolved, among other things, "that the impolicy, injustice, inhumanity, and cruelty of the act exceed all their powers of expression; and therefore we leave it to the censure of others, and appeal to God and the world."

That a meeting of the committees from the several colonies on this continent is highly expedient and necessary to consult upon the present state of the colonies, and the miseries to which they are and must be reduced by the operation of certain acts of Parliament, respecting America; and to deliberate and determine upon proper measures, to be by them recommended to all the colonies, for the recovery and establishment of their just rights and liberties, civil and religious, and the restoration of that union and harmony, between Great Britain and the colonies, most ardently desired by all good men.

The house immediately appointed a committee of five, Thomas Cushing, Samuel Adams, Robert Treat Paine, James Bowdoin and John Adams, to meet similar delegates from the other colonies at Philadelphia, or any other suitable place, on the first of the succeeding September. The governor, having obtained information of what was going on in the house, sent his secretary to dissolve the assembly, but finding the doors closed he was obliged to read his proclamation on the steps leading to the chamber where the representatives were convened for the last time under royal authority. The members did not disperse until they had finished their important business.

The expediency and even the necessity of a general congress and a more intimate union of the colonies was perceived by all, and in the course of the summer delegates were appointed either by the regular assemblies or by conventions of the people in all the colonies except Georgia to attend a congress to be held in Philadelphia in September.

RESOLUTIONS OF VIRGINIA

The convention of Virginia, composed of deputies from all parts of the colony, met on the first of August. It not only appointed some of her distinguished citizens to attend this congress, but entered into a number of resolutions, and formed an association in which they engaged after the first day of November, 1774, that they would not import from Great Britain any goods whatever (medicines excepted) or from any other place any British manufactures, or any article which should

They also declared it as their opinion that, "if the other colonies come into a joint resolution to stop all importation from, and exportation to, Great Britain and every part of the West Indies, till the act be repealed, the same would prove the salvation of North America and her liberties."

These resolutions, with the act itself, were immediately circulated through the colonies; and the severe interdict against the people of Boston excited universal indignation throughout America. In various ways the other colonies expressed their sympathies, sending their suffering neighbors provisions and money, and passing resolutions condemning their persecution.

The House of Burgesses in Virginia, being in session, appointed the first of June, the day the port of Boston was to be shut, as a day of "fasting, humiliation, and prayer, devoutly to implore the divine interposition for averting the heavy calamity which threatened destruction to their civil rights and the evils of a civil war; to give them one heart and one mind to oppose by all just and proper means every injury to American rights."

During an after-meeting of the Assembly, George Washington stated that he was ready at his own expense to raise one thousand men and march to the relief of Boston.

THE CALL FOR A COLONIAL CONGRESS

The advantage of committees of correspondence was perceived on this occasion. The patriotic Virginians recommended to their committee to correspond with the committees of the other colonies on the expediency of appointing representatives from all the colonies to meet annually in a general congress to deliberate on those measures which the united interests of America might from time to time require.

The Assembly of Massachusetts met on the last of May, and the new governor, after negating thirteen of the councillors, adjourned the assembly to meet at Salem on the 7th of June.

Soon after their meeting at this place the House of Representatives, on motion of Samuel Adams, resolved:

have been brought into such place from Great Britain; and that if, before the 10th of August, 1775, American grievances should not be redressed, they would not after that day export tobacco or any other article to that country.

To this convention Thomas Jefferson submitted instructions to the delegates to the Continental Congress, maintaining that the Parliament of Virginia had as much right to pass laws for the government of England as the British Parliament had to pass laws for the government of Virginia. These instructions, though not adopted, were published in a pamphlet which Edmund Burke reprinted with amendments and additions of his own and circulated throughout England. They procured for Jefferson, to use his own words, "the honor of having his name inserted in a long list of proscriptions enrolled in a bill of attainder."

Though many influential colonists, among them John Dickinson, were still desirous of a reconciliation with the parent country on terms mutually advantageous, many of the leading and intelligent patriots of Massachusetts were now convinced that force must decide the contest. John Adams held this opinion. In conversing with Samuel Adams immediately after their appointment to the general congress he said:

"I suppose we must go to Philadelphia and enter into non-importation, non-consumption, and non-exportation agreements; but they will be of no avail; we shall have to resist by force."

While the people of Boston were suffering from the loss of their commerce the act depriving them of their charter rights arrived. To this act the people determined never to submit. As a result of their menacing attitude the royal councillors were obliged either to resign or seek protection in Boston. The grand and petit jurors, when summoned to attend the courts under the new order of things, refused to take the oaths required or to act. In some of the counties the people would not permit the courts to be held by unconstitutional judges. They assembled on the days of the session of the courts in such numbers as to fill the avenues to the court houses, and when the sheriffs commanded them to give place for the judges they refused, declaring "that they knew of no court, nor any other establishment, independent of the ancient laws and usages of their country, and to none other would they submit or give way on any account."

THE FIRST CONTINENTAL CONGRESS

On September 1, 1774, the delegates to the general congress convened at Philadelphia. A committee was appointed to state the rights of the colonies in general, the several instances in which those rights had been violated, and the means most proper to be pursued for obtaining a restoration of them. In regard to the action of General Gage in raising fortifications around Boston and in preventing a free communication with that town the congress not only addressed a letter to the general requesting him to discontinue such fortifications, but also passed a resolution approving of the opposition of the inhabitants of Massachusetts to the execution of the late acts of Parliament, and declaring that, "if the same shall be attempted to be carried into execution by force, lish statutes as existed at the time of their colonization; and which they have, by experience, respectively found to be applicable to their several local and other circumstances.

7. That these, His Majesty's colonies, are likewise entitled to all the immunities and privileges granted and confirmed to them by royal charters, or secured by their several codes of provincial laws.

8. That they have a right peaceably to assemble, consider of their grievances, and petition the King; and that all prosecutions, prohibitory proclamations, and commitments for the same are illegal.

9. That the keeping a standing army in these colonies in times of peace without the consent of the legislature of that colony in which such army is kept is against law.

10. It is indispensably necessary to good government, and rendered essential by the English constitution, that the constituent branches of the legislature be independent of each other; that, therefore, the exercise of legislative power in several colonies, by a council appointed during pleasure by the Crown, is unconstitutional, dangerous, and destructive to the freedom of American legislation.

All and each of which the aforesaid deputies, in behalf of themselves and their constituents, do claim, demand, and insist on as their indubitable rights and liberties; which cannot be legally taken from them, altered or abridged by any power whatever without their consent by their representatives in their several provincial legislatures.

Then after enumerating the various acts of Parliament which were violations of their rights they proceeded to say:

To these grievous acts and measures America cannot submit; but, in hopes their fellow subjects in Great Britain will on a revision of them restore us to that state in which both countries found happiness and prosperity, we have for the present only resolved to pursue the following peaceable measures: 1. To enter into a non-importation association. 2. To prepare an address to the people of Great Britain, and a memorial to the inhabitants of British America; and, 3. To prepare a loyal address to His Majesty, agreeably to resolutions already entered into.

The articles relating to American rights received the unanimous assent of Congress with the exception of the fourth.

in such case all America ought to support them in their opposition."

On the 14th of October the members of this congress with unexampled unanimity declared:

That the inhabitants of the English colonies in North America, by the immutable laws of nature, the principles of the English constitution, and the several charters or compacts, have the following rights:

1. That they are entitled to life, liberty, and property; and they have never ceded to any foreign power whatever a right to dispose of either without their consent.

2. That our ancestors, who first settled these colonies, were, at the time of their emigration from the mother country, entitled to all the rights, liberties, and immunities of free and natural born subjects within the realm of England.

3. That by such emigration they by no means forfeited, surrendered, or lost any of those rights, but that they were, and their descendants now are, entitled to the exercise and enjoyment of all such of them as their local and other circumstances enable them to exercise and enjoy.

4. That the foundation of English liberty and of all free governments is a right in the people to participate in their legislative council; and, as the English colonists are not represented, and from their local and other circumstances cannot properly be represented in the British Parliament, they are entitled to a free and exclusive power of legislation in their several provincial legislatures, where their right of representation can alone be preserved in all cases of taxation and internal policy, subject only to the negative of their sovereign in such manner as has been heretofore used and accustomed. But, from the necessity of the case and a regard to the mutual interest of both countries, we cheerfully consent to the operation of such acts of the British Parliament as are, bona fide, restrained to the regulation of our external commerce for the purpose of securing the commercial advantages of the whole empire to the mother country, and the commercial benefits of its respective members; excluding every idea of taxation internal or external for raising a revenue on the subjects in America without their consent.

5. That the respective colonies are entitled to the common law of England, and, more especially, to the great and inestimable privilege of being tried by their peers of the vicinity according to the course of that law.

6. That they are entitled to the benefit of such of the Eng-

90 GREAT AMERICAN DEBATES

This article produced no little debate, and on the last clause of it perfect unanimity did not prevail. The delegates from Massachusetts had been too much engaged in the controversy with Governor Hutchinson on the great question of parliamentary power to agree to this qualifying clause. This contest had satisfied them that it was difficult, if not impossible, to draw a satisfactory line between a duty laid for the regulation of commerce and for revenue.

A non-importation agreement was signed by all the members of this Congress including a pledge not to use any of the prohibited goods nor to consume any tea upon which duty had been paid.

In case the acts complained of should not be repealed by the 10th day of September, 1775, they agreed not to export to Great Britain, Ireland, or the West Indies any commodities or merchandise whatever, although they would continue sending rice to Europe.

The following was said in conclusion:

And we do solemnly bind ourselves and our constituents, under the ties aforesaid, to adhere to this association until such parts of the several acts of Parliament [objected to] are repealed. And we recommend it to the provincial conventions, and to the committees in the respective colonies, to establish such farther regulations as they may think proper for carrying into execution this association.

Lord Chatham, in referring to this celebrated convention, declared that though he had studied and admired the free states of antiquity, the master spirits of the world, "yet for solidity of reasoning, force of sagacity, and wisdom of conclusion, no body of men could stand in preference to this congress."

PATRICK HENRY'S ELOQUENCE

The loss of Patrick Henry's speech at the opening of the Congress is especially deplorable, as it was the one which gave him national reputation. An account of its deliverance however has fortunately been preserved.

"Mr. Henry rose slowly, as if borne down by the weight of the subject, and, after faltering, according to his habit, through a most impressive exordium, he launched gradually into a recital of the colonial wrongs. Rising, as he advanced, with the grandeur of his subject, and glowing at length with all the majesty and expectation of the occasion, his speech seemed more than that of mortal man. There was no rant, no rhapsody, no labor of the understanding, no straining of the voice, no confusion of the utterance. His countenance was erect, his eye steady, his action noble, his enunciation clear and firm, his mind poised on its center, his views of his subject comprehensive and great, and his imagination coruscating with a magnificence and a variety which struck even that assembly with amazement and awe. He sat down amid murmurs of astonishment and applause; and as he had been before proclaimed the greatest orator of Virginia, he was now, on every hand, admitted to be the first orator of America."

The speech was on the method of voting in the congress, whether it should be by colonies, by the poll of delegates, or by the various interests represented. The first method was adopted against the opposition of Henry. A fragment of his speech remains. It is the first breathing of the national spirit which would disregard State lines where national interests are at stake.

"NOT A VIRGINIAN, BUT AN AMERICAN"

PATRICK HENRY

"Fleets and armies and the present state of things show that the government is dissolved. Where are your landmarks—your boundaries of colonies? We are in a state of nature! All distinctions are thrown down; all America is thrown into one mass. The distinctions between Virginians, Pennsylvanians, New Yorkers, and New Englanders are no more. I am not a Virginian, but an American."

GALLOWAY'S PLAN OF UNION

Henry's vehement opposition later in the session to a plan of union of the colonies proposed by Joseph Galloway, a wealthy lawyer of Philadelphia, and advocated by John Jay, Edward Rutledge, and other con-

In conclusion, referring to the ministerial proceedings toward the colonies, they say: "But if you are determined that your ministers shall wantonly sport with the rights of mankind—if neither the voice of justice, the dictates of the law, the principles of the constitution, nor the suggestions of humanity, can restrain your hands from shedding human blood in such an impious cause, we must then tell you that we will never submit to be hewers of wood or drawers of water for any ministry or nation in the world.

"Place us in the same situation that we were at the close of the late war and our former harmony will be restored.

"But, lest the same supineness, and the same inattention to our common interest which you have for several years shown should continue, we think it necessary to anticipate the consequences.

"By the destruction of the trade of Boston the ministry have endeavored to induce submission to their measures. The like fate may befall us all. We will endeavor, therefore, to live without trade, and recur for subsistence to the fertility and bounty of our native soil, which will afford us all the necessities and some of the conveniences of life. We have suspended our importation from Great Britain and Ireland; and in less than a year's time, unless our grievances should be redressed, shall discontinue our exports to those kingdoms and the West Indies.

"It is with the utmost regret, however, that we find ourselves compelled, by the over-ruling principles of self-preservation, to adopt measures detrimental in their consequences to numbers of our fellow subjects in Great Britain and Ireland. But we hope the magnanimity and justice of the British nation will furnish a Parliament of such wisdom, independence, and public spirit as may save the violated rights of the whole empire from the devices of wicked ministers and evil counselors, whether in or out of office, and thereby restore that harmony, friendship, and fraternal affection between all the inhabitants of His Majesty's kingdoms and territories so ardently wished for by every true and honest American."

This address was prepared by John Jay of New York. Thomas Jefferson, while ignorant of the authorship of the address, said it was "a production certainly of the finest pen in America."

servatives, was probably instrumental in defeating it, as the vote was very close. The plan was similar to Franklin's Albany Plan of Union, proposed in 1754. It provided for a President-General, appointed by the Crown, and a grand council of representatives to be chosen by the colonial assemblies and to meet annually. The council was to have sole charge of internal colonial affairs, its other acts being subject to review by Parliament, although it in turn would have the right of veto over acts of Parliament relating to the colonies. Henry objected to the plan as a recognition of Parliament's right to rule the colonies, which he emphatically denied. Galloway afterwards justified the suspicion that he was secretly acting in the interests of Great Britain by turning Tory.

ADDRESS TO THE BRITISH PEOPLE

In their address to the people of Great Britain, after enumerating the several acts of Parliament deemed violations of their rights, they appeal to the generosity, to the virtue, to the justice of the nation, for relief. They not only remind the people of the parent country of the immense benefits they had heretofore derived from a monopoly of colonial commerce, but call upon them to witness the loyalty and attachment of the colonists to the common interest of the empire.

"Did we not," they ask, "in the last war, add all the strength of this vast continent to the force which repelled our common enemy? Did we not leave our native shores and meet disease and death to promote the success of British arms in foreign climates? Did you not thank us for our zeal; and even reimburse us large sums of money, which, you confessed, we had advanced beyond our proportion, and far beyond our ability?"

After these appeals they repel the charges brought against them. "You have been told that we are seditious, impatient of government, and desirous of independency. Be assured," they said, "that these are not facts, but calumnies. Permit us to be as free as ourselves, and we shall ever esteem a union with you to be our greatest glory and our greatest happiness; we shall ever be ready to contribute all in our power to the welfare of the whole empire; we shall consider your enemies as our enemies, and your interest as our own."

ADDRESS TO THE KING

The address to the King breathed a spirit of affection as well as loyalty. Nor did it contain the language of hypocrisy. They tell their sovereign their grievances and ask redress.

"Had our Creator," they say, "been pleased to give us existence in a land of slavery, the sense of our condition might have been mitigated by ignorance and habit. But, thanks be to His adorable goodness, we were born the heirs of freedom, and ever enjoyed our right under the auspices of your royal ancestors whose family was settled on the British throne to rescue and secure a pious and gallant nation from the popery and despotism of a superstitious and inexorable tyrant. Your Majesty, we are confident, justly rejoices that your title to the crown is thus founded on the title of your people to liberty; and, therefore, we doubt not but your royal wisdom must approve the sensibility that teaches your subjects anxiously to guard the blessing they received from divine Providence, and thereby to prove the performance of that compact which elevated the illustrious house of Brunswick to the imperial dignity it now possesses.

"The apprehension of being degraded into a state of servitude, from the preëminent rank of English freemen, while our minds retain the strongest love of liberty and clearly foresee the miseries preparing for us and our posterity, excites emotions in our breasts which, though we cannot describe, we should not wish to conceal. Feeling as men, and thinking as subjects, in the manner we do, silence would be disloyalty. By giving this faithful information we do all in our power to promote the great objects of your royal cares, the tranquillity of your government, and the welfare of your people.

"Duty to Your Majesty and regard for the preservation of ourselves and our posterity, the primary obligations of nature and society, command us to entreat your royal attention; and, as Your Majesty enjoys the signal distinction of reigning over freemen, we apprehend the language of freemen cannot be displeasing. Your royal indignation, we hope, will rather fall on those designing and dangerous men who, daringly interposing themselves between your royal person and your faithful subjects, and for several years past incessantly employed to dissolve the bonds of society by abusing Your Majesty's authority, misrepresenting your American subjects, and prosecuting the most desperate and irritating projects of oppression, have, at length, compelled us, by the force of accumulated injuries, too severe to be any longer tolerable, to disturb Your Majesty's repose by our complaints.

"These sentiments are extorted from hearts that much more willingly would bleed in Your Majesty's service. Yet so greatly have we been misrepresented that a necessity has been alleged of taking our property from us without our consent, 'to defray the charge of the administration of justice, the support of civil government, and the defence, protection, and security of the colonies.' But we beg leave to assure Your Majesty that such provision has been, and will be, made for defraying the two first articles as has been and shall be judged by the legislatures of the several colonies just and suitable to their respective circumstances: and for the defence, protection, and security of the colonies, their militia, if properly regulated, as they earnestly desire may immediately be done, would be fully sufficient, at least in time of peace; and, in case of war, your faithful colonists will be ready and willing, as they ever have been, when constitutionally required, to demonstrate their loyalty to Your Majesty by exerting their most strenuous efforts in granting supplies and raising forces. Yielding to no British subjects in affectionate attachment to Your Majesty's person, family, and government, we too dearly prize the privilege of expressing that attachment by those proofs that are honorable to the prince who receives them, and to the people who give them, ever to resign it to any body of men upon earth.

"Had we been permitted to enjoy in quiet the inheritance left us by our forefathers, we should at this time have been peaceably, cheerfully, and usefully employed in recommending ourselves, by every testimony of devotion, to Your Majesty, and of veneration to the state from which we derive our origin. But, though now exposed to unexpected and unnatural scenes of distress by a contention with that nation in whose parental guidance on all important affairs we have hitherto with filial reverence constantly trusted, and, therefore, can derive no instruction in our present unhappy and perplexing circumstances from any former experience, yet we doubt not the purity of our intention and the integrity of our conduct will justify us at that grand tribunal before which all mankind must submit to judgment.

"We ask but for peace, liberty, and safety. We wish not a diminution of the prerogative, nor do we solicit the grant of any new right in our favor. Your royal authority over us, and

TAXATION AND REPRESENTATION 97

The "Petition to the King" was written by John Dickinson. It was highly praised by Lord Chatham and others, one of whom said that "it will remain an imperishable monument to the glory of its author and of the assembly of which he was a member so long as fervid and manly eloquence and chaste and elegant composition shall be appreciated."

Congress also delivered an "Address to the Inhabitants of Quebec," in which they endeavored to convince them that a late act of Parliament respecting that province had deprived them of many of their rights and privileges, and to persuade them to unite in obtaining redress, and to join the confederacy.

After directing the Address to the King to be sent to the several colony agents in England to be presented to His Majesty, and recommending that another Congress be held on the 10th of May following, unless a redress of grievances should before that time be obtained, Congress, on the 26th of October, dissolved.

EFFECT OF THE CONGRESS

The proceedings of the Congress met with the almost unanimous approbation of the people of America. The non-importation agreement entered into by their delegates was adopted as their own. Committees of vigilance were appointed in all the towns and districts, and the names of those who disregarded it were published as the enemies of public liberty.

The various colonial assemblies and, where these could not convene owing to the opposition of the governors, special provincial conventions endorsed the proceedings of the general Congress. In Massachusetts such a provincial convention took measures to put the colony in a state of defence, and sent Josiah Quincy, Jr., to England to confer with the English Whigs.

A majority of the members of this Congress had little doubt that the measure taken by them, if supported by the American people, would produce a redress of grievances.

George Washington was of opinion that with the aid our connection with Great Britain we shall always carefully and zealously endeavor to support and maintain.

"Filled with sentiments of duty to Your Majesty, and of affection to our parent state, deeply impressed by our education and strongly confirmed by our reason, and anxious to evince the sincerity of these dispositions, we present this petition only to obtain redress of grievances and relief from fears and jealousies occasioned by the system of statutes and regulations adopted since the close of the late war, . . . by the abolition of which system the harmony between Great Britain and these colonies (so necessary to the happiness of both, and so ardently desired by the latter), and the usual intercourse will be immediately restored. In the magnanimity and justice of Your Majesty and Parliament we confide for a redress of our other grievances, trusting that, when the causes of our apprehensions are removed, our future conduct will prove us not unworthy of the regard we have been accustomed to enjoy. In appealing to that Being who searches thoroughly the hearts of His creatures, we solemnly profess that our councils have been influenced by no other motive than a dread of impending destruction.

"Permit us, then, most gracious sovereign, in the name of all your faithful people in America, with the utmost humility, to implore you, for the honor of Almighty God, whose pure religion our enemies are undermining; for your glory, which can be advanced only by rendering your subjects happy and keeping them united; for the interests of your family, depending on an adherence to the principles that enthroned it; for the safety and welfare of your kingdoms and dominions, threatened with almost unavoidable dangers and distresses, that Your Majesty, as the loving father of your whole people, connected by the same bonds of law, loyalty, faith, and blood, though dwelling in various countries, will not suffer the transcendent relation formed by these ties to be further violated, in uncertain expectations of effects that, if obtained, never can compensate for the calamities through which they must be gained.

"We, therefore, most earnestly beseech Your Majesty that your royal authority and interposition may be used for our relief, and that a gracious answer may be given to this petition.

"That Your Majesty may enjoy every felicity, through a long and glorious reign, over loyal and happy subjects, and that your descendants may inherit your prosperity and dominions till time shall be no more, is, and always will be, our sincere and fervent prayer."

of both the non-importation and non-exportation system America would prevail. Richard Henry Lee said to John Adams, "We shall undoubtedly carry all our points. You will be completely relieved; all the offensive acts will be repealed; the army and fleet will be recalled, and Britain will give up her foolish projects."

Adams, however, together with his cousin Samuel, and Patrick Henry were not so sanguine, believing that the contest must ultimately be decided by force. It was with this conviction that John Adams said to a friend, on being elected as a delegate to the Congress: "As to my fate the die is cast, the Rubicon is passed—and sink or swim, live or die, to survive or perish with my country is my unalterable resolution."¹

FORCE OR CONCILIATION?

Lord Chatham Moves That the Troops Be Withdrawn from Boston. His Speech on the Motion. He Is Supported by Lords Camden and Shelburne and the Marquis of Buckingham. The Measure Is Defeated—Chatham Presents a Plan of Conciliation. His Tilt with Lord Sandwich over the Character of Benjamin Franklin—British Petitions in Behalf of America Are "Shelved," and Asia to "Crush Rebellion" Are Adopted—Franklin's Proposals for Reconciliation—Conciliatory Plan of Lord North—Edmund Burke on "Conciliation with America." His Resolutions Are Defeated—His Speech on "The Right to Tax America."

A NEW Parliament met on the 20th day of November, 1774. The King informed Parliament that a most daring resistance and disobedience to the law still prevailed in Massachusetts and had broken out in fresh violence; that these proceedings had been countenanced and encouraged in the other colonies, and that unwarrantable attempts had been made to obstruct the commerce of the kingdom by unlawful combinations, and he expressed his firm determination to withstand every attempt to weaken or impair the supreme authority of Parliament over all the dominions of the Crown.

Addresses in answer to the speech concurring in the sentiments expressed by the King were carried in both houses by large majorities. A committee was appointed to take the subject of colonial affairs into consideration.

Josiah Quincy, Jr., not long after his arrival in England, had an interview with Lord North as well as Lord Dartmouth at their special request.

The former, on the 19th of November, in conversation on the subject of American affairs, reminded Mr. Quincy of the power of Great Britain and that they were determined "to exert it to the utmost in order to effect the submission of the colonies."

FORCE OR CONCILIATION?

This motion was supported by one of the most eloquent and impressive speeches ever delivered by that distinguished statesman and orator.

ON REMOVING THE TROOPS FROM BOSTON

LORD CHATHAM

"My Lords, these papers from America, now laid by administration for the first time before your lordships, have been, to my knowledge, five or six weeks in the pocket of the minister. And, notwithstanding the fate of this kingdom hangs upon the event of this great controversy, we are but this moment called to a consideration of this important subject.

"My Lords, I do not wish to look into one of these papers. I know their contents well enough already. I know that there is not a member in this house but is acquainted with their purport, also. There ought, therefore, to be no delay in entering upon this matter. We ought to proceed to it immediately. We ought to seize the first moment to open the door of reconciliation. The Americans will never be in a temper or state to be reconciled—they ought not to be—till the troops are withdrawn. The troops are a perpetual irritation to those people; they are a bar to all confidence and all cordial reconciliation.

"The way must be immediately opened for reconciliation. It will soon be too late. I know not who advised the present measures; I know not who advises to a perseverance and enforcement of them; but this I will say, that whoever advises them ought to answer for it at his utmost peril. I know that no one will avow that he advised or that he was the author of these measures; every one shrinks from the charge. But somebody has advised His Majesty to these measures, and, if he continues to hear such evil counselors, His Majesty will be undone. His Majesty may indeed wear his crown, but, the American jewel out of it, it will not be worth the wearing. What more shall I say? I must not say the king is betrayed; but this I will say, the nation is ruined. What foundation have we for our claims over America? What is our right to persist in such cruel and vindictive measures against that loyal, respectable people?

"They say, you have no right to tax them without their consent. They say truly. Representation and taxation must go together; they are inseparable. Yet there is scarcely a man in our streets, though as poor as woe-worms to be able to get his daily bread, but thinks he is the legislator of America. 'Our American

"We must try," said he, "what we can do to support the authority we claim over America. If we are defective in power, we must sit down contented and make the best terms we can; and nobody can blame us after we have done our utmost; but till we have tried what we can do, we can never be justified in receding."

Mr. Quincy from this conversation with the Prime Minister, as well as information obtained from other sources, was convinced that the Americans had nothing to hope but from forcible resistance, and communicated this conviction to some of his particular friends in America.

In a letter to Joseph Reed of Philadelphia of the 17th of December he says:

"But by no means entertain an idea that commercial plans, founded on commercial principles, are to be engines of your freedom or the security of your felicity.

"Far different are the weapons with which oppression is repelled; far more noble the sentiments and actions which secure liberty and happiness to man.

"I cannot forbear telling you that I look to my countrymen with the feelings of one who verily believes they must yet seal their faith and constancy to their liberties with blood."

CHATHAM'S MOTION TO REMOVE THE TROOPS

Parliament, after the holiday recess, convened on the 20th of January, and on the same day Lord Chatham took his seat in the House of Lords and immediately moved:

"That, in order to open the way toward our happy settlement of the dangerous troubles in America by beginning to allay ferments and soften animosities there, and, above all, for preventing in the meantime any sudden and fatal catastrophe at Boston, now suffering under daily irritation of an army before their eyes posted in their town, it may graciously please His Majesty that immediate orders may be dispatched to General Gage for removing His Majesty's forces from the town of Boston."

subjects' is a common phrase in the mouths of the lowest orders of our citizens; but property, my lords, is the sole and entire dominion of the owner; it excludes all the world besides the owner. None can intermeddle with it. It is an unity, a mathematical point. It is an atom; untangible by any but the proprietor. Touch it, and the owner loses his whole property. The touch contaminates the whole mass, the whole property vanishes. The touch of another annihilates it; for whatever is a man's own is absolutely and exclusively his own.

After stating that the Americans had been abused, misrepresented and traduced in the most atrocious manner in order to give color to and urge on the most precipitate, unjust, cruel, and vindictive measures that ever disgraced a nation, he asks:

"But how have this respectable people behaved under their grievances? With unexampled patience, with unparalleled wisdom. They chose delegates by their free suffrages; no bribery, no corruption, no influence there, my Lords. Their representatives meet with the sentiments and temper and speak the sense of the continent. For genuine sagacity, for singular moderation, for solid wisdom, manly spirit, sublime sentiments, and simplicity of language, for everything respectable and honorable, the Congress of Philadelphia shine unrivaled. This wise people speak out. They do not hold the language of slaves; they tell you what they mean. They do not ask you to repeal your laws as a favor; they claim it as a right—they demand it. They tell you they will not submit to them; and I tell you, the acts must be repealed; they will be repealed; you cannot enforce them. The ministry are checkmated; they have a move to make on the board; yet not a move but they are ruined. Repeal, therefore, my Lords, I say. But bare repeal will not satisfy this enlightened and spirited people. What! repeal a bit of paper! repeal a piece of parchment! That alone will not do, my lords. You must go through the work—you must declare you have no right to tax—then they may trust you; then they will have some confidence in you."

After adverting to the distinction he had formerly made, in the debate on the repeal of the Stamp Act, between taxation and legislation (see page 41) Lord Chatham thus concludes:

"My Lords, deeply impressed with the importance of taking some healing measures at this most alarming, distracted state of our affairs, though bowed down with a cruel disease, I have crawled to this House to give you my best counsel and experience; and my advice is to beseech His Majesty to withdraw his troops. This is the best I can think of. It will convince America that you mean to try her cause in the spirit and by the laws of freedom and fair enquiry, and not by codes of blood. How can she now trust you with the bayonet at her breast? She has all the reason in the world now to believe you mean her death or bondage. Thus entered on the threshold of this business, I will knock at your gates for justice without ceasing, unless inveterate infirmities stay my hand. My Lords, I pledge myself never to leave this business. I will pursue it to the end in every shape. I will never fail of my attendance on it, at every step and period of this great matter, unless nailed down to my bed by the severity of disease. My Lords, there is no time to be lost; every moment is big with dangers. Nay, while I am now speaking the decisive blow may be struck and millions involved in the consequences. The very first drop of blood will make a wound that will not easily be skinned over. Years, perhaps ages, may not heal it. It will be immedicabile vulnus: a wound of that rancorous, malignant, corroding, festering nature which in all probability will mortify the whole body. Let us then, my Lords, set to this business in earnest! Not take it up by bits and scraps as formerly, just as exigencies pressed, without any regard to general relations, connections, and dependencies. I would not, by anything I have said, my lords, be thought to encourage America to proceed beyond the right line. I reprobate all acts of violence by her mobility.¹ But when her inherent constitutional rights are invaded, those rights she has an equitable claim to enjoy by the fundamental laws of the English constitution, and which are engrafted thereon by the unalterable laws of nature; then I own myself an American, and, feeling myself such, shall, to the verge of my life, vindicate those rights against all men who strive to trample upon or oppose them."

The motion of Lord Chatham, though supported by Lord Camden, Lord Shelburne, and the Marquis of Rockingham, was rejected by a large majority. The ministers, being now prepared to announce their determination to coerce obedience to the late acts of Parliament, refused to listen to the prophetic voice of this experienced statesman. This, however, did not prevent him from presenting to the House soon after a bill containing his favorite plan "for settling the troubles, and for asserting the supreme legislative authority and superintending power of Great Britain over the colonies."

CHATHAM'S PLAN OF CONCILIATION

The great outlines of this plan were in the first place a general declaration that the colonies of America were dependent on the imperial Crown of Great Britain and subordinate to the British Parliament, and that Parliament could make laws binding on them in all cases touching the general weal of the British empire; the bill then enacted that Parliament could lay no tax or tallage without common consent by an act of an American provincial assembly duly convened for that purpose.

It provided that a general congress be held in America to recognize such general superintending authority in Parliament; and that such congress be requested to take into consideration the making a free grant to the King, and his successors, of a certain permanent revenue, subject to the disposition of Parliament, to the alleviation of the national debt. That the same congress apportion the quotas of this revenue to each province. That the vice-admiralty courts be reduced to their ancient limits—that no person be sent to Great Britain for crimes committed in America—that the acts complained of, passed since 1763, be suspended—that the judges hold their offices during good behavior, and have their salaries from the Crown; and the bill also declared that the colonies were justly entitled to the privileges and franchises granted by their charters or constitutions, and that these charters could not be invaded or rescinded, unless for some legal ground of forfeiture. It asserted the right of the King to send a legal army to any part of his dominions; but that no military force could lawfully be used to destroy the just rights of the people.

Though this bill, as it contained a direct avowal of the supreme authority of Parliament over the colonies in all cases except that of taxation, could never have received the assent of the Americans, yet, as it expressly denied the parliamentary power of taxing the colonies without the consent of their assemblies, and made other concessions, it was rejected by a large majority on its first reading.

Lord Chatham had shown this bill to Dr. Benjamin Franklin before he submitted it to the House of Lords, but the latter had not an opportunity of proposing certain alterations which he had sketched. Dr. Franklin, however, at the special request of Lord Chatham, was present at the debates upon it.

Lord Dartmouth was at first disposed to have the bill lie upon the table, but Lord Sandwich opposed its being received and moved that it be immediately "rejected with the contempt it deserved. He could never believe," he said, "that it was the production of a British peer; that it appeared to him rather the work of some American." Turning his face toward Dr. Franklin, then standing at the bar, "he fancied," he said, "he had in his eye the person who drew it up, one of the bitterest and most mischievous enemies this country had ever known."

To this part of the speech of Lord Sandwich Chatham replied by saying "that it was entirely his own."

"This declaration," he said, "he thought himself the more obliged to make, as many of their lordships appeared to have so mean an opinion of it; for if it was so weak or so bad a thing, it was proper in him to take care that no other person should unjustly share in the censure it deserved. That it had been heretofore reckoned his vice not to be apt to take advice; but he made no scruple to declare that, if he were the first minister of this country, and had the care of settling this momentous business, he should not be ashamed of publicly calling to his assistance a person so perfectly acquainted with the whole of American affairs as the gentleman alluded to and so injuriously reflected on; one whom all Europe held in estimation for his knowledge and wisdom, and who ranked with our Boyles and Newtons; who was an honor, not to the English nation only, but to human nature."

PETITIONS IN FAVOR OF AMERICA SHELVED

Soon after the meeting of Parliament in January petitions from the merchants of London and other trading towns in favor of America were presented to the House of Commons. These petitions, instead of being referred, as the petitioners expected, to the committee on American affairs, were, on motion of the minister, referred to another committee whose meeting was fixed at a more distant day. This was considered by the petitioners as very unfair treatment, and the committee to which their petitions were referred was called the "committee of oblivion." The petition of the American congress to the King had been sent to the house with other papers, but had been left entirely unnoticed. Dr. Franklin, Mr. Bolland, and Arthur Lee, colonial agents, to whom it had been entrusted, requested liberty to be heard upon it before the house. This, however, was refused, the ministers giving the old reason that it came from an illegal assembly. Thus the humble supplication of three millions of people could not be heard unless presented in a particular manner.

ACTS TO "CRUSH REBELLION"

Immediately after the rejection of Lord Chatham's bill the minister proposed in the House of Commons a joint address to the King on American affairs. In this address, which was carried by large majorities, Parliament declared that Massachusetts was in a state of rebellion, and that this colony had been supported by unlawful combinations and engagements entered into by several of the other colonies to the great injury and oppression of His Majesty's subjects in Great Britain. Assuring His Majesty of their determination never to relinquish the sovereign authority of the King and Parliament over the colonies, they requested him to take the most effectual measures to enforce obedience to that authority, and promised him their support at the hazard of their lives and property. In the long and pointed debates on this address it was declared by proposed by the minister. An idea prevailed in Great Britain that the people of New England were dependent on the fisheries for subsistence, and that, deprived of these, they would be starved into obedience and submission.

FRANKLIN'S PROPOSAL FOR RECONCILIATION

During this period Dr. Fothergill and Mr. Barclay, both friends to America, had frequent conversations with Dr. Franklin, earnestly soliciting him to suggest some plan of reconciliation which might be submitted to the consideration of the Ministry. They urged that this might be done immediately before the breach was irreparable, as additional measures against the people of New England were at that time in contemplation.

About the first of December Dr. Franklin sketched and presented to them a plan which he called "Hints for conversation upon the subject of terms that might probably produce a durable union between Great Britain and the colonies."

The "hints" included, among other propositions, that the tea duty act and all acts restraining manufactures in the colonies be repealed, the royal garrisons be removed, and the recent act in regard to Massachusetts and Quebec be revoked. In return, the Navigation Acts to be all reenacted in the colonies.

To some of Franklin's propositions Mr. Barclay and Dr. Fothergill made strong objections.

Restraining manufactures in the colonies, they said, was a favorite idea in Great Britain, and would not easily be relinquished. Dr. Franklin, however, insisted on the justice of allowing all subjects in every country to make the most of their natural advantages, but at their earnest request he consented to change the word repealed to reconsidered.

With respect to sending or quartering troops in the colonies, this, they observed, would never be granted, as all would be of opinion that the King, who was to defend all parts of his dominions, had a right of course to place his troops where they might best answer that purpose. Dr. Franklin in support of his proposition ministers and their supporters that the Americans had long wished to become independent, and only waited for ability and opportunity to accomplish their design. To prevent this, they said, and to crush the monster in its birth, was the duty of every Englishman, and this must be done at any price and at every hazard. In the course of the debates the Americans were branded with the epithets of cowards and paltrons, and some pretending to be well acquainted with their character declared them incapable of military discipline or exertion, and that a small force would reduce them to obedience.

Opposition to the address was made in both Houses, but in vain. The King in his answer assured Parliament of his firm determination in compliance with their request to enforce obedience to the laws and authority of the supreme legislature of the empire. His answer was followed by a message requesting an increase of his forces by sea and land. The restriction of the trade of the colonies and a prohibition of their use of the fisheries were also a part of the ministerial system of measures. The minister began this part of his system with Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island as being the most obstinate and refractory. On the 10th of February he presented a bill which soon became a law restricting the trade of these colonies to Great Britain, Ireland, and the British West Indies, and prohibiting their carrying on any fisheries on the banks of Newfoundland and other places for a limited time. The same restrictions were soon after extended to all the colonies represented in the Congress at Philadelphia, with the exception of New York and North Carolina. These bills were opposed by the minority in both houses as unjust and cruel toward the colonists, involving the innocent with the guilty; and unwise and impolitic in regard to the people of Great Britain. By the loss of their foreign trade and the fisheries the colonists, it was said, particularly those of New England, would be unable to pay the large balances due from them to the British merchants. But every argument, however just or reasonable, was urged in vain against the measures said that if the King could bring troops into the colonies without the consent of the colonial legislatures, he might also bring armies raised in America into England without consent of Parliament. If troops were necessary in America the consent of the local assemblies would no doubt always be obtained, and he refused to give up this article.

Strong objections, they said, would be made against repealing the late laws relating to Quebec and Massachusetts, the old colonists having nothing to do with Quebec, and the act altering the charter of Massachusetts being deemed by the Administration a valuable improvement in the government of that province. Dr. Franklin replied that the Americans had, at a great expense, assisted in the conquest of Canada, and therefore had a right to object to the establishment of an arbitrary government there.

"That as to amending the Massachusetts government," he told them, "though it might be shown that every one of these pretended amendments were real mischiefs, yet that charters being compacts between two parties, the King and the people, no alteration could be made in them, even for the better, but by the consent of both parties. That the Parliament's claim and exercise of a power to alter our charters, which had always been deemed inviolable but for forfeiture, and to alter laws made in pursuance of those charters which had received the royal approbation, and thenceforth were deemed fixed and unchangeable but by the powers that made them, had rendered all our constitutions uncertain, and set us quite afloat; that, as by claiming a right to tax us ad libitum, they deprived us of all property; so by this claim of altering our laws and charters at will they deprived us of all privilege and right whatever, but what we should hold at their pleasure; that this was a situation we could not be in, and must risk life and everything rather than submit to it."

The monopoly of the colonial commerce, it was said, could never be given up, and that any proposition of this kind would only give offence without producing any good. This article was therefore, at last, totally omitted.

The propositions were placed before the Ministry and other gentlemen of influence in Parliament, and on the 4th of February, 1775, Dr. Fothergill and Mr. Barclay had an interview with Dr. Franklin on the subject. Mr. Barclay said there was a good disposition in the Administration toward the colonies, and hinted how much it was in the power of Dr. Franklin himself to promote an agreement, and that in such an event he might expect not only a restoration of his old place, but almost any other he might wish. To this Dr. Franklin replied that the Ministry, he was sure, would rather give him a place in a cart to Tyburn than any other place whatever.

The ministerial agents made counter propositions, to which Dr. Franklin replied that, as none of the late acts relating to the province of Massachusetts Bay were to be repealed, except the Boston Port Bill, "Massachusetts must suffer all the hazards and mischiefs of war rather than admit the alteration of their charters and laws by Parliament. They who can give up liberty to obtain a little temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety."

LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION

Soon after the close of this negotiation and while Parliament were engaged in augmenting the military and naval force and declaring the colonists in a state of rebellion, Lord North, the Prime Minister, surprised both his political friends and enemies with a proposition called his conciliatory plan in relation to the colonies.

This proposition was submitted to the House of Commons by the minister on the 20th of February, 1775, and was finally adopted. It declared:

"That, when the Governor, Council and Assembly, or General Court of any of His Majesty's colonies in America shall propose to make provision, according to the condition, circumstances, and situation of such province or colony, for contributing their proportion for the common defence (such proportion to be raised under the authority of the General Court or Assembly of such colony and disposable by Parliament), and shall leaving the amount and application to the colonial assemblies.

Mr. Burke's proposition, founded on expediency, was to permit the colonies to tax themselves in their assemblies according to ancient usage and to repeal all acts of Parliament imposing duties in America.

These propositions, though supported by all the eloquence and powerful talents of Mr. Burke, were rejected by the usual ministerial majorities.

In presenting his proposition, Mr. Burke made what has been considered the greatest of all his speeches, and one to which there are few equals in forensic oratory, whether of ancient or of modern times.

ON CONCILIATION WITH AMERICA

EDMUND BURKE

Mr. Speaker: As I came into the House full of anxiety about the event of my motion, I found, to my infinite surprise, that the grand penal bill,¹ by which we had passed sentence on the trade and sustenance of America, is to be returned to us from the other House. I do confess I could not help looking on this event as a fortunate omen. I look upon it as a sort of providential favor by which we are put once more in possession of our deliberative capacity upon a business so very questionable in its nature, so very uncertain in its issue. By the return of this bill, which seemed to have taken its flight forever, we are at this very instant nearly as free to choose a plan for our American government as we were on the first day of the session. If, sir, we incline to the side of conciliation we are not at all embarrassed (unless we please to make ourselves so) by any incongruous mixture of coercion and restraint. We are, therefore, called upon, as it were by a superior warning voice, again to attend to America; to attend to the whole of it together; and to review the subject with an unusual degree of care and calmness.

Here the speaker told of the exhaustive research he had made in American affairs since the proposition of the Stamp Act.

engage to make provision, also, for the support of the civil government and the administration of justice in such colony, it will be proper, if such proposal shall be approved by His Majesty and the two Houses of Parliament, and for so long as such provision shall be made accordingly, to forbear in respect to such colony to levy any duty, tax or assessment, except only such duties as it may be expedient to levy or impose for the regulation of commerce; the net proceeds of the duties last mentioned to be carried to the account of such colony respectively."

This unexpected proposition was at first opposed by those who usually acted with the minister as totally inconsistent with the course of measures just adopted, and they would probably have voted against it had they not been quieted by explanations made by his particular friends as to its real object, which was to cause a division among the colonies; or, if this should not be the effect, and the reasonable terms offered should be rejected by them, to unite the people of England in strong coercive measures. The minister stated that it would be an infallible touch-stone to try the sincerity of the Americans. That he intended by it to separate the grain from the chaff. If rejected, "we shall then," he observed, "know how to act; after having shown our wisdom and our humanity by giving them an opportunity of redeeming their past faults, and holding out to them fitting terms of accommodation; if they reject them we shall stand justified in taking the most coercive measures, and they must be answerable to God and man for the consequences."

The adoption of Lord North's conciliatory scheme did not prevent David Hartley and Edmund Burke from presenting to the House their respective plans of reconciliation.

HARTLEY'S AND BURKE'S PROPOSITIONS

Mr. Hartley proposed that at the request of Parliament the secretary of state should require a contribution from the colonies for the general expense of the empire,

Sir, Parliament, having an enlarged view of objects, made during this interval more frequent changes in their sentiment and their conduct than could be justified in a particular person upon the contracted scale of private information. But, though I do not hazard anything approaching to a censure on the motives of former Parliaments to all those alterations, one fact is undoubted—that under them the state of America has been kept in continual agitation. Everything administered as remedy to the public complaint, if it did not produce, was at least followed by a heightening of the distemper; until, by a variety of experiments, that important country has been brought into her present situation—a situation which I will not miscall, which I dare not name, which I scarcely know how to comprehend in the terms of any description.

To restore order and repose to an empire so great and so distracted as ours is merely in the attempt an undertaking that would ennoble the flights of the highest genius, and obtain pardon for the efforts of the meanest understanding. Struggling a good while with these thoughts, by degrees I felt myself more firm. I derived, at length, some confidence from what in other circumstances usually produces timidity. I grew less anxious, even from the idea of my own insignificance. For, judging of what you are by what you ought to be, I persuaded myself that you would not reject a reasonable proposition because it had nothing but its reason to recommend it.

The proposition is peace. Not peace through the medium of war; not peace to be hunted through the labyrinth of intricate and endless negotiations; not peace to arise out of universal discord, fomented from principle, in all parts of the empire; not peace to depend on the juridical determination of perplexing questions, or the precise marking the shadowy boundaries of a complex government. It is simple peace, sought in its natural course and its ordinary haunts. It is peace sought in the spirit of peace, and laid in principles purely pacific. I propose, by removing the ground of the difference, and by restoring the former unsuspecting confidence of the colonies in the mother country,¹ to give permanent satisfaction to your people; and, far from a scheme of ruling by discord, to reconcile them to each other in the same act, and by the bond of the very same interest which reconciles them to British government.

My idea is nothing more. Refined policy ever has been the parent of confusion, and ever will be so as long as the world endures. Plain good intention, which is as easily discovered at the first view as fraud is surely detected at last, is (let me say) of no mean force in the government of mankind. Genuine simplicity of heart is a healing and cementing principle. My plan, therefore, being formed upon the most simple grounds imaginable, may disappoint some people when they hear it. It has nothing to recommend it to the pruriency of curious ears. There is nothing at all new and captivating in it. It has nothing of the splendor of the project which has been lately laid upon your table by the noble Lord in the blue ribbon [Lord North]. It does not propose to fill your lobby with squabbling colony agents, who will require the interposition of your mace at every instant to keep the peace among them. It does not institute a magnificent auction of finance, where captivated provinces come to general ransom by bidding against each other until you knock down the hammer, and determine a proportion of payments beyond all the powers of algebra to equalize and settle.

The House has declared conciliation admissible previous to any submission on the part of America. It has even shot a good deal beyond that mark, and has admitted that the complaints of our former mode of exerting the right of taxation were not wholly unfounded.

The means proposed by the noble Lord for carrying his ideas into execution I think, indeed, are very indifferently suited to the end; and this I shall endeavor to show you before I sit down. But for the present I take my ground on the admitted principles. I mean to give peace. Peace implies reconciliation; and where there has been a material dispute reconciliation does in a manner always imply concession on the one part or on the other. In this state of things I make no difficulty in affirming that the proposal ought to originate from us. Great and acknowledged force is not impaired, either in effect or in opinion, by an unwillingness to exert itself. The superior power may offer peace with honor and with safety. Such an offer from such a power will be attributed to magnanimity. But the concessions of the weak are the concessions of fear. When such a one is disarmed, he is wholly at the mercy of his superior, and he loses forever that time and those chances which, as they happen to all men, are the strength and resources of all inferior power.

The capital leading questions on which you must this day decide are these two: First, whether you ought to concede; and, secondly, what your concession ought to be.

On the first of these questions we have gained, as I have

But, it will be said, is not this American trade an unnatural protuberance that has drawn the juices from the rest of the body? The reverse. It is the very food that has nourished every other part into its present magnitude. Our general trade has been greatly augmented, and augmented more or less in almost every part to which it ever extended, but with this material difference, that, of the six millions which in the beginning of the century constituted the whole mass of our export commerce, the colony trade was but one twelfth part; it is now (as a part of sixteen millions) considerably more than a third of the whole. This is the relative proportion of the importance of the colonies of these two periods; and all reasoning concerning our mode of treating them must have this proportion as its basis, or it is a reasoning weak, rotten, and sophistical.

I pass to the colonies in another point of view—their agriculture. This they have prosecuted with such a spirit that, besides feeding plentifully their own growing multitude, their annual export of grain, comprehending rice, has, some years ago, exceeded a million in value. For some time past the old world has been fed from the new. The scarcity which you have felt would have been a desolating famine if this child of your old age, with a true filial piety, with a Roman charity, had not put the full breast of its youthful exuberance to the mouth of its exhausted parent.¹

As to the wealth which the colonies have drawn from the sea by their fisheries, you had all that matter fully opened at your bar. You surely thought those acquisitions of value, for they seemed even to excite your envy; and yet the spirit by which that enterprising employment has been exercised ought rather, in my opinion, to have raised your esteem and admiration. And pray, sir, what in the world is equal to it? Pass by the other parts, and look at the manner in which the people of New England have of late carried on the whale fishery. While we follow them among the tumbling mountains of ice, and behold them penetrating into the deepest frozen recesses of Hudson's Bay and Davis' Straits—while we are looking for them beneath the arctic circle, we hear that they have pierced into the opposite region of polar cold—that they are at the antipodes, and engaged under the frozen Serpent of the south. Falkland Island, which seemed too remote and romantic an object for the grasp of national ambition, is but a stage and resting-place in the progress of their victorious industry. Nor is the equinojust taken the liberty of observing to you, some ground. But I am sensible that a good deal more is still to be done. Indeed, sir, to enable us to determine both on the one and the other of these great questions with a firm and precise judgment, I think it may be necessary to consider distinctly:

The true nature and the peculiar circumstances of the object which we have before us—because, after all our struggle, whether we will or not, we must govern America according to that nature and to those circumstances, and not according to our imaginations; not according to abstract ideas of right; by no means according to mere general theories of government, the resort to which appears to me, in our present situation, no better than arrant trifling. I shall therefore endeavor, with your leave, to lay before you some of the most material of these circumstances in as full and as clear a manner as I am able to state them.

Here the speaker discussed the population of the colonies, which he had found to be two million whites and five hundred thousand blacks, all increasing so fast that “while we spend our time in deliberating on the mode of governing two millions we shall find we have two millions more to manage.” This fact, he said to the House, “will show that you ought not, in reason, to trifle with so large a mass of the interests and feelings of the human race. You could at no time do so without guilt, and, be assured, you will not be able to do it long with impunity.”

But the population of this country, the great and growing population, though a very important consideration, will lose much of its weight if not combined with other circumstances. The commerce of your colonies is out of all proportion beyond the numbers of the people.

Examine this account:

The whole export trade of England, including that to the colonies, in 1704.....	£8,509,000
Exported to the colonies alone, in 1772.....	6,024,000
Difference.....	£485,000

The trade with America alone is now within less than £500,000 of being equal to what this great commercial nation, England, carried on at the beginning of this century with the whole world!

tial heat more discouraging to them than the accumulated winter of both the poles. We know that, while some of them draw the line, and strike the harpoon on the coast of Africa, others run the longitude, and pursue their gigantic game along the coast of Brazil. No sea but what is vexed by their fisheries. No climate that is not witness to their toils. Neither the perseverance of Holland, nor the activity of France, nor the dexterous and firm sagacity of English enterprise, ever carried this most perilous mode of hardy industry to the extent to which it has been pushed by this recent people—a people who are still, as it were, but in the gristle, and not yet hardened into the bone of manhood. When I contemplate these things—when I know that the colonies in general owe little or nothing to any care of ours, and that they are not squeezed into this happy form by the constraints of watchful and suspicious government, but that, through a wise and salutary neglect, a generous nature has been suffered to take her own way to perfection—when I reflect upon these effects—when I see how profitable they have been to us, I feel all the pride of power sink, and all presumption in the wisdom of human contrivances melt and die away within me. My rigor relents. I pardon something to the spirit of liberty.

I am sensible, sir, that all which I have asserted in my detail is admitted in the gross; but that quite a different conclusion is drawn from it. America, gentlemen say, is a noble object. It is an object well worth fighting for. Certainly it is, if fighting a people be the best way of gaining them. Gentlemen in this respect will be led to their choice of means by their complexions and their habits. Those who understand the military art will, of course, have some predilection for it. Those who wield the thunder of the state may have more confidence in the efficacy of arms. But I confess, possibly for want of this knowledge, my opinion is much more in favor of prudent management than of force; considering force not as an odious, but a feeble, instrument for preserving a people so numerous, so active, so growing, so spirited as this in a profitable and subordinate connection with us.

First, sir, permit me to observe, that the use of force alone is but temporary. It may subdue for a moment, but it does not remove the necessity of subduing again; and a nation is not governed which is perpetually to be conquered.

My next objection is its uncertainty. Terror is not always the effect of force; and an armament is not a victory. If you do not succeed, you are without resource; for, conciliation failing, force remains; but, force failing, no farther hope of reconciliation is left. Power and authority are sometimes bought by kindness, but they can never be begged as alms by an impoverished and defeated violence.

A farther objection to force is, that you impair the object by your very endeavors to preserve it. The thing you fought for is not the thing which you recover; but depreciated, sunk, wasted, and consumed in the contest. Nothing less will content me than whole America. I do not choose to consume its strength along with our own, because in all parts it is the British strength that I consume. I do not choose to be caught by a foreign enemy at the end of this exhausting conflict, and still less in the midst of it. I may escape; but I can make no insurance against such an event. Let me add, that I do not choose wholly to break the American spirit, because it is the spirit that has made the country.

Lastly, we have no sort of experience in favor of force as an instrument in the rule of our colonies. Their growth and their utility have been owing to methods altogether different. Our ancient indulgence has been said to be pursued to a fault. It may be so; but we know, if feeling is evidence, that our fault was more tolerable than our attempt to mend it; and our sin far more salutary than our penitence.

These, sir, are my reasons for not entertaining that high opinion of untried force by which many gentlemen, for whose sentiments in other particulars I have great respect, seem to be so greatly captivated.

But there is still behind a third consideration concerning this object, which serves to determine my opinion on the sort of policy which ought to be pursued in the management of America, even more than its population and its commerce—I mean its temper and character. In this character of the Americans a love of freedom is the predominating feature, which marks and distinguishes the whole; and, as an ardent is always a jealous affection, your colonies become suspicious, restive, and untractable, whenever they see the least attempt to wrest from them by force, or shuffle from them by chicanery, what they think the only advantage worth living for. This fierce spirit of liberty is stronger in the English colonies, probably, than in any other people of the earth, and this from a variety of powerful causes, which, to understand the true temper of their minds, and the direction which this spirit takes, it will not be amiss to lay open somewhat more largely.

First, the people of the colonies are descendants of English-lenity or indolence, through wisdom or mistake, confirmed them in the imagination that they, as well as you, had an interest in these common principles.

They were further confirmed in these pleasing errors by the form of their provincial legislative assemblies. Their governments are popular in a high degree; some are merely popular; in all, the popular representative is the most weighty; and this share of the people in their ordinary government never fails to inspire them with lofty sentiments, and with a strong aversion from whatever tends to deprive them of their chief importance.

If anything were wanting to this necessary operation of the form of government, religion would have given it a complete effect. Religion, always a principle of energy, in this new people is no way worn out or impaired; and their mode of professing it is also one main cause of this free spirit. The people are Protestants; and of that kind which is the most averse to all implicit submission of mind and opinion. This is a persuasion not only favorable to liberty, but built upon it. I do not think, sir, that the reason of this averseness in the dissenting churches from all that looks like absolute government is so much to be sought in their religious tenets as in their history. Every one knows that the Roman Catholic religion is at least coeval with most of the governments where it prevails; that it has generally gone hand in hand with them; and received great favor and every kind of support from authority. The Church of England, too, was formed from her cradle under the nursing care of regular government. But the dissenting interests have sprung up in direct opposition to all the ordinary powers of the world, and could justify that opposition only on a strong claim to natural liberty. Their very existence depended on the powerful and unremitted assertion of that claim. All Protestantism, even the most cold and passive, is a kind of dissent. But the religion most prevalent in our northern colonies is a refinement on the principle of resistance; it is the dissidence of dissent; and the Protestantism of the Protestant religion. This religion, under a variety of denominations, agreeing in nothing but in the communion of the spirit of liberty, is predominant in most of the northern provinces; where the Church of England, notwithstanding its legal rights, is in reality no more than a sort of private sect, not composing, most probably, the tenth of the people. The colonists left England when this spirit was high, and in the emigrants was the highest of all; and even that stream of foreigners which has been constantly flowing into these colonies has, for the greatest part, been composed of men. England, sir, is a nation which still, I hope, respects, and formerly adored, her freedom. The colonists emigrated from you when this part of your character was most predominant; and they took this bias and direction the moment they parted from your hands. They are, therefore, not only devoted to liberty, but to liberty according to English ideas and on English principles. Abstract liberty, like other mere abstractions, is not to be found. Liberty inheres in some sensible object; and every nation has formed to itself some favorite point which, by way of eminence, becomes the criterion of their happiness. It happened you know, sir, that the great contests for freedom in this country were, from the earliest times, chiefly upon the question of taxing. Most of the contests in the ancient commonwealths turned primarily on the right of election of magistrates, or on the balance among the several orders of the State. The question of money was not with them so immediate. But in England it was otherwise. On this point of taxes the ablest pens and most eloquent tongues have been exercised; the greatest spirits have acted and suffered. In order to give the fullest satisfaction concerning the importance of this point, it was not only necessary for those who, in argument, defended the excellence of the English constitution to insist on this privilege of granting money as a dry point of fact, and to prove that the right had been acknowledged in ancient parliaments and blind usages to reside in a certain body called the House of Commons. They went much farther: they attempted to prove (and they succeeded) that in theory it ought to be so, from the particular nature of a House of Commons as an immediate representative of the people, whether the old records had delivered this oracle or not. They took infinite pains to inculcate as a fundamental principle that in all monarchies the people must, in effect, themselves, mediately or immediately, possess the power of granting their own money, or no shadow of liberty could subsist. The colonies draw from you, as with their life-blood, those ideas and principles. Their love of liberty, as with you, fixed and attached on this specific point of taxing. Liberty might be safe or might be endangered in twenty other particulars without their being much pleased or alarmed. Here they felt its pulse, and, as they found that beat, they thought themselves sick or sound. I do not say whether they were right or wrong in applying your general arguments to their own case. It is not easy, indeed, to make a monopoly of theorems and corollaries. The fact is, that they did thus apply those general arguments; and your mode of governing them, whether through dissenters from the establishments of their several countries, and have brought with them a temper and character far from alien to that of the people with whom they mixed.

Sir, I can perceive by their manner that some gentlemen object to the latitude of this description, because in the southern colonies the Church of England forms a large body, and has a regular establishment. It is certainly true. There is, however, a circumstance attending those colonies, which, in my opinion, fully counterbalances this difference, and makes the spirit of liberty still more high and haughty than in those to the northward. It is that in Virginia and the Carolinas they have a vast multitude of slaves. Where this is the case in any part of the world, those who are free are by far the most proud and jealous of their freedom. Freedom is to them not only an enjoyment, but a kind of rank and privilege. Not seeing there that freedom, as in countries where it is a common blessing and as broad and general as the air, may be united with much abject toil, with great misery, with all the exterior of servitude, liberty looks among them like something that is more noble and liberal. I do not mean, sir, to commend the superior morality of this sentiment, which has at least as much pride as virtue in it; but I cannot alter the nature of man. The fact is so; and these people of the southern colonies are much more strongly, and with a higher and more stubborn spirit, attached to liberty than those to the northward. Such were all the ancient commonwealths; such were our Gothic ancestors; such, in our days, were the Poles, and such will be all masters of slaves who are not slaves themselves. In such a people the haughtiness of domination combines with the spirit of freedom, fortifies it, and renders it invincible.

Permit me, sir, to add another circumstance in our colonies which contributes no mean part toward the growth and effect of this intractable spirit—I mean their education. In no country perhaps in the world is the law so general a study. The profession itself is numerous and powerful; and in most provinces it takes the lead. The greater number of the deputies sent to Congress were lawyers. But all who read (and most do read) endeavor to obtain some smattering in that science. I have been told by an eminent bookseller that in no branch of his business, after tracts of popular devotion, were so many books as those on the law exported to the Plantations. The colonists have now fallen into the way of printing them for their own use. I hear that they have sold nearly as many of Blackstone's Commentaries in America as in England. General

Gage marks out this disposition very particularly in a letter on your table. He states that all the people in his government are lawyers, or smatterers in law; and that in Boston they have been enabled, by successful chicanery, wholly to evade many parts of one of your capital penal constitutions.¹ The smartness of debate will say that this knowledge ought to teach them more clearly the rights of legislature, their obligations to obedience, and the penalties of rebellion. All this is mighty well. But my honorable and learned friend [the Attorney-General, afterward Lord Thurlow] on the floor, who condescends to mark what I say for animadversion, will disclaim that ground. He has heard, as well as I, that when great honors and great emoluments do not win over this knowledge to the service of the state, it is a formidable adversary to government. If the spirit be not tamed and broken by these happy methods, it is stubborn and litigious. *About studia in mores.*² This study renders men acute, inquisitive, dexterous, prompt in attack, ready in defence, full of resources. In other countries, the people more simple and of a less mercurial cast, judge of an ill principle in government only by an actual grievance. Here they anticipate the evil, and judge of the pressure of the grievance by the badness of the principle. They augur misgovernment at a distance; and snuff the approach of tyranny in every tainted breeze.

The last cause of this disobedient spirit in the colonies is hardly less powerful than the rest, as it is not merely moral, but laid deep in the natural constitution of things. Three thousand miles of ocean lie between you and them. No contrivance can prevent the effect of this distance in weakening government. Seas roll and months pass between the order and the execution; and the want of a speedy explanation of a single point is enough to defeat the whole system. You have, indeed, "winged ministers" of vengeance, who carry your bolts in their pouches to the remotest verge of the sea.³ But there a power steps in that limits the arrogance of raging passion and furious elements, and says: "So far shalt thou go, and no farther." Who are you, that should fret and rage, and bite the chains of nature? Nothing worse happens to you than does to all nations who have extensive empire; and it happens in all the forms into which empire can be thrown. In large bodies the circulation of power must be less vigorous at the extremities. Nature has said it.

people there, finding all passage through the legal channel stopped, with great violence broke out another way. Some provinces have tried their experiment as we have tried ours; and theirs has succeeded. They have formed a government sufficient for the purposes, without the bustle of a revolution or the troublesome formality of an election. Evident necessity and tacit consent have done the business in an instant. So well they have done it, that Lord Dunmore (the account is among the fragments on your table) tells you, that the new institution is infinitely better obeyed than the ancient government ever was in its most fortunate periods. Obedience is what makes government, and not the names by which it is called; not the name of governor, as formerly, or committee, as at present. This new government has originated directly from the people, and was not transmitted through any of the ordinary artificial media of a positive constitution. It was not a manufacture ready formed and transmitted to them in that condition from England. The evil arising from hence is this: that, the colonists having once found the possibility of enjoying the advantages of order in the midst of a struggle for liberty, such struggles will not henceforward seem so terrible to the settled and sober part of mankind as they had appeared before the trial.

Pursuing the same plan of punishing by the denial of the exercise of government to still greater lengths, we wholly abrogated the ancient government of Massachusetts. We were confident that the first feeling, if not the very prospect of anarchy, would instantly enforce a complete submission. The experiment was tried. A new, strange, unexpected face of things appeared. Anarchy is found tolerable. A vast province has now subsisted, and subsisted in a considerable degree of health and vigor, for near a twelvemonth, without governor, without public council, without judges, without executive magistrates. How long it will continue in this state, or what may arise out of this unheard-of situation, how can the wisest of us conjecture? Our late experience has taught us that many of those fundamental principles, formerly believed infallible, are either not of the importance they were imagined to be, or that we have not at all adverted to some other far more important and far more powerful principles which entirely overrule those we had considered as omnipotent. I am much against any farther experiments which tend to put to the proof any more of these allowed opinions which contribute so much to the public tranquillity. In effect, we suffer as much at home by this loosening of all ties, and this concussion of all established opinions, as we do abroad.

Here the speaker instanced the Turkish and Spanish empires as tolerant from necessity toward their distant provinces.

Then, sir, from these six capital sources of descent a fierce spirit of liberty has grown up. It has grown with the growth of the people in your colonies, and increased with the increase of their wealth; a spirit that, unhappily meeting with an exercise of power in England, which, however lawful, is not reconcilable to any ideas of liberty, much less with theirs, has kindled this flame that is ready to consume us.

I do not mean to commend either the spirit in this excess, or the moral causes which produce it. Perhaps a more smooth and accommodating spirit of freedom in them would be more acceptable to us. Perhaps ideas of liberty might be desired, more reconcilable with an arbitrary and boundless authority. Perhaps we might wish the colonists to be persuaded that their liberty is more secure when held in trust for them by us, as guardians during a perpetual minority, than with any part of it in their own hands. But the question is not whether their spirit deserves praise or blame. What, in the name of God, shall we do with it? You have before you the object, such as it is, with all its glories, with all its imperfections on its head. You see the magnitude, the importance, the temper, the habits, the disorders. By all these considerations we are strongly urged to determine something concerning it. We are called upon to fix some rule and line for our future conduct which may give a little stability to our politics, and prevent the return of such unhappy deliberations as the present. Every such return will bring the matter before us in a still more intractable form. For what astonishing and incredible things have we not seen already? What monsters have not been generated from this unnatural contention? While every principle of authority and resistance has been pushed upon both sides, as far as it would go, there is nothing so solid and certain, either in reasoning or in practice, that it has not been shaken. Until very lately, all authority in America seemed to be nothing but an emanation from yours. Even the popular part of the colony constitution derived all its activity, and its first vital movement, from the pleasure of the Crown. We thought, sir, that the utmost which the discontented colonists could do, was to disturb authority. We never dreamed they could of themselves supply it, knowing in general what an onerous business it is to establish a government absolutely new. But having, for our purposes in this contention, resolved that none but an obedient assembly should sit, the humors of the

For, in order to prove that the Americans have no right to their liberties, we are every day endeavoring to subvert the maxims which preserve the whole spirit of our own. To prove that the Americans ought not to be free, we are obliged to depreciate the value of freedom itself; and we never seem to gain a paltry advantage over them in debate without attacking some of those principles, or deriding some of those feelings for which our ancestors have shed their blood.

Sir, I would state that, as far as I am capable of discerning, there are but three ways of proceeding relative to this stubborn spirit which prevails in your colonies and disturbs your government. These are, to change that spirit, as inconvenient, by removing the causes; to prosecute it as criminal; or to comply with it as necessary. I would not be guilty of an imperfect enumeration. I can think of but these three. Another has, indeed, been started—that of giving up the colonies; but it met so slight a reception that I do not think myself obliged to dwell a great while upon it. It is nothing but a little sally of anger, like the frowardness of peevish children, who, when they cannot get all they would have, are resolved to take nothing.

The first of these plans, to change the spirit as inconvenient by removing the causes, I think is the most like a systematic proceeding. It is radical in its principle, but it is attended with great difficulties, some of them little short, as I conceive, of impossibilities. This will appear by examining into the plans which have been proposed.

As the growing population of the colonies is evidently one cause of their resistance, it was last session mentioned in both Houses by men of weight, and received, not without applause, that, in order to check this evil, it would be proper for the Crown to make no farther grants of land.

But if you stopped your grants what would be the consequence? The people would occupy without grants. They have already so occupied in many places. You cannot station garrisons in every part of these deserts. If you drive the people from one place they will carry on their annual tillage, and remove with their flocks and herds to another. Many of the people in the back settlements are already little attached to particular situations. Already they have topped the Appalachian Mountains. From thence they behold before them an immense plain, one vast, rich, level meadow—a square of five hundred miles. Over this they would wander without a possibility of restraint. They would change their manners with the habits of their life; would soon forget a government by which they were disowned; would become hordes of English Tartars; and, pouring down upon your unfortified frontiers a fierce and irresistible cavalry, become masters of your governors and your counselors, your collectors and controllers, and of all the slaves that adhered to them. Such would, and, in no long time, must, be the effect of attempting to forbid as a crime, and to suppress as an evil, the command and blessing of Providence, "Increase and multiply." Such would be the happy result of an endeavor to keep as a lair of wild beasts that earth which God by an express charter has given to the children of men. Far different, and surely much wiser, has been our policy hitherto. Hitherto we have invited our people, by every kind of bounty, to fixed establishments. We have invited the husbandman to look to authority for his title. We have taught him piously to believe in the mysterious virtue of wax and parchment. We have thrown each tract of land, as it was peopled, into districts, that the ruling power should never be wholly out of sight. We have settled all we could, and we have carefully attended every settlement with government.

Adhering, sir, as I do, to this policy, as well as for the reasons I have just given, I think this new project of hedging in population to be neither prudent nor practicable.

To impoverish the colonies in general, and in particular to arrest the noble course of their marine enterprises would be a more easy task. I freely confess it. We have shown a disposition to all other things; a disposition even to continue the restraint after the offence, looking on ourselves as rivals to our colonies, and persuaded that of course we must gain all that they shall lose. Much mischief we may certainly do. The power inadequate to all other things is often more than sufficient for this. I do not look on the direct and immediate power of the colonies to resist our violence as very formidable. In this, however, I may be mistaken. But when I consider that we have colonies for no purpose but to be serviceable to us, it seems to my poor understanding a little preposterous to make them un-serviceable in order to keep them obedient. It is, in truth, nothing more than the old and, as I thought, exploded problem of tyranny, which proposes to beggar its subject into submission. But remember, when you have completed your system of impoverishment, that nature still proceeds in her ordinary course; that discontent will increase with misery; and that there are critical moments in the fortunes of all states when they who are too weak to contribute to your prosperity may be strong enough to complete your ruin. "Spoliatis arma supersunt."¹ that inhuman traffic! An offer of freedom from England would come rather oddly, shipped to them in an African vessel, which is refused an entry into the ports of Virginia or Carolina, with a cargo of three hundred Angola negroes. It would be curious to see the Guinea captain attempt at the same instant to publish his proclamation of liberty and to advertise the sale of slaves.

But let us suppose all these moral difficulties got over. The ocean remains. You cannot pump this dry; and as long as it continues in its present bed so long all the causes which weaken authority by distance will continue.

"Ye gods! annihilate but space and time,
And make two lovers happy!"

was a pious and passionate prayer, but just as reasonable as many of these serious wishes of very grave and solemn politicians.

If, then, sir, it seems almost desperate to think of any alternative course for changing the moral causes (and not quite easy to remove the natural) which produce the prejudices irreconcilable to the late exercise of our authority, but that the spirit infallibly will continue, and, continuing, will produce such effects as now embarrass us, the second mode under consideration is to prosecute that spirit in its overt acts as criminal.

At this proposition I must pause a moment. The thing seems a great deal too big for my ideas of jurisprudence. It should seem, to my way of conceiving such matters, that there is a very wide difference in reason and policy between the mode of proceeding on the irregular conduct of scattered individuals, or even of bands of men, who disturb order within the state, and the civil dissensions which may from time to time on great questions agitate the several communities which compose a great empire. It looks to me to be narrow and pedantic to apply the ordinary ideas of criminal justice to this great public contest. I do not know the method of drawing up an indictment against a whole people. I cannot insult and ridicule the feelings of millions of my fellow-creatures, as Sir Edward Coke insulted one excellent individual at the bar.¹ I am not ripe to pass sentence on the gravest public bodies, intrusted with magistracies of great authority and dignity, and charged with the safety of their fellow-citizens, upon the very same title that I am. I really think that, for wise men, this is not judicious; for sober ¹Sir Walter Raleigh at his trial for treason. See Howell's "State Trials."

The temper and character which prevail in our colonies are, I am afraid, unalterable by any human art. We cannot, I fear, falsify the pedigree of this fierce people, and persuade them that they are not sprung from a nation in whose veins the blood of freedom circulates. The language in which they would hear you tell them this tale would detect the imposition. Your speech would betray you. An Englishman is the unfittest person on earth to argue another Englishman into slavery.

I think it is nearly as little in our power to change their republican religion as their free descent; or to substitute the Roman Catholic as a penalty, or the Church of England as an improvement. The mode of inquisition and dragooning is going out of fashion in the old world, and I should not confide much to their efficacy in the new. The education of the Americans is also on the same unalterable bottom with their religion. You cannot persuade them to burn their books of curious science; to banish their lawyers from their courts of law; or to quench the lights of their assemblies by refusing to choose those persons who are best read in their privileges. It would be no less impracticable to think of wholly annihilating the popular assemblies in which these lawyers sit. The army, by which we must govern in their place, would be far more chargeable to us; not quite so effectual; and perhaps, in the end, full as difficult to be kept in obedience.

With regard to the high aristocratic spirit of Virginia and the southern colonies, it has been proposed, I know, to reduce it, by declaring a general enfranchisement of their slaves. This project has had its advocates and panegyrists, yet I never could argue myself into an opinion of it. Slaves are often much attached to their masters. A general wild offer of liberty would not always be accepted. History furnishes few instances of it. It is sometimes as hard to persuade slaves to be free as it is to compel freemen to be slaves; and in this auspicious scheme we should have both these pleasing tasks on our hands at once. But when we talk of enfranchisement do we not perceive that the American master may enfranchise, too, and arm servile hands in defence of freedom? A measure to which other people have had recourse more than once, and not without success, in a desperate situation of their affairs.

Slaves as these unfortunate black people are, and dull as all men are from slavery, must they not a little suspect the offer of freedom from that very nation which has sold them to their present masters?—From that nation, one of whose causes of quarrel with those masters is their refusal to deal any more in men, not decent; for minds tinctured with humanity, not mild and merciful.

Perhaps, sir, I am mistaken in my idea of an empire as distinguished from a single state or kingdom. But my idea of it is this: that an empire is the aggregate of many states under one common head whether this head be a monarch or a presiding republic. It does, in such constitutions, frequently happen (and nothing but the dismal, cold, dead uniformity of servitude can prevent its happening) that the subordinate parts have many local privileges and immunities. Between these privileges and the supreme common authority the line may be extremely nice. Of course disputes—often, too, very bitter disputes, and much ill blood, will arise. But, though every privilege is an exemption, in the case, from the ordinary exercise of the supreme authority, it is no denial of it. The claim of a privilege seems rather, ex vi termini,¹ to imply a superior power; for to talk of the privileges of a state or of a person who has no superior is hardly any better than speaking nonsense. Now, in such unfortunate quarrels among the component parts of a great political union of communities I can scarcely conceive anything more completely imprudent than for the head of the empire to insist that, if any privilege is pleaded against his will or his acts, his whole authority is denied; instantly to proclaim rebellion, to beat to arms, and to put the offending provinces under the ban. Will not this, sir, very soon teach the provinces to make no distinctions on their part? Will it not teach them that the government against which a claim of liberty is tantamount to high treason is a government to which submission is equivalent to slavery? It may not always be quite convenient to impress dependent communities with such an idea.

We are, indeed, in all disputes with the colonies, by the necessity of things, the judge. It is true, sir; but I confess that the character of judge in my own cause is a thing that frightens me. Instead of filling me with pride, I am exceedingly humbled by it. I cannot proceed with a stern, assured, judicial confidence until I find myself in something more like a judicial character. I must have these hesitations as long as I am compelled to recollect that, in my little reading upon such contests as these, the sense of mankind has at least as often decided against the superior as the subordinate power. Sir, let me add, too, that the opinion of my having some abstract right in my favor would not put me much at my ease in passing sentence, unless I could be sure that there were no rights which in their exercise under certain circumstances were not the most odious of all wrongs, and the most vexatious of all injustice. Sir, these considerations have great weight with me when I find things so circumstanced that I see the same party at once a civil litigant against me in point of right and a culprit before me; while I sit as criminal judge on acts of his whose moral quality is to be decided on upon the merits of that very litigation. Men are every now and then put, by the complexity of human affairs, into strange situations; but justice is the same, let the judge be in what situation he will.

In this situation let us seriously and coolly ponder. What is it we have got by all our menaces, which have been many and ferocious? What advantage have we derived from the penal laws we have passed, and which, for the time, have been severe and numerous? What advances have we made toward our object by the sending of a force which, by land and sea, is no contemptible strength? Has the disorder abated? Nothing less. When I see things in this situation, after such confident hopes, bold promises, and active exertions, I cannot, for my life, avoid a suspicion that the plan itself is not correctly right.

If, then, the removal of the causes of this spirit of American liberty be, for the greater part, or rather entirely, impracticable; if the ideas of criminal process be inapplicable, or, if applicable, are in the highest degree inexpedient, what way yet remains? No way is open but the third and last—to comply with the American spirit as necessary, or, if you please, to submit to it as a necessary evil.

If we adopt this mode, if we mean to conciliate and concede, let us see of what nature the concessions ought to be. To ascertain the nature of our concession we must look at their complaint. The colonies complain that they have not the characteristic mark and seal of British freedom. They complain that they are taxed in Parliament in which they are not represented. If you mean to satisfy them at all you must satisfy them with regard to this complaint. If you mean to please any people you must give them the boon which they ask; not what you may think better for them, but of a kind totally different. Such an act may be a wise regulation, but it is no concession, whereas our present theme is the mode of giving satisfaction.

Sir, I think you must perceive that I am resolved this day to have nothing at all to do with the question of the right of taxation. Some gentlemen startle, but it is true. I put it totally out of the question. It is less than nothing in my consideration. I do not, indeed, wonder, nor will you, sir, that gentlemen of profound learning are fond of displaying it on this profound subject. But my consideration is narrow, confined, and wholly limited to the policy of the question. I do not examine whether the giving away a man's money be a power excepted and reserved out of the general trust of government, and how far all mankind, in all forms of polity, are entitled to an exercise of that right by the charter of nature; or whether, on the contrary, a right of taxation is necessarily involved in the general principle of legislation, and inseparable from the ordinary supreme power. These are deep questions, where great names militate against each other; where reason is perplexed; and an appeal to authorities only thickens the confusion; for high and reverend authorities lift up their heads on both sides, and there is no sure footing in the middle. The point is

That Serbionian bog
Betwixt Damietta and Mount Cassius old,
Where armies whole have sunk.¹

I do not intend to be overwhelmed in this bog, though in such respectable company. The question with me is, not whether you have a right to render your people miserable, but whether it is not your interest to make them happy. It is not what a lawyer tells me I may do, but what humanity, reason, and justice tell me I ought to do. Is a politic act the worse for being a generous one? Is no concession proper but that which is made from your want of right to keep what you grant? Or does it lessen the grace or dignity of relaxing in the exercise of an odious claim, because you have your evidence-room full of titles, and your magazines stuffed with arms to enforce them? What signify all those titles and all those arms? Of what avail are they when the reason of the thing tells me that the assertion of my title is the loss of my suit, and that I could do nothing but wound myself by the use of my own weapons?

I am not determining a point of law. I am restoring tranquillity, and the general character and situation of a people must determine what sort of government is fitted for them. That point nothing else can or ought to determine.

My idea, therefore, without considering whether we yield as matter of right, or grant as matter of favor, is to admit the people of our colonies into an interest in the constitution, and, by recording that admission in the journals of Parliament, to give them as strong an assurance as the nature of the thing will admit that we mean forever to adhere to that solemn declaration of systematic indulgence.

Here the speaker showed the futility of taxation of the colonies, and answered the contention of those who wished to retain the taxes, since if these were abolished the colonists would instantly attack the Trade Laws.

These gentlemen are convinced that this was the intention from the beginning, and the quarrel of the Americans with taxation was no more than a cloak and cover to this design. I am, sir, not a little surprised at this kind of discourse, and I am the more surprised, on account of the arguments which I constantly find in company with it, and which are often urged from the same mouths and on the same day.

For instance, when we allege that it is against reason to tax a people under so many restraints in trade as the Americans, the noble lord in the blue ribbon [Lord North] shall tell you that the restraints on trade are futile and useless; of no advantage to us, and of no burden to those on whom they are imposed; that the trade of America is not secured by the acts of navigation, but by the natural and irresistible advantage of a commercial preference.

But when strong internal circumstances are urged against the taxes; when the scheme is dissected; when experience and the nature of things are brought to prove, and do prove, the utter impossibility of obtaining an effective revenue from the colonies; then, sir, the sleeping trade laws revive from their trance, and this useless taxation is to be kept sacred, not for its own sake, but as a counterguard and security of the laws of trade.

Then, sir, you keep up revenue laws which are mischievous in order to preserve trade laws that are useless. Such is the wisdom of our plan in both its members. They are separately given up as of no value, and yet one is always to be defended for the sake of the other. But I cannot agree with the noble lord, nor with the pamphlet from whence he seems to have borrowed these ideas, concerning the inutility of the trade laws¹; for, without idolizing them, I am sure they are still, in many ways, of great use to us; and in former times they have been of the greatest.

One fact is clear and indisputable. The public and avowed origin of this quarrel was on taxation. This quarrel has, indeed, brought on new disputes on new questions, but certainly the least bitter, and the fewest of all, on the trade laws. To judge which of the two be the real radical cause of quarrel, we have to see whether the commercial dispute did, in order of time, precede the dispute on taxation. There is not a shadow of evidence for it. Next, to enable us to judge whether at this moment a dislike to the trade laws be the real cause of quarrel, it is absolutely necessary to put the taxes out of the question by a repeal. See how the Americans act in this position, and then you will be able to discern correctly what is the true object of the controversy, or whether any controversy at all will remain. Unless you consent to remove this cause of difference it is impossible, with decency, to assert that the dispute is not upon what it is avowed to be. And I would, sir, recommend to your serious consideration whether it be prudent to form a rule for punishing people, not on their own acts, but on your conjectures. Surely it is preposterous at the very best. It is not justifying your anger by their misconduct, but it is converting your ill will into their delinquency.

But the colonies will go farther. Alas! alas! when will this speculating against fact and reason end? What will quiet these panic fears which we entertain of the hostile effect of a conciliatory conduct? Is it true that no case can exist in which it is proper for the sovereign to accede to the desires of his discontented subjects? Is there anything peculiar in this case to make a rule for itself? Is all authority of course lost when it is not pushed to the extreme? Is it a certain maxim that the fewer causes of dissatisfaction are left by government the more the subject will be inclined to resist and rebel?

Here the speaker entered into the subject of the constitutional relations of England with Ireland, Wales, Chester and Durham.

England, at the conquest of Ireland, extended to that country English laws and liberties.

This benefit, I confess, was not at first extended to all Ireland. Mark the consequence. English authority and English liberty had exactly the same boundaries.² Your standard could never be advanced an inch before your privileges. Sir John Davis³

¹I. e., they were limited by "The Pale," or the district of English settlement.

shows beyond a doubt that the refusal of a general communication of these rights was the true cause why Ireland was five hundred years in subduing; and, after the vain projects of a military government attempted in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, it was soon discovered that nothing could make that country English in civility and allegiance but your laws and your forms of legislature. It was not English arms, but the English constitution, that conquered Ireland. From that time Ireland has ever had a general Parliament, as she had before a partial Parliament. This has made Ireland the great and flourishing kingdom that it is; and, from a disgrace and a burden intolerable to this nation, has rendered her a principal part of our strength and ornament. This country cannot be said to have ever formally taxed her. Your Irish pensioners would starve if they had no other fund to live on than taxes granted by English authority. Turn your eyes to those popular grants from whence all your great supplies are come, and learn to respect that only source of public wealth in the British empire.

My next example is Wales. This country was said to be reduced by Henry the Third. It was said more truly to be so by Edward the First.

Parliament attempted to subdue the fierce spirit of the Welsh by all sorts of rigorous laws. They prohibited by statute the sending all sorts of arms into Wales, as you prohibit by proclamation (with something more of doubt on the legality) the sending arms to America. They disarmed the Welsh by statute, as you attempted (but still with more question on the legality) to disarm New England by an instruction. They made an act to drag offenders from Wales into England for trial, as you have done (but with more hardship) with regard to America. By another act, where one of the parties was an Englishman, they ordained that his trial should be always by English. They made acts to restrain trade, as you do; and they prevented the Welsh from the use of fairs and markets, as you do the Americans from fisheries and foreign ports.

Here we rub our hands—a fine body of precedents for the authority of Parliament and the use of it—I admit it fully; and pray add likewise to these precedents that all the while Wales rid this kingdom like an incubus; that it was an unprofitable and oppressive burden; and that an Englishman traveling in that country could not go six yards from the highroad without being murdered.

The march of the human mind is slow. Sir, it was not until after two hundred years discovered that, by an eternal law, ter and Durham, surrounded by abundance of representation that is actual and palpable! But, sir, your ancestors thought this sort of virtual representation, however ample, to be totally insufficient for the freedom of the inhabitants of territories that are so near, and comparatively so inconsiderable. How, then, can I think it sufficient for those which are infinitely greater and infinitely more remote?

You will now, sir, perhaps imagine that I am on the point of proposing to you a scheme for representation of the colonies in Parliament. Perhaps I might be inclined to entertain some such thought, but a great flood stops me in my course. *Opposuit natura.*¹ I cannot remove the eternal barriers of the creation. The thing in that mode I do not know to be possible. As I meddle with no theory, I do not absolutely assert the impracticability of such a representation; but I do not see my way to it; and those who have been more confident have not been more successful. However, the arm of public benevolence is not shortened, and there are often several means to the same end. What nature has disjoined in one way wisdom may unite in another. When we cannot give the benefit as we would wish let us not refuse it altogether. If we cannot give the principal let us find a substitute. But how? Where? What substitute?

Fortunately I am not obliged for the ways and means of this substitute to tax my own unproductive invention. I am not even obliged to go to the rich treasury of the fertile framers of imaginary commonwealths; not to the Republic of Plato, not to the Utopia of More, not to the Oceana of Harrington. It is before me. It is at my feet.

And the dull swain
Treads daily on it with his clouted shoon.²

I only wish you to recognize, for the theory, the ancient constitutional policy of this kingdom with regard to representation as that policy has been declared in acts of Parliament; and, as to the practice, to return to that mode which a uniform experience has marked out to you as best, and in which you walked with security, advantage, and honor, until the year 1763.

My resolutions, therefore, mean to establish the equity and justice of a taxation of America, by grant and not by imposition. To mark the legal competency of the colony assemblies for the support of their government in peace, and for public aids in time of war. To acknowledge that this legal competency has had a dutiful and beneficial exercise; and that experience has shown

² From Milton's "Comus," slightly misquoted.

Providence had decreed vexation to violence, and poverty to rapine. Your ancestors did, however, at length open their eyes to the ill husbandry of injustice. They found that the tyranny of a free people could of all tyrannies the least be endured, and that laws made against a whole nation were not the most effectual methods for securing its obedience. Accordingly, in the twenty-seventh year of Henry VIII, the course was entirely altered. With a preamble stating the entire and perfect rights of the Crown of England, it gave to the Welsh all the rights and privileges of English subjects. A political order was established; the military power gave way to the civil; the marches were turned into counties. But that a nation should have a right to English liberties, and yet no share at all in the fundamental security of these liberties, the grant of their own property, seemed a thing so incongruous that eight years after, that is, in the thirty-fifth of that reign, a complete and not ill-proportioned representation by counties and boroughs was bestowed upon Wales by act of Parliament. From that moment, as by a charm, the tumults subsided; obedience was restored; peace, order, and civilization followed in the train of liberty. When the day-star of the English constitution had arisen in their hearts all was harmony within and without.¹

The speaker followed with the cases of Chester and Durham (which at one time were counties palatine, or possessed of royal privileges), and deduced from them the same point.

Now, if the doctrines of policy contained in these preambles, and the force of these examples in the acts of Parliament, avail anything, what can be said against applying them with regard to America? Are not the people of America as much Englishmen as the Welsh? The preamble of the act of Henry VIII says, the Welsh speak a language no way resembling that of His Majesty's English subjects. Is America in rebellion? Wales was hardly ever free from it. Have you attempted to govern America by penal statutes? You made fifteen for Wales. But your legislative authority is perfect with regard to America. Was it less perfect in Wales, Chester, and Durham? But America is virtually represented. What! does the electric force of virtual representation more easily pass over the Atlantic than pervade Wales, which lies in your neighborhood; or than Ches-the benefit of their grants, and the futility of parliamentary taxation as a method of supply.

These solid truths compose six fundamental propositions. There are three more resolutions corollary to these. If you admit the first set, you can hardly reject the others. But if you admit the first, I shall be far from solicitous whether you accept or refuse the last. I think these six massive pillars will be of strength sufficient to support the temple of British concord. I have no more doubt than I entertain of my existence that, if you admitted these, you would command an immediate peace; and, with but tolerable future management, a lasting obedience in America. I am not arrogant in this confident assurance. The propositions are all mere matters of fact; and if they are such facts as draw irresistible conclusions even in the stating, this is the power of truth, and not any management of mine.

Here the speaker presented his propositions, which were to the effect:

1. That the colonies were not represented in Parliament;
2. That they were nevertheless taxed to the prejudice of their interests;
- [This is inferentially admitted in Lord North's proposition.]
3. That from distance and other circumstances no plan has been devised for such representation;
4. That each of the colonies had a popular legislature with taxing power;
5. That these legislatures have responded to requests from the British Government for grants to the King's service, and the right to do so has been acknowledged by Parliament;

[Also, they have contributed voluntarily and to satiety men and money to the defence of the empire in the French and Indian wars, as acknowledged by Parliament.]

6. That grants of such a nature are more agreeable to the colonies than taxes.

The conclusion is irresistible. You cannot say that you were driven by any necessity to an exercise of the utmost rights of legislature. You cannot assert that you took on yourselves the task of imposing colony taxes from the want of another legal body that is competent to the purpose of supplying the exigencies of the state without wounding the prejudices of the people. Neither is it true that the body so qualified, and having that competence, had neglected the duty.

The question now on all this accumulated matter is—whether you will choose to abide by a profitable experience, or a mischievous theory; whether you choose to build on imagination or fact; whether you prefer enjoyment or hope; satisfaction in your subjects or discontent?

Therefore, proposed Burke, (1) all taxes and repressive acts growing out of the same, such as the Boston Port Bill, are repealed, and the Act for the Trial of Treason committed out of the King's dominions [35th year of Henry VIII] is amended, to confine it to its proper bounds and original intentions, i. e., expressly for trial of treasons in places where the jurisdiction of the Crown does not extend;

2. Judges, paid by the colonial legislatures, shall hold office during good behavior, and not be removed except on complaint of the legislatures and colonial officers;

3. Courts of Admiralty shall be made more commodious for suitors and sued, and the judges put on decent salaries.

These courts I do not wish to take away. They are in themselves proper establishments. This court is one of the capital securities of the Act of Navigation. But courts incommodiously situated in effect deny justice; and a court partaking in the fruits of its own condemnation is a robber. The Congress complain, and complain justly, of this grievance.

These are the three consequential propositions. I have thought of two or three more, but they come rather too near detail, and to the province of executive government, which I wish Parliament always to superintend, never to assume. If the first six are granted congruity will carry the latter three. If not, the things that remain unrepealed will be, I hope, rather unseemly encumbrances on the building than very materially detrimental to its strength and stability.

I do not know that the colonies have, in any general way or in any cool hour, gone much beyond the demand of immunity in relation to taxes. It is not fair to judge of the temper or dispositions of any man, or any set of men, when they are composed and at rest, from their conduct or their expressions in a state of disturbance and irritation. It is, besides, a very great mistake to imagine that mankind follow up practically any speculative principle, either of government or freedom, as far as it will go in argument and logical illation. We Englishmen stop very short of the principles upon which we support any given part of our constitution, or even the whole of it together. This is nothing but what is natural and proper. All government, indeed every human benefit and enjoyment, every virtue and every prudent act, is founded on compromise and barter. We balance inconveniences; we give and take; we remit some rights that we may enjoy others; and we choose rather to be happy citizens than subtle disputants. As we must give away some natural liberty to enjoy civil advantages, so we must sacrifice some civil liberties for the advantages to be derived from the communion and fellowship of a great empire. But in all fair dealings the thing bought must bear some proportion to the purchase paid. None will barter away "the immediate jewel of his soul."¹ Though a great house is apt to make slaves haughty, yet it is purchasing a part of the artificial importance of a great empire too dear to pay for it all essential rights and all the intrinsic dignity of human nature. None of us who would not risk his life rather than fall under a government purely arbitrary. But, although there are some among us who think our constitution wants many improvements to make it a complete system of liberty, perhaps none who are of that opinion would think it right to aim at such improvement by disturbing his country and risking every thing that is dear to him. In every arduous enterprise we consider what we are to lose as well as what we are to gain; and the more and better stake of liberty every people possess, the less they will hazard in a vain attempt to make it more. These are the cords of man.² Man acts from adequate motive relative to his interest, and not on metaphysical speculations. Aristotle, the great master of reasoning, cautions us, and with great weight and propriety, against this species of delusive geometrical accuracy in moral arguments as the most fallacious of all sophistry.³

The Americans will have no interest contrary to the grandeur and glory of England when they are not oppressed by the weight of it; and they will rather be inclined to respect the acts of a superintending legislature when they see them the acts of that power which is itself the security, not the rival, of their secondary importance. In this assurance my mind most perfectly acquiesces, and I confess I feel not the least alarm from the discontents which are to arise from putting people at their ease; nor do I apprehend the destruction of this empire from giving, by an act of free grace and indulgence, to two millions of my fellow-citizens some share of those rights upon which I have always been taught to value myself.

It is said, indeed, that this power of granting, vested in American assemblies, would dissolve the unity of the empire, which was preserved entire, although Wales, and Chester, and Durham were added to it. Truly, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what this unity means, nor has it ever been heard of, that I know, in the constitutional policy of this country. The very idea of subordination of parts excludes this notion of simple and undivided unity. England is the head, but she is not the head and the members, too. Ireland has ever had from the beginning a separate, but not an independent, legislature, which, far from distracting, promoted the union of the whole. Everything was sweetly and harmoniously disposed through both islands for the conservation of English dominion and the communication of English liberties. I do not see that the same principles might not be carried into twenty islands, and with the same good effect. This is my model with regard to America, as far as the internal circumstances of the two countries are the same. I know no other unity of this empire than I can draw from its example during these periods, when it seemed to my poor understanding more united than it is now, or than it is likely to be by the present methods.

I promised, before I finished, to say something of the proposition of the noble lord [Lord North].

First, then, I cannot admit that proposition of a ransom by auction, because it is a mere project. It is a thing now; unheard of; supported by no experience; justified by no analogy; without example of our ancestors, or root in the constitution. It is neither regular parliamentary taxation nor colony grant. "Experimentum in corpore vili"¹ is a good rule, which will ever make me adverse to any trial of experiments on what is certainly the most valuable of all subjects, the peace of this empire.

Secondly, it is an experiment which must be fatal, in the end, to our constitution. For what is it but a scheme for taxing the colonies in the ante-chamber of the noble lord and his successors? To settle the quotas and proportions in this House is clearly impossible. You, sir, may flatter yourself you shall sit a state auctioneer with your hammer in your hand, and knock down to each colony as it bids. But to settle (on the plan laid down by the noble lord) the true proportional payment for four or five-and-twenty governments according to the absolute and the relative wealth of each, and according to the British proportion of wealth and burden, is a wild and chimerical notion. This new taxation must therefore come in by the back door of the constitution. Each quota must be brought to this House ready formed; you can neither add nor alter. You must register it. You can do nothing farther. For on what grounds can you deliberate, either before or after the proposition? You cannot hear the counsel for all these provinces, quarreling each on its own quantity of payment, and its proportion to others. If you should attempt it the committee of provincial ways and means, or by whatever other name it will delight to be called, must swallow up all the time of Parliament.

Thirdly, it does not give satisfaction to the complaint of the colonies. They complain that they are taxed without their consent; you answer that you will fix the sum at which they shall be taxed. That is, you give them the very grievance for the remedy. You tell them indeed, that you will leave the mode to themselves. I really beg pardon. It gives me pain to mention it; but you must be sensible that you will not perform this part of the contract. For, suppose the colonies were to lay the duties which furnished their contingent upon the importation of your manufactures, you know you would never suffer such a tax to be laid. You know, too, that you would not suffer many other modes of taxation; so that, when you come to explain yourself, it will be found that you will neither leave to themselves the quantum nor the mode, nor, indeed, any thing. The whole is delusion from one end to the other.

Fourthly, this method of ransom by auction, unless it be universally accepted, will plunge you into great and inextricable difficulties. In what year of our Lord are the proportions of payments to be settled, to say nothing of the impossibility that colony agents should have general powers of taxing the colonies at their discretion? Consider, I implore you, that the communication by special messages, and orders between these agents and their constituents on each variation of the case, when the parties come to contend together and to dispute on their relative proportions, will be a matter of delay, perplexity, and confusion that never can have an end.

If all the colonies do not appear at the outcry what is the condition of those assemblies who offer, by themselves or their agents, to tax themselves up to your ideas of their proportion? The refractory colonies who refuse all composition will remain taxed only to your old impositions, which, however grievous in principle, are trifling as to production. The obedient colonies in this scheme are heavily taxed; the refractory remain unburdened. What will you do? Will you lay new and heavier taxes by Parliament on the disobedient? Pray consider in what way you can do it. You are perfectly convinced that in the way of taxing you can do nothing but at the ports. Now suppose it is Virginia that refuses to appear at your auction, while Maryland and North Carolina bid handsomely for their ransom, and are taxed to your quota. How will you put these colonies on a par? Will you tax the tobacco of Virginia? If you do you give its death wound to your English revenue at home, and to one of the very greatest articles of your own foreign trade. If you tax the import of that rebellious colony, what do you tax but your own manufactures, or the goods of some other obedient and already well-taxed colony? Who has said one word on this labyrinth of detail, which bewilders you more and more as you enter into it? Who has presented, who can present you with a clew to lead you out of it? I think, sir, it is impossible that you should not recollect that the colony bounds are so implicated in one another (you know it by your own experiments in the bill for prohibiting the New England fishery) that you can lay no possible restraints on almost any of them which may not be presently eluded if you do not confound the innocent with the guilty, and burden those whom, upon every principle, you ought to exonerate. He must be grossly ignorant of America who thinks that, without falling into this confusion of all rules of equity and policy, you can restrain any single colony, especially Virginia and Maryland, the central and most important of them all.

Let it also be considered that either in the present confusion you settle a permanent contingent which will and must be trifling, and then you have no effectual revenue, or you change the quota at every exigency, and then on every new repartition you will have a new quarrel.

Reflect, besides, that, when you have fixed a quota for every colony you have not provided for prompt and punctual payment. Suppose one, two, five, ten years arrears. You cannot issue a Treasury Extent¹ against the failing colony. You must make

But what, says the financier, is peace to us without money? Your plan gives us no revenue. No! But it does—for it secures to the subject the power of REFUSAL—the first of all revenues. Experience is a cheat, and fact a liar, if this power in the subject of proportioning his grant, or of not granting at all, has not been found the richest mine of revenue ever discovered by the skill or by the fortune of man. It does not indeed vote you £152,750 11s. 2s. 4d., nor any other paltry limited sum, but it gives the strong box itself, the fund, the bank, from whence only revenues can arise among a people sensible of freedom: Posita luditur arca.¹

Cannot you in England; cannot you at this time of day; cannot you—a House of Commons—trust to the principle which has raised so mighty a revenue, and accumulated a debt of near one hundred and forty millions in this country? Is this principle to be true in England and false everywhere else? Is it not true in Ireland? Has it not hitherto been true in the colonies? Why should you presume that, in any country, a body duly constituted for any functions will neglect to perform its duty, and abdicate its trust? Such a presumption would go against all government in all modes. But in truth this dread of penury of supply from a free assembly has no foundation in nature. For first observe that, besides the desire, which all men have naturally, of supporting the honor of their own government, that sense of dignity and that security of property which ever attends freedom have a tendency to increase the stock of the free community. Most may be taken where most is accumulated. And what is the soil or climate where experience has not uniformly proved that the voluntary flow of heaped-up plenty, bursting from the weight of its own rich luxuriance, has ever run with a more copious stream of revenue than could be squeezed from the dry husks of oppressed indigence by the straining of all the politic machinery in the world?

I, for one, protest against compounding our demands. I declare against compounding, for a poor limited sum, the immense ever-growing, eternal debt which is due to generous government from protected freedom. And so may I speed in the great object I propose to you, as I think it would not only be an act of injustice, but would be the worst economy in the world, to compel the colonies to a sum certain, either in the way of ransom or in the way of compulsory compact.

But to clear up my ideas on this subject; a revenue from America transmitted hither—do not delude yourselves—you new Boston Port bills, new restraining laws, new acts for dragging men to England for trial. You must send out new fleets, new armies. All is to begin again. From this day forward the empire is never to know an hour's tranquillity. An intestine fire will be kept alive in the bowels of the colonies which one time or another must consume this whole empire. I allow, indeed, that the empire of Germany raises her revenue and her troops by quotas and contingents; but the revenue of the empire, and the army of the empire, is the worst revenue and the worst army in the world.

Instead of a standing revenue you will therefore have a perpetual quarrel. Indeed, the noble lord who proposed this project of a ransom by auction seemed himself to be of that opinion. His project was rather designed for breaking the union of the colonies than for establishing a revenue. He confessed that he apprehended that his proposal would not be to their taste. I say this scheme of disunion seems to be at the bottom of the project; for I will not suspect that the noble lord meant nothing but merely to delude the nation by an airy phantom which he never intended to realize. But, whatever his views may be, as I propose the peace and union of the colonies as the very foundation of my plan, it cannot accord with one whose foundation is perpetual discord.

Compare the two. This I offer to give you is plain and simple. The other, full of perplexed and intricate mazes. This is mild; that harsh. This is found by experience effectual for its purposes; the other is a new project. This is universal; the other calculated for certain colonies only. This is immediate in its conciliatory operation; the other remote, contingent, full of hazard. Mine is what becomes the dignity of a ruling people; gratuitous, unconditional, and not held out as matter of bargain and sale. I have done my duty in proposing it to you. I have indeed tired you by a long discourse; but this is the misfortune of those to whose influence nothing will be conceded, and who must win every inch of their ground by argument. You have heard me with goodness. May you decide with wisdom! For my part, I feel my mind greatly disburdened by what I have done to-day. I have been the less fearful of trying your patience because on this subject I mean to spare it altogether in future. I have this comfort that, in every stage of the American affairs, I have steadily opposed the measures that have produced the confusion and may bring on the destruction of this empire. I now go so far as to risk a proposal of my own. If I cannot give peace to my country, I give it to my conscience.

never can receive it—no, not a shilling. We have experienced that from remote countries it is not to be expected. If, when you attempted to extract revenue from Bengal, you were obliged to return in loan what you had taken in imposition, what can you expect from North America—for certainly, if ever there was a country qualified to produce wealth, it is India; or an institution fit for the transmission, it is the East India Company. America has none of these aptitudes. If America gives you taxable objects on which you lay your duties here, and gives you at the same time a surplus by a foreign sale of her commodities to pay the duties on these objects which you tax at home, she has performed her part to the British revenue. But with regard to her own internal establishments she may, I doubt not she will, contribute in moderation; I say in moderation, for she ought not to be permitted to exhaust herself. She ought to be reserved to a war, the weight of which, with the enemies that we are most likely to have, must be considerable in her quarter of the globe. There she may serve you, and serve you essentially.

For that service, for all service, whether of revenue, trade, or empire, my trust is in her interest in the British constitution. My hold of the colonies is in the close affection which grows from common names, from kindred blood, from similar privileges, and equal protection. These are ties which, though light as air, are as strong as links of iron. Let the colonies always keep the idea of their civil rights associated with your government; they will cling and grapple to you, and no force under heaven will be of power to tear them from their allegiance. But let it be once understood that your government may be one thing, and their privileges another, that these two things may exist without any mutual relation, the cement is gone; the cohesion is loosened; and everything hastens to decay and dissolution. As long as you have the wisdom to keep the sovereign authority of this country as the sanctuary of liberty, the sacred temple consecrated to our common faith, wherever the chosen race and sons of England worship Freedom they will turn their faces toward you. The more they multiply the more friends you will have. The more ardently they love liberty the more perfect will be their obedience. Slavery they can have anywhere. It is a weed that grows in every soil. They may have it from Spain; they may have it from Prussia; but, until you become lost to all feeling of your true interest and your natural dignity, freedom they can have from none but you. This is the commodity of price of which you have the monopoly. This is the true Act of Navigation which binds to you the commerce of the colonies, and through them secures to you the wealth of the world. Deny them this participation of freedom and you break that sole bond which originally made, and must still preserve, the unity of the empire. Do not entertain so weak an imagination as that your registers and your bonds, your affidavits and your sufferances, your cockets and your clearances, are what form the great securities of your commerce. Do not dream that your letters of office, and your instructions, and your suspending clauses, are the things that hold together the great contexture of this mysterious whole. These things do not make your government. Dead instruments, passive tools as they are, it is the spirit of the English communion that gives all their life and efficacy to them. It is the spirit of the English constitution which, infused through the mighty mass, pervades, feeds, unites, invigorates, vivifies every part of the empire, even down to the minutest member.

All this, I know well enough, will sound wild and chimerical to the profane herd of those vulgar and mechanical politicians who think that nothing exists but what is gross and material, and who, therefore, far from being qualified to be directors of the great movement of empire, are not fit to turn a wheel in the machine. But to men truly initiated these master principles are, in truth, all in all. Magnanimity in politics is not seldom the truest wisdom; and a great empire and little minds go ill together.

If we are conscious of our situation, and glow with zeal to fill our place as becomes our station and ourselves, we ought to auspicate all our public proceeding on America with the old warning of the church, sursum corda! We ought to elevate our minds to the greatness of that trust to which the order of Providence has called us. By adverting to the dignity of this high calling our ancestors have turned a savage wilderness into a glorious empire, and have made the most extensive and the only honorable conquests, not by destroying, but by promoting, the wealth, the number, the happiness of the human race. Let us get an American revenue as we have got an American empire. English privileges have made it all that it is; English privileges alone will make it all it can be.

In full confidence of this unalterable truth I now, quod felix faustumque sit,¹ lay the first stone in the temple of peace; and I move you the first of my propositions.

This was defeated, 270 votes to 78. The others were not put to vote, since it was apparent that Parliament was determined at all costs to assert supremacy over the colonies. Later, when the war that resulted from this determination had fully justified all his predictions of dishonor to British arms, Burke thus commented upon the disastrous obstinacy of the Government:

THE RIGHT TO TAX AMERICA

EDMUND BURKE

But, Mr. Speaker, "we have a right to tax America." Oh, inestimable right! Oh, wonderful, transcendent right! the assertion of which has cost this country thirteen provinces, six islands, one hundred thousand lives, and seventy millions of money. Oh, invaluable right! for the sake of which we have sacrificed our rank among nations, our importance abroad, and our happiness at home! Oh, right! more dear to us than our existence, which has already cost us so much, and which seems likely to cost us our all. Infatuated man! Miserable and undone country! not to know that the claim of right, without the power of enforcing it, is nugatory and idle. We have a right to tax America, the noble lord tells us, therefore we ought to tax America. This is the profound logic which comprises the whole chain of his reasoning.

Not inferior to this was the wisdom of him who resolved to shear the wolf. What, shear a wolf! Have you considered the resistance, the difficulty, the danger of the attempt? No, says the madman, I have considered nothing but the right. Man has a right of dominion over the beasts of the forest; and therefore I will shear the wolf.

How wonderful that a nation could be thus deluded! But the noble lord deals in cheats and delusions. They are the daily traffic of his invention; and he will continue to play off his cheats on this House, so long as he thinks them necessary to his purpose, and so long as he has money enough at command to bribe gentlemen to pretend that they believe him. But a black and bitter day of reckoning will surely come; and whenever the day comes I trust I shall be able, by a parliamentary impeachment, to bring upon the heads of the authors of our calamities the punishment they deserve.

COLONIES VS. PARLIAMENT

Speech of James Wilson: "In Vindication of the Colonies"—The Virginia Convention; Resolutions of Patrick Henry to Adopt Defensive Measures: they are opposed by Richard Bland, Benjamin Harrison, Robert Carter Nicholas and Edmund Pendleton; they are supported by Henry in his Speech "Liberty or Death!"—Preparations for Armed Defence—The Battle of Lexington and Concord—"Appeal to the British People by the Massachusetts Convention"—The Second Continental Congress—Address to the British People (drafted by Richard Henry Lee)—Congress Rejects Lord North's Plan of Conciliation—George Washington Appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Army—Washington's Speech of Acceptance—"Declaration to the World" by Congress (drafted by John Dickinson)—Preparations for Defence—Repressive Acts of Parliament.

IN January, 1775, a convention of the province of Pennsylvania met at Philadelphia to take action on the King's speech at the opening of Parliament (see page 99).

A prominent member of this convention was James Wilson, a man to whom the country was afterwards to be largely indebted for his influential part in the formation of its constitution.

He delivered the following speech before the convention:

IN VINDICATION OF THE COLONIES

JAMES WILSON

MR. CHAIRMAN—Whence, sir, proceeds all the invidious and ill-grounded clamor against the colonists of America? Why are they stigmatized in Britain, as licentious and ungovernable? Why is their virtuous opposition to the illegal attempts of their governors represented under the falsest colors, and placed in the most ungracious point of view? This opposition, when exhibited in its true light, and when viewed, with unjaundiced eyes, from a proper situation, and at a proper distance, stands confessed the lovely offspring of freedom. It breathes the spirit of its parent. Of this ethereal spirit the whole conduct, and particularly the late conduct of the colonists, has shown them eminently possessed. It has animated and regulated every part of their proceedings. It has been recognized to be genuine by all those symptoms and effects by which it has been distinguished in other ages and other countries. It has been calm and regular: it has not acted without occasion: it has not acted disproportionately to the occasion. As the attempts, open or secret, to undermine or to destroy it have been repeated or enforced, in a just degree its vigilance and its vigor have been exerted to defeat or to disappoint them. As its exertions have been sufficient for those purposes hitherto let us hence draw a joyful prognostic that they will continue sufficient for those purposes hereafter. It is not yet exhausted; it will still operate irresistibly whenever a necessary occasion shall call forth its strength.

Permit me, sir, by appealing, in a few instances, to the spirit and conduct of the colonists, to evince that what I have said of them is just. Did they disclose any uneasiness at the proceedings and claims of the British Parliament, before those claims and proceedings afforded a reasonable cause for it? Did they even disclose any uneasiness when a reasonable cause for it was first given? Our rights were invaded by their regulations of our internal policy. We submitted to them: we were unwilling to oppose them. The spirit of liberty was slow to act. When those invasions were renewed; when the efficacy and malignancy of them were attempted to be redoubled by the Stamp Act; when chains were formed for us; and preparations were made for riveting them on our limbs, what measures did we pursue? The spirit of liberty found it necessary now to act: but she acted with the calmness and decent dignity suited to her character. Were we rash or seditious? Did we discover want of loyalty to our Sovereign? Did we betray want of affection to our brethren in Britain? Let our dutiful and reverential petitions to the Throne—let our respectful, though firm, remonstrances to the Parliament—let our warm and affectionate addresses to our brethren, and (we will still call them) our friends in Great Britain—let all those, transmitted from every part of the continent, testify the truth. By their testimony let our conduct be tried.

As our proceedings, during the existence and operation of the Stamp Act, prove fully and incontestably the painful sensations that tortured our breasts from the prospect of disunion to store it up, or to send it back, as was done at other places. A number of persons, unknown, destroyed it.

Let us here make a concession to our enemies; let us suppose that the transaction deserves all the dark and hideous colors in which they have painted it; let us even suppose (for our cause admits of an excess of candor) that all their exaggerated accounts of it were confined strictly to the truth: what will follow? Will it follow that every British colony in America, or even the colony of Massachusetts Bay, or even the town of Boston, in that colony, merits the imputation of being factious and seditious? Let the frequent mobs and riots that have happened in Great Britain upon much more trivial occasions shame our calumniators into silence. Will it follow, because the rules of order and regular government were, in that instance, violated by the offenders, that, for this reason, the principles of the constitution, and the maxims of justice, must be violated by their punishment? Will it follow, because those who were guilty could not be known, that, therefore, those who were known not to be guilty must suffer? Will it follow that even the guilty should be condemned without being heard—that they should be condemned upon partial testimony, upon the representations of their avowed and embittered enemies? Why were they not tried in courts of justice, known to their constitution, and by juries of their neighborhood? Their courts and their juries were not, in the case of Captain Preston,¹ transported beyond the bounds of justice by their resentment: why, then, should it be presumed that, in the case of those offenders, they would be prevented from doing justice by their affection? But the colonists, it seems, must be stripped of their judicial, as well as of their legislative, powers. They must be bound by a legislature, they must be tried by a jurisdiction, not their own. Their constitutions must be changed: their liberties must be abridged: and those who shall be most infamously active in changing their constitutions and abridging their liberties must, by an express provision, be exempted from punishment.

I do not exaggerate the matter, sir, when I extend these observations to all the colonists. The Parliament meant to extend the effects of their proceedings to all the colonists. The plan on which their proceedings are formed extends to them all. From an incident of no very uncommon or atrocious nature, which happened in one colony, in one town in that colony, and in which only a few of the inhabitants of that town took a part, an occasion has been taken by those who probably intended it, with Britain; the peals of joy, which burst forth universally, upon the repeal of that odious statute, loudly proclaim the heartfelt delight produced in us by a reconciliation with her. Unsuspecting, because undesigned, we buried our complaints and the causes of them in oblivion, and returned, with eagerness, to our former unreserved confidence. Our connection with our parent country, and the reciprocal blessings resulting from it to her and to us, were the favorite and pleasing topics of our public discourses and our private conversations. Lulled in delightful security, we dreamed of nothing but increasing fondness and friendship, cemented and strengthened by a kind and perpetual communication of good offices. Soon, however, too soon, we were awakened from the soothing dreams! Our enemies renewed their designs against us, not with less malice, but with more art. Under the plausible pretence of regulating our trade, and, at the same time, of making provision for the administration of justice and the support of government, in some of the colonies, they pursued their scheme of depriving us of our property without our consent. As the attempts to distress us, and to degrade us to a rank inferior to that of freemen, appeared now to be reduced into a regular system, it became proper, on our part, to form a regular system for countering them. We ceased to import goods from Great Britain. Was this measure dictated by selfishness or by licentiousness? Did it not injure ourselves, while it injured the British merchants and manufacturers? Was it inconsistent with the peaceful demeanor of subjects to abstain from making purchases, when our freedom and our safety rendered it necessary for us to abstain from them? A regard for our freedom and our safety was our only motive; for no sooner had the Parliament, by repealing part of the revenue laws, inspired us with the flattering hopes that they had departed from their intentions of oppressing and of taxing us, than we forsook our plan for defeating those intentions, and began to import as formerly. Far from being peevish or captious, we took no public notice even of their declaratory law of dominion over us: our candor led us to consider it as a decent expedient of retreating from the actual exercise of that dominion.

But, alas! the root of bitterness still remained. The duty on tea was reserved to furnish occasion to the ministry for a new effort to enslave and to ruin us; and the East India Company were chosen, and consented to be the detested instruments of ministerial despotism and cruelty. A cargo of their tea arrived at Boston. By a low artifice of the governor, and by the wicked activity of the tools of government, it was rendered impossible and who certainly prepared the way for it, to impose upon that colony, and to lay a foundation and a precedent for imposing upon all the rest, a system of statutes, arbitrary, unconstitutional, oppressive, in every view, and in every degree subversive of the rights, and inconsistent with even the name of freemen.

Were the colonists so blind as not to discern the consequences of these measures? Were they so supinely inactive as to take no steps for guarding against them? They were not. They ought not to have been so. We saw a breach made in those barriers which our ancestors, British and American, with so much care, with so much danger, with so much treasure, and with so much blood had erected, cemented, and established for the security of their liberties, and—with filial piety let us mention it—of ours. We saw the attack actually begun upon one part: ought we to have folded our hands in indolence, to have lulled our eyes in slumbers, till the attack was carried on, so as to become irresistible in every part? But still our measures have been such as the spirit of liberty and of loyalty directed; not such as a spirit of sedition or of disaffection would pursue. Our counsels have been conducted without rashness and faction: our resolutions have been taken without frenzy or fury.

That the sentiments of every individual concerning that important object, his liberty, might be known and regarded meetings have been held and deliberations carried on in every particular district. That the sentiments of all those individuals might gradually and regularly be collected into a single point, and the conduct of each inspired and directed by the result of the whole united; county committees, provincial conventions, a Continental Congress have been appointed, have met and resolved. By this means a chain—more inestimable, and, while the necessity for it continues, we hope, more indissoluble than one of gold—a chain of freedom has been formed, of which every individual in these colonies who is willing to preserve the greatest of human blessings, his liberty, has the pleasure of beholding himself a link.

Are these measures, sir, the brats of disloyalty, of disaffection? There are miscreants among us, wags that suck poison from the most salubrious flowers, who tell us they are. They tell us that all those assemblies are unlawful, and unauthorized by our constitutions; and that all their deliberations and resolutions are so many transgressions of the duty of subjects. The utmost malice brooding over the utmost baseness, and nothing but such a hated commixture must have hatched this calumny. Do not those men know—would they have others not to know—that it was impossible for the inhabitants of the same province, and for the legislatures of the different provinces, to communicate their sentiments to one another in the modes appointed for such purposes, by their different constitutions? Do not they know—would they have others not to know—that all this was rendered impossible by those very persons who now, or whose minions now, urge this objection against us? Do not they know—would they have others not to know—that the different assemblies, who could be dissolved by the governors, were, in consequence of ministerial mandates, dissolved by them whenever they attempted to turn their attention to the greatest objects which, as guardians of the liberty of their constituents, could be presented to their view? The arch enemy of the human race torments them only for those actions to which he has tempted, but to which he has not necessarily obliged them. Those men refine even upon infernal malice: they accuse, they threaten us (superlative impudence!) for taking those very steps which we were laid under the disagreeable necessity of taking by themselves, or by those in whose hateful service they are enlisted.

As the invasions of our rights have become more and more formidable our opposition to them has increased in firmness and vigor, in a just, and in no more than a just, proportion. We will not import goods from Great Britain or Ireland; in a little time we will suspend our exportations to them; and, if the same illiberal and destructive system of policy be still carried on against us, in a little time more we will not consume their manufactures. In that colony where the attacks have been most open, immediate, and direct some further steps have been taken, and those steps have met with the deserved approbation of the other provinces.

Is this scheme of conduct allied to rebellion? Those who would blend, and whose crimes have made it necessary for them to blend, the tyrannic acts of administration with the lawful measures of government, and to veil every flagitious procedure of the ministry under the venerable mantle of majesty, pretend to discover, and employ their emissaries to publish the pretended discovery of such symptoms. We are not, however, to be imposed upon by such shallow artifices. No! we have not violated the laws or the constitution; and, therefore, we are safe as long as the laws retain their force and the constitution its vigor.

But we behold, sir, with the deepest anguish that our opposition has not been as effectual as it has been constitutional. The hearts of our oppressors have not relented; our complaints have not been heard; our grievances have not been redressed; our rights are still invaded: and have we no cause to dread that the invasions of them will be enforced, in a manner against which all reason and argument, and all opposition, of every peaceful kind, will be vain? Our opposition has hitherto increased with our oppression: shall it, in the most desperate of all contingencies, observe the same proportion?

Let us pause, sir, before we give an answer to this question. The fate of us; the fate of millions now alive; the fate of millions yet unborn, depends upon the answer. Let it be the result of calmness and intrepidity; let it be dictated by the principles of loyalty, and the principles of liberty. Let it be such as never, in the worst events, to give us reason to reproach ourselves, or others reason to reproach us, for having done too much or too little.

Perhaps the following resolution may be found not altogether unbefitting our present situation. With the greatest deference I submit it to the mature consideration of this assembly:

"That the act of the British Parliament for altering the charter and constitution of the colony of Massachusetts Bay, and those 'for the impartial administration of justice' in that colony, for shutting the port of Boston, and for quartering soldiers on the inhabitants of the colonies, are unconstitutional and void; and can confer no authority upon those who act under color of them. That the Crown cannot, by its prerogative, alter the charter or constitution of that colony: that all attempts to alter the said charter or constitution, unless by the authority of the legislature of that colony, are manifest violations of the rights of that colony, and illegal: that all force employed to carry such unjust and illegal attempts into execution is force without authority: that it is the right of British subjects to resist such force: that this right is founded both upon the letter and the spirit of the British constitution."

Our claim rests upon plain and indubitable truths. We do not send members to the British Parliament: we have parliaments (it is immaterial what name they go by) of our own. That a void act can confer no authority upon those who proceed under color of it is a self-evident proposition.

We can be at no loss in resolving that the King cannot, by his prerogative, alter the charter or constitution of the colony of Massachusetts Bay. Upon what principle could such an exertion of prerogative be justified? On the acts of Parliament? They are already proved to be void. On the discretionary power which the King has of acting where the laws are silent? That power must be subservient to the interest and happiness of those concerning whom it operates. But I go further. Instead of being supported by law, or the principles of prerogative, such an alteration is totally and absolutely repugnant to both. It is contrary to express law. The charter and constitution we speak of are confirmed by the only legislative power capable of confirming them; and no other power but that which can ratify can destroy. If it is contrary to express law the consequence is necessary that it is contrary to the principles of prerogative; for prerogative can operate only when the law is silent.

In no view can this alteration be justified, or so much as excused. It cannot be justified or excused by the acts of Parliament; because the authority of Parliament does not extend to it: it cannot be justified or excused by the operation of prerogative; because this is none of the cases in which prerogative can operate: it cannot be justified or excused by the legislative authority of the colony; because that authority never has been, and, I presume, never will be, given for any such purpose.

I will now advance a step further and say that all attempts to alter the charter or constitution of any colony, unless by the authority of its own legislature, are violations of its rights, and illegal.

If such attempts are illegal, must not all force, employed to carry them into execution, be force employed against law, and without authority? The conclusion is unavoidable.

Have not British subjects, then, a right to resist such force—force acting with authority—force employed contrary to law—force employed to destroy the very existence of law and of liberty? They have, sir; and this right is secured to them both by the letter and the spirit of the British constitution, by which the measures and the conditions of their obedience are appointed. The British liberties, sir, and the means and the right of defending them, are not the grants of princes; and of what our princes never granted they surely can never deprive us.

"Id rex potest," says the law, "quod de jure potest." "The king's power is a power according to law." His commands, if the authority of Lord Chief Justice Hale may be depended upon, are under the directive power of the law; and consequently invalid, if unlawful. "Commissions," says my Lord Coke, "are legal, and are like the king's writs; and none are lawful but such as are allowed by the common law, or warranted by some act of Parliament."

Let us examine any commission expressly directing those to whom it is given to use military force for carrying into execution the alterations proposed to be made in the charter and constitution of Massachusetts Bay by the foregoing maxims and authorities; and what we have said concerning it will appear obvious and conclusive. It is not warranted by any act of Parliament, because, as has been mentioned on this, and has been proved on other occasions, any such act is void. It is not warranted, and I believe it will not be pretended that it is warranted, by the common law. It is not warranted by the royal prerogative, because, as has already been fully shown, it is diametrically opposite to the principles and the ends of prerogative. Upon what foundation, then, can it lean and be supported? Upon none. Like an enchanted castle, it may terrify those whose eyes are affected by the magic influence of the sorcerers, despotism and slavery; but so soon as the charm is dissolved, and the genuine rays of liberty and of the constitution dart in upon us, the formidable appearance vanishes, and we discover that it was the baseless fabric of a vision that never had any real existence.

And now, sir, let me appeal to the impartial tribunal of reason and truth; let me appeal to every unprejudiced and judicious observer of the laws of Britain and of the constitution of the British government; let me appeal, I say, whether the principles on which I argue, or the principles on which alone my arguments can be opposed, are those which ought to be adhered to and acted upon; which of them are most consonant to our laws and liberties; which of them have the strongest, and are likely to have the most effectual tendency to establish and secure the royal power and dignity.

BRITISH GOVERNMENT PROHIBITS SECOND CONGRESS

The New York Assembly met in January, 1775, and endorsed the Bill of Rights adopted by the Congress at Philadelphia, and prepared petitions to the King, Lords, and Commons, disapproving "of the violent measures that had been pursued in some of the colonies," and claiming an exemption from internal taxation and the exclusive right of providing for the support of their own civil government and the administration of justice as their undoubted and inalienable rights as Englishmen.

When the petition of the Assembly was presented to the House of Commons a hearing was refused it because it denied or called in question the right of Parliament to tax the colonies. A circular letter was sent by the British Secretary of State to the colonial governors forbidding the election of delegates to the Congress in May, 1775, which had been determined upon by the Congress of 1774.

Notwithstanding this royal recommendation delegates were chosen from all the colonies to attend the Congress.

THE VIRGINIA CONVENTION

The leading spirit of the provincial convention of Virginia which met in Richmond March, 1775, to choose delegates to the May Congress was Patrick Henry.

His speech before the convention displayed an increase of his boldness of spirit. It is the most declamatory of all his orations, and therefore has become the most popular, being recited by generations of American schoolboys. It has been called "Patrick Henry's individual declaration of war against Great Britain." It was upon the following resolutions which he had proposed to the convention:

1. Resolved: That a well regulated militia, composed of gentlemen and yeomen, is the natural strength and only security of a free government; that such a militia in this colony would forever render it unnecessary for the mother country to keep among us, for the purpose of our defence, any standing army or mercenary forces, always subversive of the quiet and dangerous to the liberties of the people, and would obviate the pretext of taxing us for their support.

2. That such a militia is at this time especially necessary to protect our rights and liberties, which have been rendered insecure by the remissness of government in calling our Legislature together.

3. That this colony be immediately put into a posture of defence.

These resolutions precipitated an animated debate in which they were opposed as premature by Colonels Richard Bland and Benjamin Harrison, and Robert Carter Nicholas and Edmund Pendleton. Mr. Henry stood alone in their support.

The oration was delivered in the "Old Church" at not, the things which so nearly concern their temporal salvation? For my part, whatever anguish of spirit it may cost, I am willing to know the whole truth; to know the worst and to provide for it.

I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided; and that is the lamp of experience. I know of no way of judging of the future but by the past. And, judging by the past, I wish to know what there has been in the conduct of the British Ministry for the last ten years to justify those hopes with which gentlemen have been pleased to solace themselves and the House? Is it that insidious smile with which our petition has been lately received? Trust it not, sir; it will prove a snare to your feet. Suffer not yourselves to be betrayed with a kiss. Ask yourselves how this gracious reception of our petition comports with these warlike preparations which cover our waters and darken our land. Are fleets and armies necessary to a work of love and reconciliation? Have we shown ourselves so unwilling to be reconciled that force must be called in to win back our love? Let us not deceive ourselves, sir. These are the implements of war and subjugation; the last arguments to which kings resort. I ask gentlemen, sir, what means this martial array, if its purpose be not to force us to submission? Can gentlemen assign any other possible motives for it? Has Great Britain any enemy in this quarter of the world to call for all this accumulation of navies and armies? No, sir, she has none. They are meant for us; they can be meant for no other. They are sent over to bind and rivet upon us those chains which the British Ministry have been so long forging. And what have we to oppose to them? Shall we try argument? Sir, we have been trying that for the last ten years. Have we anything new to offer on the subject? Nothing. We have held the subject up in every light of which it is capable; but it has been all in vain. Shall we resort to entreaty and humble supplication? What terms shall we find which have not been already exhausted? Let us not, I beseech you, sir, deceive ourselves longer. Sir, we have done everything that could be done to avert the storm which is now coming on. We have petitioned; we have remonstrated; we have supplicated; we have prostrated ourselves before the throne, and have implored its interposition to arrest the tyrannical hands of the ministry and Parliament. Our petitions have been slighted; our remonstrances have produced additional violence and insult; our supplications have been disregarded; and we have been spurned, with contempt, from the foot of the throne. In vain, after these things, may we indulge the fond hope of peace and reconciliation. There is no longer any room for hope. If we wish to be

Richmond. One who heard the speech thus describes the scene:

"Henry rose with an unearthly fire burning in his eye. He commenced somewhat calmly, but the smothered excitement began more and more to play upon his features and thrill in the tones of his voice. The tendons of his neck stood out white and rigid like whiplashes. His voice rose louder and louder, until the walls of the building, and all within them, seemed to shake and rock in its tremendous vibrations. Finally his pale face and glaring eyes became terrible to look upon. Men leaned forward in their seats, with their heads strained forward, their faces pale, and their eyes glaring like the speaker's. His last exclamation, 'Give me liberty or give me death!' was like the shout of the leader which turns back the rout of battle."¹

LIBERTY OR DEATH!

PATRICK HENRY

MR. PRESIDENT.—No man thinks more highly than I do of the patriotism, as well as abilities, of the very worthy gentlemen who have just addressed the House. But different men often see the same subject in different lights; and, therefore, I hope that it will not be thought disrespectful to those gentlemen if, entertaining, as I do, opinions of a character very opposite to theirs, I shall speak forth my sentiments freely and without reserve. This is no time for ceremony. The question before the House is one of awful moment to this country. For my own part I consider it as nothing less than a question of freedom or slavery; and in proportion to the magnitude of the subject ought to be the freedom of the debate. It is only in this way that we can hope to arrive at truth, and fulfil the great responsibility which we hold to God and our country. Should I keep back my opinions at such a time, through fear of giving offence, I should consider myself as guilty of treason toward my country, and of an act of disloyalty toward the majesty of heaven, which I revere above all earthly kings.

Mr. President, it is natural to man to indulge in the illusions of hope. We are apt to shut our eyes against a painful truth, and listen to the song of that siren, till she transforms us into beasts. Is this the part of wise men, engaged in a great and arduous struggle for liberty? Are we disposed to be of the number of those who, having eyes, see not, and, having ears, hear free—if we mean to preserve inviolate those inestimable privileges for which we have been so long contending—if we mean not basely to abandon the noble struggle in which we have been so long engaged, and which we have pledged ourselves never to abandon until the glorious object of our contest shall be obtained, we must fight! I repeat it, sir, we must fight! An appeal to arms and to the God of Hosts is all that is left us!

They tell us, sir, that we are weak; unable to cope with so formidable an adversary. But when shall we be stronger? Will it be the next week, or the next year? Will it be when we are totally disarmed, and when a British guard shall be stationed in every house? Shall we gather strength by irresolution and inaction? Shall we acquire the means of effectual resistance by lying supinely on our backs, and bugging the delusive phantom of hope, until our enemies shall have bound us hand and foot? Sir, we are not weak, if we make a proper use of the means which the God of nature hath placed in our power. Three millions of people, armed in the holy cause of liberty, and in such a country as that which we possess, are invincible by any force which our enemy can send against us. Besides, sir, we shall not fight our battles alone. There is a just God who presides over the destinies of nations; and who will raise up friends to fight our battles for us. The battle, sir, is not to the strong alone; it is to the vigilant, the active, the brave. Besides, sir, we have no election. If we were base enough to desire it, it is now too late to retire from the contest. There is no retreat but in submission and slavery! Our chains are forged! Their clanking may be heard on the plains of Boston! The war is inevitable—and let it come! I repeat it, sir, let it come!

It is in vain, sir, to extenuate the matter. Gentlemen may cry peace, peace—but there is no peace. The war is actually begun! The next gale that sweeps from the north will bring to our ears the clash of resounding arms! Our brethren are already in the field! Why stand we here idle? What is it that gentlemen wish? What would they have? Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God! I know not what course others may take; but, as for me, give me liberty, or give me death!

In pursuance of Henry's resolution a committee was appointed to present a plan of armed defence of Virginia. On it were appointed, among others, Henry, George Washington, Thomas Jefferson and Richard Henry Lee.

tence of easing the nation of its burdens; measures which, if successful, must end in the ruin and slavery of Britain, as well as the persecuted American colonies.

We sincerely hope that the great sovereign of the Universe, who hath so often appeared for the English nation, will support you in every rational and manly exertion with these colonies for saving us from ruin; and that in a constitutional connection with the mother country we shall soon be altogether a free and happy people.

SECOND CONTINENTAL CONGRESS

The second Continental Congress convened according to arrangement on May 10, 1775. It met in the state house (now Independence Hall). Dr. Benjamin Franklin, who had returned from England, was added to the Pennsylvania delegation.

John Hancock, the proscribed patriot, was elected President on May 24, in place of Peyton Randolph, who had been obliged to return to Virginia by ill health.

The beginning of hostilities in Massachusetts received the immediate attention of Congress. They unanimously determined that the colonies be placed in a state of defence, so that Parliament might not carry their several unconstitutional and oppressive acts into execution by force of arms. But Congress still expressed an ardent wish for a restoration of former harmony, and accordingly resolved to present another petition to the King. This petition was written by John Dickinson, who had penned the one to His Majesty in the first Congress. This Congress also addressed the people of Great Britain and the province of Quebec, and it sent an address to the inhabitants of Ireland, and a letter to those of the island of Jamaica. The address to the British people was prepared by a committee which consisted of Richard Henry Lee, Robert R. Livingston, and Edmund Randolph. To Mr. Lee may be credited its language.

ADDRESS TO THE BRITISH PEOPLE

The endearing appellation of "friends, countrymen, and brethren" was used toward the people of Great Britain, and they were entreated by these ties seriously

The "next gale that swept from the North" did indeed bear "the clash of resounding arms—the news of Lexington and Concord (April 19). Ere it reached Virginia all New England was in arms, and thousands of the patriots were moving toward the scene of action, led by such veterans of the French War as Israel Putnam of Connecticut.

The provincial Congress of Massachusetts immediately resolved that an army of thirteen thousand men should be raised and the other New England colonies were requested to furnish an additional number for the defence of the country. The treasurer was directed to borrow £100,000 for the use of the province, and they declared that the citizens were no longer under any obligations of obedience to Governor Gage.

The provincial Congress also sent at once to Dr. Franklin, their agent in England, an address to the people of Great Britain in which they gave an account of the beginning of hostilities and added:

APPEAL TO THE BRITISH PEOPLE

BY MASSACHUSETTS

These, brethren, are marks of ministerial vengeance against this colony for refusing, with her sister colonies, a submission to slavery; but they have not yet detached us from our royal sovereign. We profess to be his loyal and dutiful subjects, and so hardly dealt with as we have been are still ready with our lives and fortunes to defend his person, family, crown, and dignity. Nevertheless, to the persecution and tyranny of his cruel ministry we will not tamely submit; appealing to heaven for the justice of our cause, we determine to die or be free.

We cannot think that the honor, wisdom, and valor of Britons will suffer them to be long inactive spectators of measures in which they themselves are so deeply interested; measures pursued in opposition to the solemn protest of many noble lords and expressed sense of conspicuous commoners, whose knowledge and virtue have long characterized them as some of the greatest men in the nation; measures executing contrary to the interest, petitions, and resolves of many large, respectable, and opulent counties, cities, and boroughs in Great Britain; measures highly incompatible with justice, but still pursued with a specious pre-to attend to the second attempt of Congress to prevent their dissolution.

After again recapitulating former injuries and stating the recent acts of hostility by the wanton destruction of their lives, as well as property, they seriously ask:

Whether the descendants of Britons could tamely submit to this? "No," they add, "we never will—while we revere the memory of our gallant and virtuous ancestors, we never can surrender those glorious privileges, for which they fought, bled, and conquered." "Admit," they tell them, "that your fleets and armies can destroy our towns, and ravage our coasts; these are inconsiderable objects, things of no moment to men whose bosoms glow with the ardor of liberty. We can retire beyond the reach of your navy and, without any sensible diminution of the necessities of life, enjoy a luxury, which, from that period, you will want, the luxury of being free." They again repel the charge of aiming at independence.

"Our enemies charge us with sedition. In what does it consist? In our refusal to submit to unwarrantable acts of injustice and cruelty? If so, show us a period in your history in which you have not been equally seditious.

"We are accused of aiming at independence; but how is this accusation supported? By the allegations of your ministers, not by our actions. Abused, insulted, and condemned, what steps have we pursued to obtain redress? We have carried our dutiful petitions to the throne. We have applied to your justice for relief. We have retrenched our luxury, and withheld our trade.

"The advantages of our commerce were designed as a compensation for your protection: when you ceased to protect, for what were we to compensate?

"What has been the success of our endeavors? The clemency of our sovereign is unhappily diverted; our petitions are treated with indignity; our prayers answered by insults. Our application to you remains unnoticed, and leaves us the melancholy apprehension of your wanting either the will or the power to assist us.

"Even under these circumstances, what measures have we taken that betray a desire of independence? Have we called in the aid of those foreign powers who are the rivals of your grandeur? When your troops were few and defenceless, did we take advantage of their distress and expel them our towns? Or have we permitted them to fortify, to receive new aid, and to acquire additional strength?

"Let your enemies and ours persuade you that in this we were influenced by fear or any other unworthy motive. The lives of Britons are still dear to us. They are the children of our parents, and an uninterrupted intercourse of mutual benefits had knit the bonds of friendship. When hostilities were commenced, when, on a late occasion we were wantonly attacked by your troops, though we repelled their assaults and returned their blows, yet we lamented the wounds they obliged us to give; nor have we yet learned to rejoice at a victory over Englishmen.

"As we wish not to color our actions, or disguise our thoughts, we shall, in the simple language of truth, avow the measures we have pursued, the motives upon which we have acted, and our future designs.

"When our late petition to the throne produced no other effect than fresh injuries, and votes of your legislature, calculated to justify every severity; when your fleets and your armies were prepared to wrest from us our property, to rob us of our liberties or our lives; when the hostile attempts of General Gage evinced his designs, we levied armies for our security and defence. When the powers vested in the governor of Canada gave us reason to apprehend danger from that quarter; and we had frequent intimations that a cruel and savage enemy was to be let loose upon the defenceless inhabitants of our frontiers; we took such measures as prudence dictated, as necessity will justify. We possessed ourselves of Crown Point and Ticonderoga. Yet, give us leave most solemnly to assure you, that, we have not lost sight of the object we have ever had in view: a reconciliation with you on constitutional principles, and a restoration of that friendly intercourse which, to the advantage of both, we till lately maintained."

After reminding them that the loss of liberty in America would be only a prelude to its loss in Great Britain, they conclude: "A cloud hangs over your head and ours—are this reaches you it may probably burst upon us; let us, then (before the remembrance of former kindness is obliterated), once more repeat these appellations, which are ever grateful to our ears; let us entreat heaven to avert our ruin and the destruction that threatens our friends, brethren, and countrymen on the other side of the Atlantic."

REJECTION OF LORD NORTH'S PLAN OF CONCILIATION

Congress referred the conciliatory plan of Lord North to a committee consisting of Dr. Franklin, Thomas the extensive and important trust. However, as the Congress desire it, I will enter upon the momentous duty and exert every power I possess in their service, and for the support of the glorious cause. I beg they will accept my most cordial thanks for this distinguished testimony of their approbation.

"But, lest some unlucky event should happen unfavorable to my reputation, I beg it may be remembered by every gentleman in the room that I this day declare with the utmost sincerity I do not think myself equal to the command I am honored with.

"As to pay, sir, I beg leave to assure the Congress that, as no pecuniary consideration could have tempted me to accept this arduous employment at the expense of my domestic ease and happiness, I do not wish to make any profit from it. I will keep an exact account of my expenses. These, I doubt not, they will discharge, and that is all I desire."

On the 6th of July Congress declared to the world the causes which led them to take up arms.

DECLARATION TO THE WORLD

BY CONGRESS

Having stated the various acts of the British Parliament in violation of their rights, and the hostile proceedings of the Administration to enforce them, they observed:

"We are reduced to the alternative of choosing between unconditional submission to the tyranny of irritated ministers or resistance by force. The latter is our choice. We have counted the cost of this contest, and find nothing so dreadful as voluntary slavery. Honor, justice, and humanity forbid us tamely to surrender that freedom which we received from our gallant ancestors; and which our innocent posterity have a right to receive from us. We cannot endure the infamy and guilt of resigning succeeding generations to that wretchedness which inevitably awaits them if we basely entail hereditary bondage upon them.

"Our cause is just—our union is perfect—our internal resources are great, and, if necessary, foreign assistance is undoubtedly attainable. We gratefully acknowledge, as signal instances of the divine favor toward us, that His providence would

Jefferson, John Adams, and Richard Henry Lee, and in accordance with their report rejected the plan as unreasonable, insidious, and unsatisfactory.

Congress claimed the right of the colonies to give their own money to the empire, and to designate how it should be expended, and refused to accept the remission of taxes when this was conditioned upon contributions. They also objected to the proposal because it was "borne on the point of the bayonet by military plenipotentiaries." Besides, they said, the British monopolization of colonial trade already laid them "under heavy contribution."

Congress further objected to the "intermeddling" of Parliament with the civil government or administration of justice in the colonies.

They rejected the plan, also, because it gave no redress of the other grievances of the colonies as presented in the petition of the first Congress, and because Parliament was adding to these by prohibiting the New England fisheries, and by interdicting intercolonial as well as foreign trade.

They went so far as to question the good faith of the proposition, as intended "to lull into fatal security" the friends of the colonies in Great Britain, while the ministry prepared suddenly to reduce "the 'cowardly' sons of America to unreserved submission," as Lord North had presaged in a former speech, and as the actions of the British Government in Massachusetts and the preparations of armaments of the British Government in Massachusetts and the preparations of armaments for America indicated was the intention.

Therefore, said Congress, "when these things are laid together . . . can the world be deceived into an opinion that we are unreasonable, or can it hesitate to believe us, that nothing but our own exertions may defeat the ministerial sentence of death or abject submission?"

Congress then proceeded to organize an army for defence. George Washington was unanimously chosen commander-in-chief, which appointment he accepted with his characteristic modesty in the following address to the president:

"Though I am truly sensible of the high honor done me in this appointment, yet I feel great distress from a consciousness that my abilities and military experience may not be equal to not permit us to be called into this severe controversy until we were grown to our present strength, had been previously exercised in warlike operations, and possessed of the means of defending ourselves. With hearts fortified with these animating reflections we most solemnly, before God and the world, declare that, exerting the utmost energy of those powers which the beneficent Creator hath graciously bestowed upon us, the arms we have been compelled by our enemies to assume, we will, in defiance of every hazard, with unabating firmness and perseverance, employ for the preservation of our liberties; being with one mind resolved to die freemen rather than to live slaves. Lest this declaration shall disquiet the minds of our friends and fellow subjects in any part of the empire, we assure them that we mean not to dissolve that union which has so long and so happily subsisted between us, and which we sincerely wish to see restored. Necessity has not yet driven us to that desperate measure, or induced us to excite any other nation to war against them. We have not raised armies with ambitious designs of separating from Great Britain and establishing independent states. We fight not for glory or for conquest. We exhibit to mankind the remarkable spectacle of a people attacked by unprovoked enemies without any imputation or even suspicion of offence. They boast of their privileges and civilization, and yet proffer no milder conditions than servitude or death. In our own native land, in defence of the freedom that is our birthright, and which we ever enjoyed till the late violation of it, for the protection of our property, acquired solely by the honest industry of our forefathers and ourselves, against violence actually offered we have taken up arms. We shall lay them down when hostilities shall cease on the part of the aggressors and all danger of their being renewed, and not before.

"With an humble confidence in the mercies of the supreme and impartial judge and ruler of the universe we most devoutly implore His divine goodness to protect us happily through this great conflict, to dispose our adversaries to reconciliation on reasonable terms and thereby relieve the empire from the calamities of civil war."

This was drawn by John Dickinson.

On the recommendation of the New York delegates, as instructed by their provincial convention, Congress issued paper currency to be discharged proportionately by the colonies, the united colonies to pay that part which any colony should fail to discharge.

On the first of August Congress adjourned to meet on the fifth of September.

The capture of Ticonderoga by Ethan Allen and Benedict Arnold early in May, 1775, the brave defence of Bunker (or Breed's) Hill by the raw New England militia in June, and the investment of the British troops in Boston by General Washington which followed, infused great hope in the patriots.

ACTS OF CONGRESS

At the next meeting of Congress in September delegates from Georgia were present, and the name of "The Thirteen United Colonies" was chosen to designate the country. A national navy was established and authority given to private persons to capture ships of the enemy.

The first military movement decided upon was the conquest of Canada. The invading force under Richard Montgomery and Benedict Arnold was repulsed at Quebec with the death of Montgomery.

At the request of the people of New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Virginia, Congress advised them in the formation of provisional governments to be terminated when Great Britain and the colonies should be reconciled.

REPRESSIVE ACTS OF PARLIAMENT

In his speech at the opening of Parliament in October, 1775, the King ignored the petition to him by Congress, and advocated extensive military operations in which

CHAPTER VI

COLONIES VS. THE CROWN

[SPEECHES AND DEBATES ON THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE]

The Mecklenburgh [N. C.] Declaration of Independence—"Common Sense," by Thomas Paine [Pa.]—Judge William Henry Drayton's Charge to the Grand Jury of Charleston, S. C.: "America Creanted to Be Free"—Declaration of Rights by Virginia (drafted by George Mason)—Resolution of Independence Introduced in Congress by Richard Henry Lee [Va.]—Thomas Jefferson's Report of the Debate on Lee's Resolution: In favor, Lee, John Adams [Mass.], George Wythe [Va.]; opposed, James Wilson [Pa.], Robert R. Livingston [N. Y.], Edward Rutledge [S. C.], John Dickinson [Pa.]—Daniel Webster's Re-creation of the Debate: Supposed Speeches of John Hancock [Mass.] and John Adams—Speech of Mr. Lee: "Independence a Solemn Duty"—The Declaration Is Passed.

A CONVENTION made up of two delegates from each militia company of Mecklenburgh county, N. C., met, on May 20, 1775, at Charlotte, the county seat, and passed certain resolutions which on their face seem to be a forecast not only of the declarations of the second Congress, then in session, but of the Declaration of Independence in July, 1776. A fierce controversy over the authenticity of these resolutions has been waged by American historians, owing to the fact that the original transcript was burned in 1800, and only what purports to be a copy has been preserved.

The two significant resolutions are:

"Resolved, That we, the citizens of Mecklenburgh county, do hereby dissolve the political bands which have connected us to our mother country and hereby absolve ourselves from all allegiance to the British Crown, and abjure all political connection, contract, or association, with a nation which has wantonly foreign as well as British troops were to be employed to put down the rebellion which he declared had been undertaken by the colonists for the purpose of establishing an independent empire.

While it was generally agreed by Parliament that the war should be prosecuted vigorously, a lively debate ensued over the employment of mercenaries to destroy people of their own blood. The proposition was carried.

The passage of an act to prohibit all trade with the colonies, containing a clause empowering British naval commanders to impress into the King's service captured American seamen and other persons, following as it did the employment of mercenary troops, shut and bolted the door on all prospect of reconciliation. The ablest men in America now began to advocate separation from Great Britain. Many colonials who had taken an active part in opposing the war left the country for Canada or England.

RECEPTION OF THE AMERICAN LOYALISTS BY GREAT BRITAIN
From the collection of the New York Historical Society

trampled on our rights and liberties and inhumanly shed the innocent blood of American patriots at Lexington.

"Resolved, That we do hereby declare ourselves a free and independent people, are, and of right ought to be, a sovereign and self-governing association, under the control of no power other than that of God and the general Congress; to the maintenance of which independence we solemnly pledge to each other our mutual cooperation, our lives, our fortunes, and our most sacred honor."

Foremost among the writers who advocated independence at this time were Thomas Paine and William Henry Drayton.

Paine in January, 1776, at the suggestion of Dr. Benjamin Rush, published a pamphlet "Common Sense," addressed "to the inhabitants of America," and advocating complete independence of the country in a forcible popular style which at once made him a man of note throughout all the colonies. The book, says Dr. Rush, "burst forth with an effect that has rarely been produced by types and paper in any age or country."

In the second article of "Common Sense," entitled "Thoughts on the Present State of American Affairs," Paine says:

It is repugnant to reason, and the universal order of things, to all examples from former ages, to suppose that this continent can longer remain subject to any external power. The most sanguine in Britain do not think so. The utmost stretch of human wisdom cannot, at this time, compass a plan short of separation which can promise the continent even a year's security. Reconciliation is now a fallacious dream. Nature hath deserted the connection and art cannot supply her place. For, as Milton wisely expresses, "never can true reconciliation grow where wounds of deadly hate have pierced so deep."

Every quiet method for peace hath been ineffectual. Our prayers have been rejected with disdain, and only tended to convince us that nothing flatters vanity or confirms obstinacy in kings more than repeated petitioning. Wherefore, since nothing but blows will do, for God's sake let us come to a final separation, and not leave the next generation to be cutting throats under the violated unmeaning names of parent and child.

A government of our own is our natural right; and when a man seriously reflects on the precariousness of human affairs he will become convinced that it is infinitely wiser and safer to form a constitution of our own in a cool, deliberate manner, while we have it in our power, than to trust such an interesting event to time and chance. If we omit it now some Masaniello may hereafter arise, who, laying hold of popular disquietudes, may collect together the desperate and the discontented, and, by assuming to themselves the powers of government, finally sweep away the liberties of the continent like a deluge. Ye that oppose independence now, ye know not what ye do; ye are opening a door to eternal tyranny by keeping vacant the seat of government.

O ye that love mankind! Ye that dare oppose, not only the tyranny, but the tyrant, stand forth! Every spot of the old world is overrun with oppression. Freedom hath been hunted round the globe. Asia and Africa have long expelled her. Europe regards her like a stranger, and England hath given her warning to depart. Oh, receive the fugitive, and prepare in time an asylum for mankind.

In the last article of the pamphlet, "On The Present Ability of America," after discussing the military and financial power of the united colonies, Paine says in conclusion:

Youth is the seed-time of good habits, as well in nations as in individuals. It might be difficult, if not impossible, to form the continent into one government half a century hence. The vast variety of interests occasioned by an increase of trade and population would create confusion. Colony would be against colony. Each being able might scorn each other's assistance; and, while the proud and foolish gloried in their little distinctions, the wise would lament that the union had not been formed before. Wherefore the present time is the true time for establishing it. The intimacy which is contracted in infancy and the friendship which is formed in misfortune are, of all others, the most lasting and unalterable. Our present union is marked with both these characters: we are young, and we have been distressed; but our concord hath withstood our troubles and fixed a memorable era for posterity to glory in.

The present time, likewise, is that peculiar time which never happens to a nation but once, viz., the time of forming itself into a government. Most nations have let slip the opportunity, and, dismissed without being impaneled, whereby, in contempt of Magna Charta, justice has been delayed and denied; it cannot but afford to every good citizen the most sincere satisfaction once more to see juries, as they now are, legally impaneled, to the end that the laws may be duly administered—I do most heartily congratulate you upon so important an event.

In this court, where silence has but too long presided, with a direct purpose to loosen the bands of government that this country might be involved in anarchy and confusion, you are now met to regulate your verdicts under a new constitution of government independent of royal authority—a constitution which arose according to the great law of nature and of nations, and which was established in the late congress, on the 26th of March last.

After enumerating the various oppressive acts of Parliament which had led to the revolution of the colonial government, he continued:

These acts have, either immediately or in their evident consequences, deeply affected all the colonies: ruin stared them in the face. They united their counsels and laid their just complaints before the Throne, praying a redress of grievances. But, to their astonishment, their dutiful petition for peace and safety was answered only by an actual commencement of war and military destruction!

In the mean time the British troops that had been peaceably received by the devoted inhabitants of Boston, as the troops of their sovereign, bound to protect them! fortified that town, to imprison the inhabitants and to hold that capital against the people to whom it belonged! And the British rulers having determined to appeal from reason and justice to violence and arms, a select body of those troops being in the night suddenly and privately marched from Boston—at Lexington, on the 19th day of April, 1775, they, by surprise, drew the sword of civil war and plunged it into the breasts of the Americans! Against this horrid injustice the Almighty gave instant judgment: a handful of country militia, badly armed, suddenly collected, and, unconnectedly and irregularly brought up to repel the attack, discomfited the regular bands of the tyranny; they retreated, and night saved them from total slaughter.

Thus forced to take up arms in our own defence, America yet again most dutifully petitioned the King, that he would be pleased "to direct some mode by which the united applications by that means, have been compelled to receive laws from their conquerors instead of making laws for themselves. First they had a king, and then a form of government; whereas the articles or charter of government should be formed first and men delegated to execute them afterward; but from the errors of other nations let us learn wisdom and lay hold of the present opportunity—to begin government at the right end.

In an appendix to the pamphlet Paine declares:

"He who takes nature for his guide is not easily beaten out of his argument, and on that ground I answer generally, That independence being a single simple line, contained within ourselves, and reconvulsed a matter exceedingly perplexed and complicated, and in which a treacherous, capricious court is to interfere, gives the answer without a doubt."

"Wherefore," concludes Paine, "instead of gazing at each other with suspicious or doubtful curiosity, let each of us hold out to his neighbor the hearty hand of friendship, and unite in drawing a line which, like an act of oblivion, shall bury in forgetfulness every former dissension. Let the names of Whig and Tory be extinct, and let none other be heard among us than those of a good citizen, an open and resolute friend, and a virtuous supporter of the rights of mankind, and of the FREE AND INDEPENDENT STATES OF AMERICA."

Another early advocate of entire separation from Great Britain was William Henry Drayton, Chief-Justice of South Carolina. On the 23rd of April, 1776, he delivered a notable address to the grand jury of Charleston upon the adoption of the new State Constitution, in which he foreshadowed the Declaration of Independence by his enumeration of the acts of the King and Parliament which justified the separation of the colonies from the British empire.

AMERICA CREATED TO BE FREE

JUDGE WILLIAM HENRY DRAYTON

Gentlemen of the Grand Jury: When, by evil machinations tending to nothing less than absolute tyranny, trials by jury have been discontinued, and juries, in discharge of their duty, have assembled, and, as soon as met, as silently and arbitrarily of his faithful colonists to the throne, in presence of their common councils, might be improved into a happy and permanent reconciliation; and that, in the meantime, measures might be taken for preventing the further destruction of the lives of His Majesty's subjects." But it was in vain! The petition on the part of millions, praying that the effusion of blood might be stayed, was not thought worthy of an answer! The nefarious war continued. The ruins of Charlestown, Palmetto, and Norfolk, towns not constructed for offenses or defense, mark the humane progress of the royal arms; so the ruins of Carthage, Corinth, and Numantium proclaimed to the world that justice was expelled the Roman senate! On the other hand, the fortitude with which America has endured these civil and military outrages; the union of her people, as astonishing as unprecedented, when we consider their various manners and religious tenets; their distance from each other; their various and clashing local interests; their self-denial; and their miraculous success in the prosecution of the war; I say, these things all demonstrate that the Lord of Hosts is on our side! So it is apparent that the Almighty Constructor of the universe, having formed this continent of materials to compose a state preëminent in the world, is now making use of the tyranny of the British rulers, as an instrument to fashion and arrange those materials for the end for which, in His wisdom, he had formed them.

In this enlightened age humanity must be particularly shocked at a recital of such violence; and it is scarce to be believed, that the British tyranny could entertain an idea of proceeding against America by a train of more dishonorable machinations. But, nothing less than absolute proof has convinced us that, in carrying on the conspiracy against the rights of humanity, the tyranny is capable of attempting to perpetrate whatever is infamous.

For the little purpose of disarming the imprisoned inhabitants of Boston, the King's general, Gage, in the face of day, violated the public faith, by himself plighted, and, in concert with other governors, and with John Stuart, he made every attempt to instigate the savage nations to war upon the southern colonies, indiscriminately to massacre man, woman, and child. The governors in general have demonstrated that truth is not in them; they have enveiled negroes from, and have armed them against, their masters; they have armed brother against brother—son against father! Oh! Almighty Director of the universe! what confidence can be put in a government ruling by such engines, and upon such principles of unnatural destruction!—a government that, upon the 21st day of December last, made a law, ex post facto, to justify what had been done, not only without law, but in its nature unjust!—a law to make prize of all vessels trading in, to, or from the united colonies—a law to make slaves of the crews of such vessels, and to compel them to bear arms against their consciences, their fathers, their bleeding country! The world, so old as it is, heretofore had never heard of so atrocious a procedure: it has no parallel in the registers of tyranny.

For this only end the house of Brunswick was called to rule over us. Oh! agonizing reflection! that house ruled us with swords, fire, and bayonets! The British government operated only to our destruction. Nature cried aloud, self-preservation is the great law—we have but obeyed.

You have now a form of government in every respect preferable to the mode under the British authority; and this will most clearly appear by contrasting the two forms of government.

Under the British authority governors were sent over to us who were utterly unacquainted with our local interests, the genius of the people, and our laws; generally, they were but too much disposed to obey the mandates of an arbitrary ministry; and, if the governor behaved ill, we could not by any peaceable means procure redress. But, under our present happy constitution, our executive magistrate arises according to the spirit and letter of holy writ—"their governors shall proceed from the midst of them." Thus the people have an opportunity of choosing a man intimately acquainted with their true interests, their genius, and their laws; a man perfectly disposed to defend them against arbitrary ministers, and to promote the happiness of that people from among whom he was elevated, and by whom, without the least difficulty, he may be removed and blended in the common mass.

Again, under the British authority it was in effect declared, that we had no property; nay, that we could not possess any; and that we had not any of the rights of humanity. For men who knew us not, men who gained in proportion as we lost, arrogated to themselves a right to BIND US IN ALL CASES WHATSOEVER! But our constitution is calculated to FREE us from foreign bondage; to secure to us our property; to maintain to us the rights of humanity; and to defend us and our posterity against British authority aiming to reduce us to the most abject slavery!

treated as rebels, we still ardently desire," I say, when these two points are contrasted, can we avoid revering the magnanimity of that great council of the state, who, after such injuries, could entertain such a principle! But the virtuous are ever generous. We do not wish revenge; we earnestly wish an accommodation of our unhappy disputes with Great Britain; for we prefer peace to war. Nay, there may be even such an accommodation as, excluding every idea of revenue by taxation or duty, or of legislation by act of Parliaments, may vest the king of Great Britain with such a limited dominion over us as may tend, bona fide, to promote our true commercial interests, and to secure our freedom and safety—the only just ends of any dominion. But, while I declare thus much on the one side, on the other it is my duty also to declare that, in my opinion, our true commercial interests cannot be provided for but by such a material alteration of the British acts of navigation as, according to the resolve of the honorable the Continental Congress, will "secure the commercial advantages of the whole empire to the mother country, and the commercial benefits of its respective members." And that our liberties and safety cannot be depended upon, if the king of Great Britain should be allowed to hold our forts and cannon, or to have authority over a single regiment in America, or a single ship of war in our ports. For, if he holds our forts, he may turn them against us, as he did Boston against her proprietors; if he acquires our cannon he will effectually disarm the colony; if he has a command of troops among us, even if we raise and pay them, shackles are fixed upon us—witness Ireland and her national army. The most express act of Parliament cannot give us security, for acts of Parliament are as easily repealed as made. Royal proclamations are not to be depended upon, witness the disappointments of the inhabitants of Quebec and St. Augustine. Even a change of ministry will not avail us, because, notwithstanding the rapid succession of ministers for which the British court has been famous during the present reign, yet the same ruinous policy ever continued to prevail against America. In short, I think it my duty to declare, in the awful seat of justice and before Almighty God, that, in my opinion, the Americans can have no safety but by the Divine favor, their own virtue, and their being so prudent as NOT TO LEAVE IT IN THE POWER OF THE BRITISH RULERS TO INJURE THEM. Indeed, the ruinous and deadly injuries received on our side, and the jealousies entertained, and which, in the nature of things, must daily increase against us, on the other, demonstrate to a mind in the least given to reflection upon the rise and fall of empires, that true recon-

Again, the British authority declared that we should not erect slitting mills; and to this unjust law we implicitly and respectfully submitted, so long as, with safety to our lives, we could yield obedience to such authority; but a resolution of congress now grants a premium to encourage the construction of such mills. The British authority discouraged our attempting to manufacture for our own consumption; but the new constitution, by authorizing the disbursement of large sums of money by way of loan or premium, encourages the making of iron, bar-steel, nail-roads, gun-locks, gun-barrels, sulphur, niter, gunpowder, lead, woollens, cottons, linens, paper, and salt.

Upon the whole, it has been the policy of the British authority to oblige us to supply our wants at their market, which is the dearest in the known world, and to cramp and confine our trade so as to be subservient to their commerce, our real interest being ever out of the question. On the other hand, the new constitution is wisely adapted to enable us to trade with foreign nations, and thereby to supply our wants at the cheapest markets in the universe; to extend our trade infinitely beyond what it has ever been known; to encourage manufactures among us; and it is peculiarly formed to promote the happiness of the people, from among whom, by virtue and merit, THE POOREST MAN may arrive at THE HIGHEST DIGNITY. Oh, Carolinians! happy would you be under this new constitution, if you knew your happy state.

Possessed of a constitution of government founded upon so generous, equal, and natural a principle—a government expressly calculated to make the people rich, powerful, virtuous and happy, who can wish to change it, to return under a royal government, the vital principles of which are the reverse in every particular! It was my duty to lay this happy constitution before you in its genuine light: it is your duty to understand, to instruct others, and to defend it.

I might here with propriety quit this truly important subject, but my anxiety for the public weal compels me yet to detain your attention, while I make an observation or two upon one particular part of the constitution.

When all the various attempts to enslave America by fraud, under guise of law; by military threats; by famine, massacre, breach of public faith, and open war are considered on the one hand, and, on the other, the constitution, expressing that some mode of government should be established "until an accommodation of the unhappy differences between Great Britain and America can be obtained; an event which, though traduced and cilement never can exist between Great Britain and America, the latter being in subjection to the former. The Almighty created America to be independent of Britain. Let us beware of the impiety of being backward to act as instruments in the almighty hand, now extended to accomplish His purpose, and by the completion of which alone America, in the nature of human affairs, can be secure against the craft and insidious designs of HER ENEMIES, WHO THINK HER PROSPERITY AND POWER ALREADY BY FAR TOO GREAT. In a word, our piety and political safety are so blended that, to refuse our labors in this Divine work, is to refuse to be a great, a free, a pious, and a happy people!

And now, having left the important alternative, political happiness or wretchedness, under God, in a great degree in your own hands, I pray the Supreme Arbiter of the affairs of men so to direct your judgment, as that you may act agreeable to what seems to be His will revealed in His miraculous works in behalf of America, bleeding at the altar of liberty!

COLONIAL DECLARATIONS OF INDEPENDENCE

When the prohibitory act of Parliament reached America, Congress, viewing it as a declaration of war, directed that reprisals be made, both by public and private armed vessels against the ships and goods of the inhabitants of Great Britain found on the high seas, and that American ports be opened to all the world except the dominions of Great Britain. On May 10 Congress recommended to the assemblies, and where no sufficient government had been established to the conventions of the colonies, "to adopt such government as should, in the opinion of the representatives of the people, best conduce to the happiness and safety of their constituents in particular and America in general."

This was a preliminary step to a general declaration of independence.

Some of the colonial assemblies had already expressed their opinions on this question; the convention of North Carolina having empowered their delegates in Congress "to concur with those in the other colonies in declaring independency." This was the first direct public act of any colonial assembly or convention in State should be separate and distinct from the judiciary,¹ and that the members of the two first may be restrained from oppression, by feeling and participating the burdens of the people they should, at fixed periods, be reduced to a private station, return into that body from which they were originally taken, and the vacancies be supplied by frequent, certain, and regular elections, in which all or any part of the former members to be again eligible or ineligible, as the laws shall direct.

Sec. 6. That elections of members to serve as representatives of the people, in assembly, ought to be free; and that all men having sufficient evidence of permanent common interest with, and attachment to, the community have the right of suffrage, and cannot be taxed or deprived of their property for public uses, without their own consent or that of their representatives so elected, nor bound by any law to which they have not, in like manner, assented for the public good.

Sec. 7. That all power of suspending laws, or the execution of laws, by any authority without consent of the representatives of the people, is injurious to their rights and ought not to be exercised.

Sec. 8. That in all capital or criminal prosecutions a man hath a right to demand the cause and nature of his accusation, to be confronted with the accusers and witnesses, to call for evidence in his favor, and to a speedy trial by an impartial jury of twelve men of his vicinage, without whose unanimous consent he can not be found guilty; nor can he be compelled to give evidence against himself; that no man be deprived of his liberty, except by the law of the land or the judgment of his peers.

Sec. 9. That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

Sec. 10. That general warrants, whereby an officer or messenger may be commanded to search suspected places without evidence of a fault committed, or to seize any person or persons not named, or whose offence is not particularly described and supported by evidence, are grievous and oppressive, and ought not to be granted.

¹In the constitution adopted June 29, 1776, by the convention that issued this bill of rights, it is provided that "The legislative, executive, and judiciary department shall be separate and distinct, so that neither exercise the powers properly belonging to the other." "These," says Hannia Taylor, in his "Origin and Growth of the American Constitution," "are the first complete dogmatic statements as to the division of powers ever incorporated in a formal document." favor of the measure. On the 15th of May the convention of Virginia went still farther and unanimously instructed their delegates in the general Congress to propose independence.

On June 12, 1776, the Virginia convention, still in session, passed a Declaration of Rights, which anticipated the Declaration of Independence in its enunciation of natural rights and was even more explicit as to the principles of democratic government. It was drafted by George Mason.

VIRGINIA BILL OF RIGHTS

A declaration of rights made by the representatives of the good people of Virginia, assembled in full and free convention; which rights do pertain to them and their posterity as the basis and foundation of government.

Section 1. That all men are by nature equally free and Independent, and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity; namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.

Sec. 2. That all power is vested in, and consequently derived from, the people; that magistrates are their trustees and servants, and at all times amenable to them.

Sec. 3. That government is, or ought to be, instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security of the people, nation, or community; of all the various modes and forms of government, that is best which is capable of producing the greatest degree of happiness and safety, and is most effectually secured against the danger of maladministration; and that, when any government shall be found inadequate or contrary to these purposes, a majority of the community hath an indubitable, inalienable, and indefensible right to reform, alter, or abolish it, in such manner as shall be judged most conducive to the public weal.

Sec. 4. That no man, or set of men, are entitled to exclusive or separate emoluments or privileges from the community, but in consideration of public services; which, not being descendible, neither ought the offices of magistrate, legislator, or judge to be hereditary.

Sec. 5: That the legislative and executive powers of the

GREAT AMERICAN DEBATES

Sec. 11. That in controversies respecting property, and in suits between man and man, the ancient trial by jury is preferable to any other, and ought to be held sacred.

Sec. 12. That freedom of the press is one of the great bulwarks of liberty, and can never be restrained but by despotic governments.

Sec. 13. That a well-regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free state; that standing armies, in time of peace, should be avoided as dangerous to liberty; and that in all cases the military should be under strict subordination to, and governed by, the civil power.

Sec. 14. That the people have a right to uniform government; and, therefore, that no government separate from, or independent of, the government of Virginia ought to be erected or established within the limits thereof.

Sec. 15. That no free government, or the blessings of liberty, can be preserved to any people but by a firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, frugality, and virtue, and by frequent recurrence to fundamental principles.

Sec. 16. That religion, or the duty which we owe to our Creator and the manner of discharging it, can be directed only by reason and conviction, not by force or violence; and, therefore, all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion according to the dictates of conscience; and that it is the mutual duty of all to practice Christian forbearance, love, and charity toward each other.

LEE'S RESOLUTION

The great question of independence was brought directly before Congress by Richard Henry Lee. On the 7th of June, 1776, he submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States, that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved.

That it is expedient forthwith to take the most effectual measures for forming foreign alliances.

That a plan of confederation be prepared and transmitted to the respective colonies for their consideration and approbation.

On the 8th these resolutions were debated in committee of the whole.

No question of greater magnitude was ever presented to the consideration of a deliberative body, or debated with more energy, eloquence, and ability.

DEBATE ON LEE'S RESOLUTION

Thomas Jefferson, in his "Writings" (Vol. I, page 10), has given an account of this debate.

SATURDAY, June 8. They [Congress] proceeded to take it [Lee's resolution] into consideration, and referred it to a committee of the whole, into which they immediately resolved themselves, and passed that day and Monday, the 10th, in debating on the subject.

It was argued by [James] Wilson, Robert R. Livingston, E[dward] Rutledge, [John] Dickinson, and others,—

That, though they were friends to the measures themselves, and saw the impossibility that we should ever again be united with Great Britain, yet they were against adopting them at this time:

That the conduct we had formerly observed was wise and proper now, of deferring to take any capital step till the voice of the people drove us into it:

That they were our power, and without them our declarations could not be carried into effect:

That the people of the middle colonies (Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania, the Jerseys, and New York) were not yet ripe for bidding adieu to British connection, but that they were fast ripening, and, in a short time, would join in the general voice of America:

That the resolution entered by this House on the 15th of May, for suppressing the exercise of all powers derived from the Crown, had shown, by the ferment into which it had thrown these middle colonies, that they had not yet accommodated their minds to a separation from the mother country:

That some of them had expressly forbidden their delegates to consent to such a declaration, and others had given no instructions, and, consequently, no powers to give such consent:

That, if the delegates of any particular colony had no power to declare such colony independent, certain they were the others could not declare it for them; the colonies being as yet perfectly independent of each other:

prepared to sail, it would be as well as to go into that declaration at this day.

On the other side it was argued by J[ohn] Adams, [Richard Henry] Lee, [George] Wythe, and others that no gentleman had argued against the policy or the right of separation from Britain, nor had supposed it possible we should ever renew our connection; that they had only opposed its being now declared:

That the question was not whether, by a declaration of independence, we should make ourselves what we are not; but whether we should declare a fact which already exists:

That, as to the people or Parliament of England, we had always been independent of them, their restraints on our trade deriving efficacy from our acquiescence only, and not from any rights they possessed of imposing them; and that, so far, our connection had been federal only, and was now dissolved by the commencement of hostilities:

That, as to the King, we had been bound to him by allegiance, but that this bond was now dissolved by his assent to the late act of Parliament, by which he declares us out of his protection, and by his levying war on us—a fact which had long ago proved us out of his protection, it being a certain position in law that allegiance and protection are reciprocal, the one ceasing when the other is withdrawn:

That James II. never declared the people of England out of his protection; yet his actions proved it, and the Parliament declared it:

No delegates, then, can be denied, or ever want, a power of declaring an existent truth:

That, the delegates from the Delaware counties having declared their constituents ready to join, there are only two colonies, Pennsylvania and Maryland, whose delegates are absolutely tied up; and that these had, by their instructions, only reserved a right of confirming or rejecting the measure:

That the instructions from Pennsylvania might be accounted for from the time in which they were drawn, near a twelvemonth ago, since which the face of affairs has totally changed:

That, within that time, it had become apparent that Britain was determined to accept nothing less than a carte blanche, and that the King's answer to the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of London, which had come to hand four days ago, must have satisfied every one of this point:

That the people wait for us to lead the way:

That they are in favor of the measure, though the instructions given by some of their representatives are not:

That the Assembly of Pennsylvania was now sitting above stairs; their convention would sit within a few days; the convention of New York was now sitting; and those of the Jerseys and Delaware counties would meet on the Monday following; and it was probable these bodies would take up the question of independence, and would declare to their delegates the voice of their state:

That, if such a declaration should now be agreed to, these delegates must retire, and possibly their colonies might secede from the Union:

That such a secession would weaken us more than could be compensated by any foreign alliance:

That, in the event of such a division, foreign powers would either refuse to join themselves to our fortunes, or, having us so much in their power as that desperate declaration would place us, they would insist on terms proportionably more hard and prejudicial:

That we had little reason to expect an alliance with those to whom alone, as yet, we had cast our eyes:

That France and Spain had reason to be jealous of that rising power, which would one day certainly strip them of all their American possessions:

That it was more likely they should form a connection with the British court, who, if they should find themselves unable otherwise to extricate themselves from their difficulties, would agree to a partition of our territories, restoring Canada to France, and the Floridas to Spain, to accomplish for themselves a recovery of these colonies:

That it would not be long before we should receive certain information of the disposition of the French court, from the agent whom we had sent to Paris for that purpose:

That, if this disposition should be favorable, by waiting the event of the present campaign, which we all hoped would be successful, we should have reason to expect an alliance on better terms:

That this would, in fact, work no delay of any effectual aid from such ally, as, from the advance of the season and distance of our situation, it was impossible we could receive any assistance during this campaign:

That it was prudent to fix among ourselves the terms on which we would form an alliance, before we declared we would form one at all events:

And that, if these were agreed on, and our declaration of independence ready by the time our ambassador should be

190

GREAT AMERICAN DEBATES

That the voice of the representatives is not always consonant with the voice of the people, and that this is remarkably the case in these middle colonies:

That the effect of the resolution of the 15th of May has proved this, which, raising the murmurs of some in the colonies of Pennsylvania and Maryland, called forth the opposing voice of the freer part of the people, and proved them to be the majority even in these colonies:

That the backwardness of these two colonies might be ascribed, partly to the influence of proprietary power and connections, and partly to their having not yet been attacked by the enemy:

That these causes were not likely to be soon removed, as there seemed no probability that the enemy would make either of these the seat of this summer's war:

That it would be vain to wait either weeks or months for perfect unanimity, since it was impossible that all men should ever become of one sentiment on any question:

That the conduct of some colonies, from the beginning of this contest, had given reason to suspect it was their settled policy to keep in the rear of the confederacy, that their particular prospect might be better, even in the worst event:

That, therefore, it was necessary for those colonies who had thrown themselves forward and hazarded all from the beginning to come forward now, also, and put all again to their own hazard:

That the history of the Dutch Revolution, of whom three states only confederated at first, proved that a secession of some colonies would not be so dangerous as some apprehended:

That a declaration of independence alone could render it consistent with European delicacy for European powers to treat with us, or even to receive an ambassador from us:

That, till this, they would not receive our vessels into their ports, nor acknowledge the adjudications of our courts of admiralty to be legitimate, in cases of capture of British vessels:

That, though France and Spain may be jealous of our rising power, they must think it will be much more formidable with the addition of Great Britain, and will, therefore, see it their interest to prevent a coalition; but, should they refuse, we shall be but where we are; whereas, without trying, we shall never know whether they will aid us or not:

That the present campaign may be unsuccessful, and therefore we had better propose an alliance while our affairs wear a hopeful aspect:

That to wait the event of this campaign will certainly work delay, because, during this summer, France may assist us effectually by cutting off those supplies of provisions from England and Ireland on which the enemy's armies here are to depend; or by setting in motion the great power they have collected in the West Indies, and calling our enemy to the defence of the possessions they have there:

That it would be idle to lose time in settling the terms of alliance till we had first determined we would enter into alliance:

That it is necessary to lose no time in opening a trade for our people, who will want clothes, and will want money, too, for the payment of taxes:

And that the only misfortune is, that we did not enter into alliance with France six months sooner—as, besides opening her ports for the vent of our last year's produce, she might have marched an army into Germany and prevented the petty princes there from selling their unhappy subjects to subdue us.

On the 10th the resolution was adopted in committee by a bare majority of the colonies.

It appearing, in the course of the debates, that the colonies of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and South Carolina were not yet matured for falling from the parent stem, but that they were fast advancing to that state, it was thought most prudent to wait a while for them, and to postpone the final decision to July 1st; but, that this might occasion as little delay as possible, a committee was appointed to prepare a Declaration of Independence. The committee were John Adams, Dr. Franklin, Roger Sherman, Robert R. Livingston, and Thomas Jefferson.¹ Committees were also appointed, at the same time, to prepare a plan of confederation for the colonies, and to state the terms proper to be proposed for foreign alliance. The committee for drawing the Declaration of Independence desired T. Jefferson to do it. It was accordingly done, and, being approved by them, he reported it to the House on Friday, the 28th of June, when it was read, and ordered to lie on the table. On Monday, the 1st of July, the House resolved itself into a committee of the whole and resumed the consideration of the original motion made by the delegates of Virginia, which, being again debated through the day, was carried in the affirmative by the votes of New Hampshire, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia.¹ South Carolina and Pennsylvania voted against it. Delaware had but two members present and they were divided. The delegates from New York declared they were for it themselves, and were assured their constituents were for it; but that their instructions having been drawn near a twelve-month before, when reconciliation was still the general object, they were enjoined by them to do nothing which should impede that object. They therefore thought themselves not justifiable in voting on either side, and asked leave to withdraw from the question; which was given them. The committee rose and reported their resolution to the house. Mr. Edward Rutledge, of South Carolina, then requested the determination might be put off to the next day, as he believed his colleagues, though they disapproved of the resolution, would then join in it for the sake of unanimity. The ultimate question, whether the house would agree to the resolution of the committee, was accordingly postponed to the next day, when it was again moved, and South Carolina concurred in voting for it. In the meantime, a third member had come post from the Delaware counties, and turned the vote of that colony in favor of the resolution. Members of a different sentiment attending that morning from Pennsylvania also, her vote was changed, so that the whole twelve colonies, who were authorized to vote at all, gave their voices for it,² and, within a few days (July 9) the Convention of New York approved of it, and thus supplied the void occasioned by the withdrawing of her delegates from the vote.

Congress proceeded the same day to consider the Declaration of Independence, which had been reported, and laid on the table the Friday preceding, and on Monday referred to a committee of the whole. The pusillanimous idea that we had friends in England worth keeping terms with still haunted the minds of many. For this reason, those passages which conveyed censures on the people of England were struck out, lest they should give offence. The clause, too, reproaching the enslaving the inhabitants of Africa was struck out in complaisance to South Carolina and Georgia, who had never attempted to restrain the importation of slaves, and who, on the contrary, still wished to continue it. Our northern brethren also, I believe, felt a little tender under those censures; for, though their people had very few slaves themselves, yet they had been pretty considerable carriers of them to others. The debates, having taken up the greater parts of the 2d, 3d, and 4th days of July, were, on the evening of the last, closed; the Declaration was reported by the committee, agreed to by the House, and signed by every member present, except Mr. Dickinson.

² Thus July 2, 1776, and not July 4, was the real beginning of American Independence.

Declaration of Independence.

Unfortunately the speeches of Adams and others in the debate on Lee's resolution were not preserved. Therefore, Daniel Webster, in his memorial oration on "Adams and Jefferson," delivered in Faneuil Hall, Boston, August 2, 1826, following the precedent established by Thucydides, the Greek historian, imputed actual words to the orators, in order to present the scene vividly before all coming generations. In this reconstruction he used words uttered by the speakers on other occasions (see page 98).

THE DEBATE ON THE DECLARATION

DANIEL WEBSTER

Let us, then, bring before us the assembly, which was about to decide a question thus big with the fate of empire. Let us open their doors and look in upon their deliberations. Let us survey the anxious and careworn countenances; let us hear the firm-toned voices of this band of patriots.

HANCOCK presides over the solemn sitting; and one of those not yet prepared to pronounce for absolute independence is on the floor, and is urging his reasons for dissenting from the Declaration.

"Let us pause! This step, once taken, cannot be retraced. This resolution, once passed, will cut off all hope of reconciliation. If success attend the arms of England, we shall then be no longer colonies, with charters and with privileges; these will all be forfeited by this act; and we shall be in the condition of other conquered people, at the mercy of the conquerors. For ourselves, we may be ready to run the hazard; but are we ready to carry the country to that length? Is success so probable as to justify it? Where is the military, where the naval power, by which we are to resist the whole strength of the arm of England—for she will exert that strength to the utmost? Can we rely on the constancy and perseverance of the people? or will they not act as the people of other countries have acted, and, wearied with a long war, submit, in the end, to a worse oppression? While we stand on our old ground, and insist on redress of grievances, we know we are right and are not answerable for consequences. Nothing, then, can be imputed to us. But if we now change our object, carry our pretensions farther, and set up for absolute independence, we shall lose the sympathy of mankind. We shall no longer be defending what we possess, but struggling for something which we never did possess, and which we have solemnly and uniformly disclaimed all intention of pursuing, from the very outset of the troubles. Abandoning thus our old ground, of resistance, only to arbitrary acts of oppression, the nations will believe the whole to have been mere pretence, and they will look on us, not as injured, but as ambitious subjects. I shudder before this responsibility. It will be on us, if, relinquishing the ground on which we have stood so long, and stood so safely, we now proclaim independence, and carry on the war for that object, while these cities burn, these pleasant fields whiten and bleach with the bones of their owners, and these streams run blood. It will be upon us, it will be upon us, if, failing to maintain this unreasonable and ill-judged declaration, a sterner despotism, maintained by military power, shall be established over our posterity, when we ourselves, given up by an exhausted, a harassed, a misled people, shall have expiated our rashness and atoned for our presumption on the scaffold."

It was for Mr. ADAMS to reply to arguments like these. We know his opinions, and we know his character. He would commence with his accustomed directness and earnestness.

"Sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish, I give my hand and my heart to this vote.¹ It is true, indeed, that in the beginning we aimed not at independence. But there's a Divinity which shapes our ends. The injustice of England has driven us to arms; and, blinded to her own interest for our good, she has obstinately persisted, till independence is now within our grasp. We have but to reach forth to it, and it is ours. Why, then, should we defer the Declaration? Is any man so weak as now to hope for a reconciliation with England, which shall leave either safety to the country and its liberties, or safety to his own life and his own honor? Are not you, sir, who sit in that chair—is not he our venerable colleague near you—are you not both already the proscribed and predestined objects of punishment and of vengeance? Cut off from all hope of royal clemency, what are you, what can you be, while the power of England remains, but outlaws? If we postpone independence, do we mean to carry on or to give up the war? Do we mean to submit to the measures of Parliament, Boston Port Bill and all? Do we mean to submit and consent that we ourselves shall be ground to powder, and our country and its rights trodden down in the dust? I know we do not mean to submit. We never shall submit. Do we intend to violate that most solemn obligation ever entered into by men, that plighting, before God, of our sacred honor to Washington, when, putting him forth to incur the dangers of war, as well as the political hazards of the times, we promised to adhere to him, in every extremity, with our fortunes and our lives? I know there is not a man here who would not rather see a general conflagration sweep over the land, or an earthquake sink it, than one jot or tittle of that plighted faith fall to the ground. For myself, having, twelve months ago, in this place, moved you that George Washington be appointed commander of the forces raised, or to be raised, for defence of American liberty,¹ may my right hand forget her cunning and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth if I hesitate or waver in the support I give him.

"The war, then, must go on. We must fight it through. And if the war must go on, why put off longer the Declaration of Independence? That measure will strengthen us. It will give us character abroad. The nations will then treat with us, which they never can do while we acknowledge ourselves subjects in arms against our sovereign. Nay, I maintain that England herself will sooner treat for peace with us on the footing of independence than consent, by repealing her acts, to acknowledge that her whole conduct toward us has been a course of injustice and oppression. Her pride will be less wounded by submitting to that course of things which now predestinates our independence, than by yielding the points in controversy to her rebellious subjects. The former she would regard as the result of fortune; the latter she would feel as her own deep disgrace. Why, then, why, then, sir, do we not, as soon as possible, change this from a civil to a national war? And since we must fight it through why not put ourselves in a state to enjoy all the benefits of victory if we gain the victory?"

"If we fail, it can be no worse for us. But we shall not fail. The cause will raise up armies; the cause will create navies. The people, the people, if we are true to them, will carry us, and will carry themselves, gloriously, through this struggle. I care not how fickle other people have been found. I know the people of these colonies, and I know that resistance to British aggression is deep and settled in their hearts and cannot be eradicated. Every colony, indeed, has expressed its willingness to follow, if we but take the lead. Sir, the Declaration will inspire the people with increased courage. Instead of a long and bloody war for the restoration of privileges, for redress of grievances, for chartered immunities, held under a British king, set before them the glorious object of entire independence, and it will breathe into them anew the breath of life. Read this Declaration at the head of the army; every sword will be drawn from its scabbard and the solemn vow uttered to maintain it, or to perish on the bed of honor. Publish it from the pulpit; religion will approve it, and the love of religious liberty will cling round it, resolved to stand with it or fall with it. Send it to the public halls; proclaim it there; let them hear it who heard the first roar of the enemy's cannon; let them see it who saw their brothers and their sons fall on the field of Bunker Hill, and in the streets of Lexington and Concord, and the very walls will cry out in its support.

"Sir, I know the uncertainty of human affairs, but I see, I see clearly through this day's business. You and I, indeed, may rue it. We may not live to the time when this Declaration shall be made good. We may die; die colonists; die slaves; die, it may be, ignominiously and on the scaffold. Be it so. Be it so. If it be the pleasure of Heaven that my country shall require the poor offering of my life, the victim shall be ready at the appointed hour of sacrifice, come when that hour may. But while I do live, let me have a country, or at least the hope of a country, and that a free country.

"But, whatever may be our fate, be assured, be assured that this Declaration will stand. It may cost treasure, and it may cost blood; but it will stand, and it will richly compensate for both. Through the thick gloom of the present, I see the brightness of the future, as the sun in heaven. We shall make this a glorious, an immortal, day. When we are in our graves our children will honor it. They will celebrate it with thanksgiving, with festivity, with bonfires, and illuminations. On its annual return they will shed tears, copious, gushing tears, not of subjection and slavery, not of agony and distress, but of exultation, of gratitude, and of joy. Sir, before God, I believe the hour is come. My judgment approves this measure, and my whole heart is in it. All that I have, and all that I am, and all that I hope, in this life, I am now ready here to stake upon it; and I leave off as I begun, that live or die, survive or perish, I am for the Declaration. It is my living sentiment, and by the blessing of God it shall be my dying sentiment, Independence now, and INDEPENDENCE FOR EVER."¹

The following speech of Richard Henry Lee was delivered while the Declaration of Independence was under consideration.

INDEPENDENCE A SOLEMN DUTY

BY RICHARD HENRY LEE

The time will certainly come when the fated separation between the mother country and these colonies must take place, whether you will or no, for it is so decreed by the very nature of things, by the progressive increase of our population, the fertility of our soil, the extent of our territory, the industry of our countrymen, and the immensity of the ocean which separates the two countries. And, if this be true, as it is most true, who does not see that the sooner it takes place the better?—that it would be the height of folly not to seize the present occasion when British injustice has filled all hearts with indignation, inspired all minds with courage, united all opinions in one, and put arms in every hand? And how long must we traverse three thousand miles of a stormy sea to solicit of arrogant and insolent men either counsel or commands to regulate our domestic affairs? From what we have already achieved it is easy to presume what we shall hereafter accomplish. Experience is the source of sage counsels, and liberty is the mother of great men. Have you not seen the enemy driven from Lexington by citizens armed and assembled in one day? Already their most celebrated generals have yielded in Boston to the skill of ours. Already their seamen, repulsed from our coasts, wander over the ocean, the sport of tempests and the prey of famine. Let us hail the favorable omen, and fight, not for the sake of knowing on what terms we are to be the slaves of England, but to secure to ourselves a free existence, to found a just and independent government.

¹In answer to an inquiry as to the sources of this supposed speech of Adams, Webster wrote: "The day after the Declaration was made, Mr. Adams, in writing to a friend, declared the event to be one that ought to be commemorated, as the day of deliverance, by solemn acts of devotion to God Almighty. It ought to be solemnized with pomp and parade, with shows, games, sports, guns, bells, bonfires, and illuminations, from one end of this continent to the other, from this time forward, for evermore." And on the day of his death, hearing the noise of bells and cannon, he asked the occasion. On being reminded that it was 'Independence Day,' he replied, 'Independence forever!'"

Why do we longer delay? why still deliberate? Let this most happy day give birth to the American republic. Let her arise, not to devastate and conquer, but to reëstablish the reign of peace and the laws. The eyes of Europe are fixed upon us; she demands of us a living example of freedom that may contrast, by the felicity of her citizens, with the ever-increasing tyranny which desolates her polluted shores. She invites us to prepare an asylum where the unhappy may find solace and the persecuted repose. She entreats us to cultivate a propitious soil, where that generous plant which first sprang up and grew in England, but is now withered by the poisonous blasts of Scottish tyranny, may revive and flourish, sheltering under its salubrious and interminable shade all the unfortunate of the human race. This is the end presaged by so many omens; by our first victories; by the present ardor and union; by the flight of Howe, and the pestilence which broke out among Dunmore's people; by the very winds which baffled the enemy's fleets and transports, and that terrible tempest which engulfed seven hundred vessels upon the coast of Newfoundland.

If we are not this day wanting in our duty to our country, the names of the American legislators will be placed, by posterity, at the side of those of Theseus, of Lycurgus, of Romulus, of Numa, of the three Williams of Nassau, and of all those whose memory has been and will be forever dear to virtuous men and good citizens.

On the 4th of July the Declaration of Independence reported by the special committee came before Congress for final decision, and, after amendments, received the vote of every colony, as Jefferson has narrated. It also received the vote of every delegate present except John Dickinson, and was signed by everyone but him. It is said that when John Hancock affixed his bold signature he said: "There! I think old Mother Britain can see that without her spectacles!"

The Declaration was published in the "Evening Post" of Philadelphia in the morning of July 8, and at noon was read to the public from a platform in the yard of the State-house by Joseph Nixon, a member of the Pennsylvania Council of Safety. At the close of his

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Thomas Jefferson [Va.] Drafts the Declaration—Eulogies of Jefferson as the Author of the Declaration by Daniel Webster and Edward Everett—Original Draft of the Declaration, with Corrections Showing the Final Draft—Signing and Promulgation of the Declaration—Speech of Samuel Adams [Mass.] on "American Independence."

THE committee had delegated to Thomas Jefferson and John Adams the drafting of the Declaration, and Adams, with rare modesty, left this honorable task to Jefferson, confining himself to suggestions.

And Jefferson acquitted himself so well that, had he never written another line, his fame would have been imperishable, not only in America, but throughout the world, to which the Declaration stands as the supreme expression of natural rights and popular liberty. Said Daniel Webster, in his commemorative oration on Adams and Jefferson (1826):

"The merit of this paper is Mr. Jefferson's. Some changes were made in it, on the suggestion of other members of the committee, and others by Congress while it was under discussion. But none of them altered the tone, the frame, the arrangement, or the general character of the instrument. As a composition, the Declaration is Mr. Jefferson's. It is the production of his mind, and the high honor of it belongs to him, clearly and absolutely. . . . To say that he performed his great work well would be doing him injustice. To say that he did excellently well, admirably well, would be inadequate and halting praise.

Let us rather say that he so discharged the duty assigned him that all Americans may well rejoice that the work of drawing the title-deed of their liberties devolved on his hands."

And Edward Everett, in his eulogy of Adams and Jefferson in the same year, said:

"To have been the instrument of expressing, in one brief, decisive act, the concentrated will and resolution of a whole family of states, of unfolding, in one all-important manifesto, the causes, the motives, and the justification of this great movement in human affairs; to have been permitted to give the impress and peculiarity of his own mind to a charter of public right, destined—or, rather, let me say, already elevated—to an importance in the estimation of men equal to any thing human, ever borne on parchment or expressed in the visible signs of thought—this is the glory of Thomas Jefferson."

The following text is the draft as presented to Congress, and as preserved in manuscript by the Department of State at Washington. John Adams also left behind him a copy of the draft in shorter form. Later Jefferson prepared a number of copies for his friends. That in the Madison collection is called "MS. A," and that in the Emmet collection is called "MS. B." The words with a white line drawn through them were stricken out in committee. The words within brackets were stricken out by Congress.¹

REPORTED DRAFT

A Declaration by the Representatives of the United States of America, in General² Congress assembled.³

When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for a one people to advance from that subordination in which they have hitherto remained, & to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with other another and to assume among the powers of the earth the equal & independent separate and equal station to which the laws of nature & of nature's god entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the change the separation.

We hold these truths to be sacred & undeniable self-evident;

And for the support of this declaration] we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, & our sacred honour.

This declaration was directed to be engrossed,² and on the 2nd of August, 1776, was signed by all the members then present, and by some who were not members on the 4th of July.

Copies of the declaration were immediately sent to all the States, and to the commander of the American troops, and was publicly proclaimed in each State, and at the head of the army. The great mass of the people were now prepared for this event, and the declaration was received with acclamation.

On the day before the engrossed copy of the Declaration was signed, Samuel Adams of Massachusetts delivered an address on "American Independence," which, as the only speech which has been preserved of this eloquent orator, is a memorable document in American history. In the conclusion of this address he said:

AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE

SAMUEL ADAMS

Countrymen, the men who now invite you to surrender your rights into their hands are the men who have let loose the mercies to the British Crown, and that all political connexion between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that, as FREE and INDEPENDENT STATES, they have full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce, and to do all other Acts and Things which INDEPENDENT STATES may of right do. less savages to riot in the blood of their brethren; who have dared to establish Popery triumphant in our land; who have taught treachery to your slaves, and courted them to assassinate your wives and children.

These are the men to whom we are exhorted to sacrifice the blessings which Providence holds out to us: the happiness, the dignity, of uncontrolled freedom and independence.

Let not your generous indignation be directed against any among us who may advise so absurd and maddening a measure. Their number is but few, and daily decreases; and the spirit which can render them patient of slavery will render them contemptible enemies.

Our union is now complete; our Constitution composed, established, and approved. You are now the guardians of your own liberties. We may justly address you, as the decemviri did the Romans, and say: "Nothing that we propose can pass into a law without your consent. Be yourselves, O Americans, the authors of those laws on which your happiness depends."

You have now in the field armies sufficient to repel the whole force of your enemies and their base and mercenary auxiliaries. The hearts of your soldiers beat high with the spirit of freedom; they are animated with the justice of their cause, and while they grasp their swords can look up to Heaven for assistance. Your adversaries are composed of wretches who laugh at the rights of humanity, who turn religion into derision, and would, for higher wages, direct their swords against their leaders or their country. Go on, then, in your generous enterprise, with gratitude to Heaven for past success, and confidence of it in the future. For my own part, I ask no greater blessing than to share with you the common danger and common glory. If I have a wish dearer to my soul than that my ashes may be mingled with those of a Warren and a Montgomery, it is that these American States may never cease to be free and independent.

I will not join in congratulation on misfortune and disgrace. I cannot concur in a blind and servile address, which approves and endeavors to sanctify the monstrous measures which have heaped disgrace and misfortune upon us. This, my Lords, is a perilous and tremendous moment! It is not a time for adulation. The smoothness of flattery cannot now avail—cannot save us in this rugged and awful crisis. It is now necessary to instruct the Throne in the language of truth. We must dispel the illusion and the darkness which develop it, and display, in its full danger and true colors, the ruin that is brought to our doors.

This, my Lords, is our duty. It is the proper function of this noble assembly, sitting, as we do, upon our honors in this House, the hereditary council of the Crown. Who is the minister—where is the minister, that has dared to suggest to the Throne the contrary, unconstitutional language this day delivered from it? The accustomed language from the Throne has been application to Parliament for advice, and a reliance on its constitutional advice and assistance. As it is the right of Parliament to give, so it is the duty of the Crown to ask it. But on this day, and in this extreme momentous exigency, no reliance is reposed on our constitutional counsels! no advice is asked from the sober and enlightened care of Parliament! but the Crown, from itself and by itself, declares an unalterable determination to pursue measures—and what measures, my Lords? The measures that have produced the imminent perils that threaten us; the measures that have brought ruin to our doors.

Can the minister of the day now presume to expect a continuance of support in this ruinous infatuation? Can Parliament be so dead to its dignity and its duty as to be thus deluded into the loss of the one and the violation of the other? To give an unlimited credit and support for the steady perseverance in measures not proposed for our parliamentary advice, but dictated and forced upon us—in measures, I say, my Lords, which have reduced this late flourishing empire to ruin and contempt! "But yesterday, and England might have stood against the world: now none so poor to do her reverence." I use the words of a poet; but, though it be poetry, it is no fiction. It is a shameful truth, that not only the power and strength of this country are wasting away and expiring, but her well-earned glories, her true honor, and substantial dignity are sacrificed.

France, my Lords, has insulted you; she has encouraged and

THE march toward independence was not to be the triumphal progress which the sanguine Adams anticipated. A year followed of doubtful contest. Not until Burgoyne's defeat at Saratoga (October 17, 1777) did the tide turn in favor of America.

On November 18, 1777, after vague reports of Burgoyne's defeat had reached England, but before news of the completeness of the disaster was known, Lord Chatham arose in the House of Lords and delivered his last appeal to his country to desist from its vain attempt to subjugate America. The occasion was an address to the Throne congratulating the King, among other things, upon the progress of the American war. Although Chatham was in his seventieth year, the speech possessed all the fire of his youth, and indeed is reckoned by many to be the best of all his orations. It is certainly the most finished, as it is the only one which was corrected by him.

sustained America; and, whether America be wrong or right, the dignity of this country ought to spurn at the officious insult of French interference. The ministers and ambassadors of those who are called rebels and enemies are in Paris; in Paris they transact the reciprocal interests of America and France. Can there be a more mortifying insult? Can even our ministers sustain a more humiliating disgrace? Do they dare to resent it? Do they presume even to hint a vindication of their honor, and the dignity of the state, by requiring the dismissal of the plenipotentiaries of America? Such is the degradation to which they have reduced the glories of England! The people whom they affect to call contemptible rebels, but whose growing power has at last obtained the name of enemies; the people with whom they have engaged this country in war, and against whom they now command our implicit support in every measure of desperate hostility—this people, despised as rebels, or acknowledged as enemies, are abetted against you, supplied with every military store, their interests consulted, and their ambassadors entertained, by your inveterate enemy! and our ministers dare not interpose with dignity or effect. Is this the honor of a great kingdom? Is this the indignant spirit of England, who "but yesterday" gave law to the house of Bourbon? My Lords, the dignity of nations demands a decisive conduct in a situation like this. Even when the greatest prince that perhaps this country ever saw filled our Throne, the requisition of a Spanish general, on a similar subject, was attended to and complied with; for, on the spirited remonstrance of the Duke of Alva, Elizabeth found herself obliged to deny the Flemish exiles all countenance, support, or even entrance into her dominions; and the Count Le Marquis, with his few desperate followers, were expelled the kingdom. Happening to arrive at the Brille, and finding it weak in defence, they made themselves masters of the place; and this was the foundation of the United Provinces.

My Lords, this ruinous and ignominious situation, where we cannot act with success, nor suffer with honor, calls upon us to remonstrate in the strongest and loudest language of truth, to rescue the ear of majesty from the delusions which surround it. The desperate state of our arms abroad is in part known. No man thinks more highly of them than I do. I love and honor the English troops. I know their virtues and their valor. I know they can achieve anything except impossibilities; and I know that the conquest of English America is an impossibility. You cannot, I venture to say it, you cannot conquer America. Your armies in the last war effected everything that could be effected; and what was it? It cost a numerous army, under the command of a most able general [Lord Amherst], now a noble Lord in this House, a long and laborious campaign, to expel five thousand Frenchmen from French America. My Lords, you cannot conquer America. What is your present situation there? We do not know the worst; but we know that in three campaigns we have done nothing and suffered much. Besides the sufferings, perhaps total loss of the Northern force, the best appointed army that ever took the field, commanded by Sir William Howe, has retired from the American lines. He was obliged to relinquish his attempt, and with great delay and danger to adopt a new and distant plan of operations. We shall soon know, and in any event have reason to lament, what may have happened since. As to conquest, therefore, my Lords, I repeat, it is impossible. You may swell every expense and every effort still more extravagantly; pile and accumulate every assistance you can buy or borrow; traffic and barter with every little pitiful German prince that sells and sends his subjects to the shambles of a foreign prince; your efforts are forever vain and impotent—doubly so from this mercenary aid on which you rely; for it irritates, to an incurable resentment, the minds of your enemies, to overrun them with the mercenary sons of rapine and plunder, devoting them and their possessions to the rapacity of hireling cruelty! If I were an American, as I am an Englishman, while a foreign troop was landed in my country, I never would lay down my arms—never—never—never.

Your own army is infected with the contagion of these illiberal allies. The spirit of plunder and of rapine is gone forth among them. I know it; and, notwithstanding what the noble Earl [Lord Percy] who moved the address has given as his opinion of the American army, I know from authentic information, and the most experienced officers, that our discipline is deeply wounded. While this is notoriously our sinking situation, America grows and flourishes; while our strength and discipline are lowered, hers are rising and improving.

But, my Lords, who is the man that, in addition to these disgraces and mischiefs of our army, has dared to authorize and associate to our arms the tomahawk and scalping-knife of the savage? to call into civilized alliance the wild and inhuman savage of the woods; to delegate to the merciless Indian the defence of disputed rights, and to wage the horrors of his barbarous war against our brethren? My Lords, these enormities cry aloud for redress and punishment. Unless thoroughly done away, it will be a stain on the national character. It is a violation of the constitution. I believe it is against law. It is not the least of our national misfortunes that the strength and character of our army are thus impaired. Infected with the mercenary spirit of robbery and rapine; familiarized to the horrid scenes of savage cruelty, it can no longer boast of the noble and generous principles which dignify a soldier; no longer sympathize with the dignity of the royal banner, nor feel the pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war, "that make ambition virtue!" What makes ambition virtue?—the sense of honor. But in the sense of honor consistent with a spirit of plunder, or the practice of murder? Can it flow from mercenary motives, or can it prompt to cruel deeds? Beside these murderers and plunderers, let me ask our ministers, What other allies have they acquired? What other powers have they associated in their cause? Have they entered into alliance with the king of the gipsies? Nothing, my Lords, is too low or too ludicrous to be consistent with their counsels.

The independent views of America have been stated and asserted as the foundation of this address. My Lords, no man wishes for the due dependence of America on this country more than I do. To preserve it, and not confirm that state of independence into which your measures hitherto have driven them, is the object which we ought to unite in attaining. The Americans, contending for their rights against arbitrary exactions, I love and admire. It is the struggle of free and virtuous patriots. But, contending for independency and total disconnection from England, as an Englishman, I cannot wish them success; for in a due constitutional dependency, including the ancient supremacy of this country in regulating their commerce and navigation, consist the mutual happiness and prosperity both of England and America. She derived assistance and protection from us; and we reaped from her the most important advantages. She was, indeed, the fountain of our wealth, the nerve of our strength, the nursery and basis of our naval power. It is our duty, therefore, my Lords, if we wish to save our country, most seriously to endeavor the recovery of these most beneficial subjects; and in this perilous crisis, perhaps the present moment may be the only one in which we can hope for success. For in their negotiations with France they have, or think they have, reason to complain; though it be notorious that they have received from that power important supplies and assistance of various kinds, yet it is certain they expected it in a more decisive and immediate degree. America is in ill humor with France; on some points they have not entirely answered her expectations.

ica by France suggests a different conclusion. The most important interests of France in aggrandizing and enriching herself with what she most wants, supplies of every naval store from America, must inspire her with different sentiments. The extraordinary preparations of the House of Bourbon, by land and by sea, from Dunkirk to the Straits, equally ready and willing to overwhelm these defenceless islands, should rouse us to a sense of their real disposition and our own danger. Not five thousand troops in England! hardly three thousand in Ireland! What can we oppose to the combined force of our enemies? Scarcely twenty ships of the line so fully or sufficiently manned that any admiral's reputation would permit him to take the command of. The river of Lisbon in the possession of our enemies! The seas swept by American privateers! Our Channel trade torn to pieces by them! In this complicated crisis of danger, weakness at home, and calamity abroad, terrified and insulted by the neighboring powers, unable to act in America, or acting only to be destroyed, where is the man with the forehead to promise or hope for success in such a situation, or from perseverance in the measures that have driven us to it? Who has the forehead to do so? Where is that man? I should be glad to see his face.

You cannot conciliate America by your present measures. You cannot subdue her by your present or by any measures. What, then, can you do? You cannot conquer; you cannot gain; but you can address; you can lull the fears and anxieties of the moment into an ignorance of the danger that should produce them. But, my Lords, the time demands the language of truth. We must not now apply the flattering unction of servile compliance or blind complaisance. In a just and necessary war, to maintain the rights or honor of my country, I would strip the shirt from my back to support it. But in such a war as this, unjust in its principle, impracticable in its means, and ruinous in its consequences, I would not contribute a single effort nor a single shilling. I do not call for vengeance on the heads of those who have been guilty; I only recommend to them to make their retreat. Let them walk off; and let them make haste, or they may be assured that speedy and condign punishment will overtake them.

My Lords, I have submitted to you, with the freedom and truth which I think my duty, my sentiments on your present awful situation. I have laid before you the ruin of your power, the disgrace of your reputation, the pollution of your discipline, the contamination of your morals, the complication of calamities,

Let us wisely take advantage of every possible moment of reconciliation. Besides, the natural disposition of America herself still leans toward England; to the old habits of connection and mutual interest that united both countries. This was the established sentiment of all the Continent; and still, my Lords, in the great and principal part, the sound part of America, this wise and affectionate disposition prevails. And there is a very considerable part of America yet sound—the middle and the southern provinces. Some parts may be factious and blind to their true interests; but if we express a wise and benevolent disposition to communicate with them those immutable rights of nature and those constitutional liberties to which they are equally entitled with ourselves, by a conduct so just and humane we shall confirm the favorable and conciliate the adverse. I say, my Lords, the rights and liberties to which they are equally entitled with ourselves, but no more. I would participate to them every enjoyment and freedom which the colonizing subjects of a free state can possess, or wish to possess; and I do not see why they should not enjoy every fundamental right in their property, and every original substantial liberty, which Devonshire, or Surrey, or the county I live in, or any other county in England, can claim; reserving always, as the sacred right of the mother country, the due constitutional dependency of the colonies. The inherent supremacy of the state in regulating and protecting the navigation and commerce of all her subjects is necessary for the mutual benefit and preservation of every part, to constitute and preserve the prosperous arrangement of the whole empire.

The sound parts of America, of which I have spoken, must be sensible of these great truths and of their real interests. America is not in that state of desperate and contemptible rebellion which this country has been deluded to believe. It is not a wild and lawless banditti, who, having nothing to lose, might hope to snatch something from public convulsions. Many of their leaders and great men have a great stake in this great contest. The gentleman who conducts their armies, I am told, has an estate of four or five thousand pounds a year; and when I consider these things I cannot but lament the inconsiderate violence of our penal acts, our declaration of treason and rebellion, with all the fatal effects of attainder and confiscation.

As to the disposition of foreign powers which is asserted [in the King's speech] to be pacific and friendly, let us judge, my Lords, rather by their actions and the nature of things than by interested assertions. The uniform assistance supplied to Amer-ties, foreign and domestic, that overwhelm your sinking country. Your dearest interests, your own liberties, the constitution itself, totters to the foundation. All this disgraceful danger, this multitude of misery, is the monstrous offspring of this unnatural war. We have been deceived and deluded too long. Let us now stop short. This is the crisis—the only crisis of time and situation, to give us a possibility of escape from the fatal effects of our delusions. But if, in an obstinate and infatuated perseverance in folly, we slavishly echo the peremptory words this day presented to us, nothing can save this devoted country from complete and final ruin. We madly rush into multiplied miseries, and "confusion worse confounded."

Is it possible, can it be believed, that ministers are yet blind to this impending destruction? I did hope that instead of this false and empty vanity, this overweening pride, engendering high conceits and presumptuous imaginations, ministers would have humbled themselves in their errors, would have confessed and retracted them, and, by an active, though a late, repentance, have endeavored to redeem them. But, my Lords, since they had neither sagacity to foresee, nor justice nor humanity to shun these oppressive calamities—since not even severe experience can make them feel, nor the imminent ruin of their country awaken them from their stupefaction, the guardian care of Parliament must interpose. I shall, therefore, my Lords, propose to you an amendment of the address to His Majesty, . . . to recommend an immediate cessation of hostilities, and the commencement of a treaty to restore peace and liberty to America, strength and happiness to England, security and permanent prosperity to both countries. This, my Lords, is yet in our power; and let not the wisdom and justice of your Lordships neglect the happy, and, perhaps, the only opportunity. By the establishment of irrevocable law, founded on mutual rights, and ascertained by treaty, these glorious enjoyments may be firmly perpetuated. And let me repeat to your Lordships, that the strong bias of America, at least of the wise and sounder parts of it, naturally inclines to this happy and constitutional reconnection with you. Notwithstanding the temporary intrigues with France, we may still be assured of their ancient and confirmed partiality to us. America and France cannot be congenial. There is something decisive and confirmed in the honest American that will not assimilate to the futility and levity of Frenchmen.

My Lords, to encourage and confirm that innate inclination to this country, founded on every principle of affection, as well as consideration of interest; to restore that favorable disposition into a permanent and powerful reunion with this country; to revive the mutual strength of the empire; again to awe the House of Bourbon, instead of meanly trucking, as our present calamities compel us, to every insult of French caprice and Spanish punctilio; to reestablish our commerce; to reassert our rights and our honor; to confirm our interests, and renew our glories forever—a consummation most devoutly to be endeavored! and which, I trust, may yet arise from reconciliation with America—I have the honor of submitting to you the following amendment, which I move to be inserted after the two first paragraphs of the address:

"And that this House does most humbly advise and supplicate His Majesty to be pleased to cause the most speedy and effectual measures to be taken for restoring peace in America; and that no time may be lost in proposing an immediate opening of a treaty for the final settlement of the tranquillity of these invaluable provinces, by a removal of the unhappy causes of this ruinous civil war, and by a just and adequate security against the return of the like calamities in times to come. And this House desire to offer the most dutiful assurances to His Majesty that they will, in due time, cheerfully coöperate with the magnanimity and tender goodness of His Majesty for the preservation of his people, by such explicit and most solemn declarations and provisions of fundamental and irrevocable laws as may be judged necessary for the ascertaining and fixing forever the respective rights of Great Britain and her colonies."

In the course of this debate Lord Suffolk defended the employment of the Indians in the war, contending that, besides its policy and necessity, the measure was also allowable on principle; for that "it was perfectly justifiable to use all the means that God and nature put into our hands!"

Lord Chatham leaped up, exclaiming as he rose:

I am astonished—shocked! to hear such principles confessed to hear them avowed in this House, or in this country; principles equally unconstitutional, inhuman, and unchristian!

My Lords, I did not intend to have encroached again upon your attention, but I cannot repress my indignation. I feel myself impelled by every duty. My Lords, we are called upon as members of this House, as men, as Christian men, to protest against such notions standing near the Throne, polluting the countrymen in America, of the same language, laws, liberties, and religion, endeared to us by every tie that should sanctify humanity.

My Lords, this awful subject, so important to our honor, our constitution, and our religion, demands the most solemn and effectual inquiry. And I again call upon your Lordships, and the united powers of the state, to examine it thoroughly and decisively, and to stamp upon it an indelible stigma of the public abhorrence. And I again implore those holy prelates of our religion to do away these iniquities from among us. Let them perform a lustration; let them purify this House, and this country, from this sin.

My Lords, I am old and weak, and at present unable to say more; but my feelings and indignation were too strong to have said less. I could not have slept this night in my bed, nor reposed my head on my pillow, without giving this vent to my eternal abhorrence of such preposterous and enormous principles.

Chatham's amendment lost by a vote of 97 to 24, and the address was carried.

Chatham died in the May following the speech, being more thoroughly convinced than ever, by the signing of the treaty between France and America, which took place on February 6, 1778, that Great Britain would never conquer America, and that the attempt to ear of Majesty. "That God and nature put into our hands!" I know not what ideas that Lord may entertain of God and nature, but I know that such abominable principles are equally abhorrent to religion and humanity. What! to attribute the sacred sanction of God and nature to the massacres of the Indian scalping-knife—to the cannibal savage, torturing, murdering, roasting, and eating—literally, my Lords, eating the mangled victims of his barbarous battles! Such horrible notions shock every precept of religion, divine or natural, and every generous feeling of humanity. And, my Lords, they shock every sentiment of honor; they shock me as a lover of honorable war, and a detester of murderous barbarity.

These abominable principles, and this more abominable avowal of them, demand the most decisive indignation. I call upon that right reverend bench, those holy ministers of the Gospel, and pious pastors of our Church—I conjure them to join in the holy work, and vindicate the religion of their God. I appeal to the wisdom and the law of this learned bench to defend and support the justice of their country. I call upon the bishops to interpose the unsullied sanctity of their lawn; upon the learned judges, to interpose the purity of their ermine, to save us from this pollution. I call upon the honor of your Lordships to reverence the dignity of your ancestors, and to maintain your own. I call upon the spirit and humanity of my country to vindicate the national character. I invoke the genius of the constitution. From the tapestry that adorns these walls, the immortal ancestor¹ of this noble Lord frowns with indignation at the disgrace of his country. In vain he led your victorious fleets against the boasted Armada of Spain; in vain he defended and established the honor, the liberties, the religion—the Protestant religion—of this country, against the arbitrary cruelties of popery and the Inquisition, if these more than popish cruelties and inquisitorial practices are let loose among us—to turn forth into our settlements, among our ancient connections, friends, and relations, the merciless cannibal, thirsting for the blood of man, woman, and child, to send forth the infidel savage—against whom? against your Protestant brethren; to lay waste their country, to desolate their dwellings, and extirpate their race and name with these horrible hell-hounds of savage war—hell-hounds, I say, of savage war! Spain armed herself with blood-hounds to extirpate the wretched natives of America, and we improve on the inhuman example even of Spanish cruelty; we turn loose these savage hell-hounds against our brethren and do so would result in the greatest humiliation of her history.

THE FRENCH ALLIANCE

The essential and direct end of the French-American alliance was "to maintain the liberty, sovereignty, and independence, absolute and unlimited, of the United States, as well in matters of government as of commerce."

To this treaty there was annexed a secret article, that the King of Spain (who was the uncle of Louis XVI, and had already secretly contributed supplies to America) might join the alliance at such time as he should judge it proper to do so.

Great Britain was greatly alarmed by the alliance between her ancient enemy France and the revolted colonies. Charles James Fox took this occasion to advocate coming to terms with America.

FOLLY OF THE AMERICAN WAR

CHARLES JAMES FOX

You have now two wars before you, of which you must choose one, for both you cannot support. The war against America has hitherto been carried on against her alone, unassisted by any ally whatever. Notwithstanding she stood alone, you have been obliged, uniformly, to increase your exertions and to push your efforts to the extent of your power without being able to bring it to an issue. You have exerted all your force hitherto without effect, and you cannot now divide a force found already inadequate to its object.

My opinion is for withdrawing your forces from America entirely, for a defensive war you can never think of there. A defensive war would ruin this nation at any time, and, in any circumstances, offensive war is pointed out as proper for this country. Our situation points it out, and the spirit of the nation impels us to attack rather than defend. Attack France, then, for she is our object. The nature of these wars is different. The war against America is against our own countrymen; you have stopped me from saying against your fellow-subjects. That against France is against an inveterate foe and rival. Every blow you strike in America is against yourselves. It is against all idea of reconciliation, and against your own interest, even though you should be able, as you never will be, to force them to submit. Every stroke against France is of advantage to you. America must be conquered in France. France never can be conquered in America.

The war of the Americans is a war of passion. It is of such a nature as to be supported by the most powerful virtues—love of liberty and love of country—and at the same time by those passions in the human heart which give courage, strength, and perseverance to man—the spirit of revenge for the injuries you have done them, of retaliation for the hardships you have inflicted on them, and of opposition to the unjust powers you have exercised over them. Everything combines to animate them to this war; and such a war is without end. Whether it be called obstinacy or enthusiasm, under the name of religion or liberty, the effects are the same. It inspires a spirit which is unconquerable, solicitous to undergo difficulty, danger, and hardship. So long as there is a man in America—a being formed as we are—so long will he present himself against you in the field.

What has become of the ancient spirit of this people? Where is the national spirit that ever did honor to this country?

In accordance with Fox's appeal, or perhaps notwithstanding it, for he had the faculty of arousing antagonism to his propositions, Parliament, on February 17, 1778, passed acts removing the tax on tea, restoring the charter of Massachusetts, and appointing a commission to "treat, consult, and agree upon the means of quieting the disorders" in the colonies, and to declare an armistice pending negotiations. These acts were transmitted to General Washington in April, and by him submitted to Congress. Congress referred them to a committee, and, in pursuance of its report, refused to consider them unless Great Britain either withdrew her fleets and armies, or recognized the independence of the United States.

At last the common people of Great Britain became thoroughly aroused against the further prosecution of the war with America. Their tribune, John Wilkes, voiced their sentiments in a speech on the King's Address at the opening of Parliament in 1780.

JOHN WILKES, ESQ.

Drawn by William Hogarth

REVOLUTION, NOT REBELLION

SPEECH OF JOHN WILKES ON THE AMERICAN WAR

MR. SPEAKER—It ill becomes the duty and dignity of Parliament to lose itself in such a fulsome adulatory address to the throne as that now proposed. We ought rather to approach it with sound and wholesome advice, and even with remonstrances against the ministers who have precipitated the British nation into an unjust, ruinous, murderous, and felonious war. I call the war with our brethren in America an unjust and felonious war, because the primary cause and confessed origin of it is to attempt to take their money from them without their consent, contrary to the common rights of all mankind and to those great fundamental principles of the English constitution for which Hampden bled. I assert that it is a murderous war, because it is an effort to deprive men of their lives for standing up in the defence of their property and their clear rights. Such a war, I fear, will draw down the vengeance of heaven upon this kingdom.

Sir, is any minister weak enough to flatter himself with the conquest of America? You cannot, with all your allies, with all the mercenary ruffians of the North, you cannot effect so wicked a purpose! The Americans will dispute every inch of territory with you, every narrow pass, every strong defile, every Thermopylæ, every Bunker Hill! More than half the empire is already lost, and almost all the rest is in confusion and anarchy. We have appealed to the sword, and what have we gained? Are we to pay as dear for the rest of America? The idea of the conquest of that immense country is as romantic as it is unjust.

But "the Americans have been treated with lenity!" Will facts justify the assertion? Was your Boston "Port Bill" a measure of lenity? Was your Fishery Bill a measure of lenity? Was your bill for taking away the charter of Massachusetts a measure of lenity? I omit your many other gross provocations and insults by which the brave Americans have been driven to their present state. Whether that state is one of rebellion or of fit resistance to unlawful acts of power I shall not declare. This I know: a successful resistance is revolution, not a rebellion. Rebellion, indeed, appears on the back of a flying enemy, but revolution flames on the breastplate of the victorious warrior.

Who can tell whether, in consequence of this day's action, the scabbard may not be thrown away by them as well as by us, and, should success attend them, whether in a few years the independent American may not celebrate the glorious era of the Revolution of 1775 as we do that of 1688?

REJECTION OF BRITISH PROPOSALS

Congress presented an inspiring address to the country, instancing the peace proposals of Great Britain as evidence of her despair, though also of her rage, and warning the people not to relax their efforts for independence. It was written by Samuel Chase:

"BE NOT DECEIVED"

Be not . . . deceived. You have still to expect one severe conflict. Your foreign alliances, though they secure your independence, cannot secure your country from desolation, your habitations from plunder, your wives from insult or violation, nor your children from butchery. Foiled in their principal design, you must expect to feel the rage of disappointed ambition. Arise, then! to your tents! and gird you for battle. It is time to turn the headlong current of vengeance upon the head of the destroyer. . . . They have filled up the measure of their abominations, and like ripe fruit must soon drop from the tree. Although much is done, yet much remains to do. Expect not peace, while any corner of America is in possession of your foes. You must drive them away from this land of promise, a land flowing indeed with milk and honey. . . . For surely there is no man so absurd as to suppose that the least shadow of liberty can be preserved in a dependent connection with Great Britain. From the nature of the thing it is evident that the only security you could obtain would be the justice and moderation of a Parliament who have sold the rights of their own constituents. And this slender security is still farther weakened by the consideration that it was pledged to rebels (as they unjustly call the good people of these States) with whom they think they are not bound to keep faith by any law whatsoever. Thus would you be cast bound among men, whose minds, by your virtuous resistance, have been sharpened to the keenest edge of revenge. Thus would your children and your children's children be by you forced to a participation of all their debts, their wars, their luxuries, and their crimes. And this mad, this impious system they would lead you to adopt, because of the derangement of your finances.

It becomes you deeply to reflect on this subject. Is there a country upon earth which hath such resources for the payment of her debts as America? such an extensive territory? so fertile, so blessed in its climate and productions? surely there is none. Neither is there any, to which the wise Europeans will sooner confide their property. What, then, are the reasons that your money hath depreciated? because no taxes have been imposed to carry on the war. Because your commerce hath been interrupted by your enemy's fleets. Because their armies have ravaged and desolated a part of your country. Because their agents have villainously counterfeited your bills. Because extortioners among you, inflamed with the lust of gain, have added to the price of every article of life. And because weak men have been artfully led to believe that it is of no value. How is this dangerous disease to be remedied? let those among you who have leisure and opportunity collect the moneys which individuals in their neighborhood are desirous of placing in the public funds. Let the several legislatures sink their respective emissions, that so, there being but one kind of bills, there may be less danger of counterfeits. Refrain a little while from purchasing those things which are not absolutely necessary, that so those who have engrossed commodities may suffer (as they deservedly will) the loss of their ill-begotten hoards, by reason of the commerce with foreign nations, which the fleets will protect. Above all, bring forward your armies into the field. Trust not to appearances of peace or safety. Be assured that, unless you persevere, you will be exposed to every species of barbarity. But if you exert the means of defence which God and nature have given you, the time will soon arrive when every man shall sit under his own vine, and under his own fig-tree, and there shall be none to make him afraid.

The sweets of a free commerce with every part of the earth will soon reimburse you for all the losses you have sustained. The full tide of wealth will flow in upon your shores, free from the arbitrary impositions of those whose interest and whose declared policy it was to check your growth. Your interests will be fostered and nourished by governments that derive their power from your grant, and will therefore be obliged, by the influence of cogent necessity, to exert it in your favor. It is to obtain these things that we call your strenuous, unremitted exertions. Yet do not believe that you have been, or can be, saved merely by your own strength. No! it is by the assistance of heaven, and this you must assiduously cultivate, by acts which heaven approves. Thus shall the power and the happiness of these sovereign, free, and independent states, founded on the King, praying "that the war on the continent of North America might no longer be pursued for the impracticable purpose of reducing that country to obedience by force," and expressing their hope, "that the earnest desire and diligent exertion to restore the public tranquillity, of which they had received His Majesty's most gracious assurances, might, by a happy reconciliation with the revolted colonies, be forwarded and made effectual; to which great end, His Majesty's faithful Commons would be ready to give their utmost assistance."

This motion, being lost by a single vote only, was five days after renewed, by the same gentleman in a somewhat different form, and carried, whereupon the ministry resigned, in accordance with that precedent of Parliament which demands a change of government when the ministry is defeated on an important measure.

In the new administration the Marquis of Rockingham was placed at the head of the treasury, and the Earl of Shelburne and Mr. Fox held the important places of secretaries of state. This administration entered into negotiations in regard to peace with the French court and Dr. Franklin. Franklin summoned to his aid John Jay from Madrid.

While the majority of the British cabinet, including the prime minister, were determined to "offer America unlimited, unconditional independence," the Earl of Shelburne was opposed to it as the last measure to which the King would assent. When, on the death of the Marquis of Rockingham, Lord Shelburne was appointed first lord of the treasury, there was an open rupture in the cabinet, Fox and others resigning.

William Jones (afterward Sir William Jones) was sent to Paris to sound Franklin on securing peace short of an express acknowledgment of American independence. On his return he confessed himself defeated in this purpose. "The sturdy trans-atlantic yeomanry," he said, "will neither be dragooned nor bamboozled out of their liberty."

In regard to the policy of Lord Shelburne, Thomas Paine wrote the fourteenth of his papers in "The Crisis."

virtue of their citizens, increase, extend, and endure until the Almighty shall blot out all the empires of the earth.

The peace commissioners sent by Parliament to America could not believe that Congress had been sincere in its refusal even to consider their proposals, and so renewed them. When Congress adhered to its former conditions, the commissioners then addressed their proposals to the colonial assemblies and the "free inhabitants of this once happy empire"; and offered pardon to all who should, within forty days, desert the American cause. They circulated this offer among the soldiers by means of flags of truce.

Congress declared that these actions were violations of international law, and recommended the state authorities to seize the commissioners.

TRIUMPH OF AMERICAN ARMS

While General Nathaniel Greene was conducting his successful campaign in the South, the allied French and American forces under Washington and Rochambeau compelled the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown on October 19, 1781. This brilliant achievement put an end to military operations in America.

PARLIAMENT'S PEACE PROPOSALS

In the meantime a congress of the belligerent nations was to be held at Vienna to negotiate for the reestablishment of peace. But the American minister, John Adams, utterly refused to appear at the congress except as the representative of an independent nation. In this position he was upheld by France, whereupon Great Britain, in September, 1781, refused to accept the mediation of the powers, and thus put an end to the proposal.

Parliament met on the 27th of November, 1781, and, though the speech from the throne still breathed a spirit of hostility, and answers from both Houses were procured, in accordance with it, yet not long after the recess, the ministers found themselves in a minority in the House of Commons. On the 22d of February, 1782, General Conway in the House moved an Address to the

"THE SETTING SUN OF ENGLAND"

LETTER TO THE EARL OF SHELBURNE BY THOMAS PAINE

MY LORD—A speech, which has been printed in several of the British and New York newspapers as coming from Your Lordship, in answer to one from the Duke of Richmond of the tenth of July last, contains expressions and opinions so new and singular, and so enveloped in mysterious reasoning, that I address this publication to you for the purpose of giving them a free and candid examination. The speech that I allude to is in these words:

"His Lordship said it had been mentioned in another place that he had been guilty of inconsistency. To clear himself of this he asserted that he still held the same principles in respect to American independence which he at first imbibed. He had been, and yet was, of opinion that whenever the Parliament of Great Britain acknowledges that point, the sun of England's glory is set forever. Such were the sentiments he possessed on a former day, and such the sentiments he continued to hold at this hour. It was the opinion of Lord Chatham, as well as many other able statesmen.

"Other notable Lords, however, think differently; and, as the majority of the cabinet support them, he acquiesced in the measure, dissenting from the idea; and the point is settled for bringing the matter into the full discussion of Parliament, where it will be candidly, fairly, and impartially debated. The independence of America would end in the ruin of England; and that a peace patched up with France would give that proud enemy the means of yet trampling on this country.

"The sun of England's glory he wished not to see set forever; he looked for a spark at least to be left, which might in time light us up to a new day. But if independence was to be granted, if Parliament deemed that measure prudent, he foresaw, in his own mind, that England was undone. He wished to God that he had been deputed to Congress, that he might plead the cause of that country as well as of this, and that he might exercise whatever powers he possessed as an orator to save both from ruin, by striving to convince Congress that if their independence was signed their liberties were gone forever.

"Peace, His Lordship added, was a desirable object, but it must be an honorable peace and not a humiliating one, dictated by France or insisted on by America. It was very true that this kingdom was not in a flourishing state; it was impoverished by war. But if we were not rich, it was evident that France was poor. If we were straitened in our finances, the enemy were exhausted in their resources.

"This was a great empire; it abounded with brave men who were able and willing to fight in a common cause; the language of humiliation should not, therefore, be the language of Great Britain. His Lordship said that he was not afraid nor ashamed of those expressions going to America. There were numbers, great numbers, there who were of the same way of thinking in

Ours has been the seat of war; yours has seen nothing of it. The most wanton destruction has been committed in our sight; the most insolent barbarity has been acted on our feelings. We can look round and see the remains of burned and destroyed houses, once the fair fruit of hard industry, and now the striking monuments of British brutality. We walk over the dead whom we loved, in every part of America, and remember by whom they fell.

There is scarcely a village but brings to life some melancholy thought, and reminds us of what we have suffered, and those we have lost by the inhumanity of Britain. A thousand images arise to us, which, from situation, you cannot see, and are accompanied by as many ideas which you cannot know; and therefore your supposed system of reasoning would apply to nothing, and all your expectations die of themselves.

The question whether England shall accede to the independence of America, and which Your Lordship says is to undergo a Parliamentary discussion, is so very simple, and composed of so few cases, that it scarcely needs a debate.

It is the only way out of an expensive and ruinous war, which has no object, and without which acknowledgment there can be no peace.

But Your Lordship says, "the sun of Great Britain will set whenever she acknowledges the independence of America"—whereas the metaphor would have been strictly just to have left the sun wholly out of the figure, and have ascribed her not acknowledging it to the influence of the moon.

But the expression, if true, is the greatest confession of disgrace that could be made, and furnishes America with the highest notions of sovereign independent importance.

Mr. Wedderburne, about the year 1776, made use of an idea of much the same kind—"Relinquish America!" says he—"What is it but to desire a giant to shrink spontaneously into a dwarf."

Alas! are those people, who call themselves Englishmen, of so little internal consequence that when America is gone or shuts her eyes upon them, their sun is set, they can shine no more, but grope about in obscurity, and contract into insignificant animals? Was America, then, the giant of the empire, and England only her dwarf in waiting?

Is the case so extremely altered that those who once thought we could not live without them are now brought to declare that they cannot exist without us?

Will they tell to the world, and that from their first minister respect to that country being dependent on this and who, with His Lordship, perceived ruin and independence linked together."

Thus far the speech; on which I remark: That His Lordship is a total stranger to the mind and sentiments of America; that he has wrapped himself up in a fond delusion that something less than independence may, under his administration, be accepted; and he wishes himself sent to Congress to prove the most extraordinary of all doctrines, which is, that independence, the sublimest of all human conditions, is loss of liberty.

In answer to which we may say that, in order to know what the contrary word dependence means, we have only to look back to those years of severe humiliation, when the mildest of all petitions could obtain no other notice than the haughtiest of all insults; and when the base terms of unconditional submission were demanded, or undistinguishable destruction threatened.

It is nothing to us that the ministry have been changed, for they may be changed again. The guilt of a government is the crime of a whole country; and the nation that can, though but for a moment, think and act as England has done can never afterward be believed or trusted. There are cases in which it is as impossible to restore character to life as it is to recover the dead. It is a phoenix that can expire but once, and from whose ashes there is no resurrection.

Some offenses are of such a slight composition that they reach no further than the temper, and are created or cured by a thought.

But the sin of England has struck the heart of America, and nature has not left it in our power to say we can forgive.

Your Lordship wishes for an opportunity to plead before Congress the cause of England and America, and to save, as you say, both from ruin.

That the country which, for more than seven years, has sought our destruction should now cringe to solicit our protection is adding the wretchedness of disgrace to the misery of disappointment; and if England has the least spark of supposed honor left that spark must be darkened by asking, and extinguished by receiving, the smallest favor from America; for the criminal who owes his life to the grace and mercy of the injured is more executed by living than he who dies.

But a thousand pleadings, even from Your Lordship, can have no effect. Honor, interest, and every sensation of the heart would plead against you. We are a people who think not as you think; and, what is equally true, you cannot feel as we feel. The situations of the two countries are exceedingly different.

of state, that America is their all in all; that it is by her importance only they can live, and breathe, and have a being? Will they, who long since threatened to bring us to their feet, bow themselves at ours, and own that without us they are not a nation? Are they become so unqualified to debate on independence that they have lost all idea of it themselves, and are calling to the rocks and mountains of America to cover their insignificance?

Or, if America is lost, is it manly to sob over it like a child for its rattle, and invite the laughter of the world by declarations of disgrace? Surely the more consistent conduct would be to bear it without complaint; and to show that England, without America, can preserve her independence and a suitable rank with other European powers. You were not contented while you had her, and to weep for her now is childish.

But Lord Shelburne thinks something may yet be done. What that something is, or how it is to be accomplished, is a matter in obscurity. By arms there is no hope. The experience of nearly eight years, with the expense of £100,000,000 sterling and the loss of two armies, must positively decide that point.

Besides, the British have lost their interest in America with the disaffected. Every part of it has been tried. There is no new scene left for delusion; and the thousands who have been ruined by adhering to them, and have now to quit the settlements they had acquired, and be conveyed like transports to cultivate the deserts of Augustine and Nova Scotia, has put an end to all further expectations of aid.

If you cast your eyes on the people of England, what have they to console themselves with for the millions expended? Or what encouragement is there left to continue throwing good money after bad? America can carry on the war for ten years longer, and all the charges of government included, for less than you can defray the charges of war and government for one year. And I, who know both countries, know well that the people of America can afford to pay their share of the expense much better than the people of England can.

Besides, it is their own estates and property, their own rights, liberties, and government they are defending.

The British army in America care not how long the war lasts. They enjoy an easy and indolent life. They fatten on the folly of one country and the spoils of another; and, between their plunder and their pay, may go home rich.

But the case is very different with the laboring farmer, the working tradesman, and the necessitous poor in England, the sweat of whose brow goes day after day to feed, in prodigality and sloth, the army that is robbing both them and us. Removed from the eye of the country that supports them, and distant from the government that employs them, they cut and carve for themselves, and there is none to call them to account.

But England will be ruined, says Lord Shelburne, if America is independent.

Then, I say, is England already ruined, for America is already independent; and if Lord Shelburne will not allow this, he immediately denies the fact which he infers. Besides, to make England the mere creature of America is paying too great a compliment to us, and too little to himself.

But the declaration is a rhapsody of inconsistency. For to say, as Lord Shelburne has numberless times said, that the war against America is ruinous, and yet to continue the prosecution of that ruinous war for the purpose of avoiding ruin, is a language which cannot be understood.

Neither is it possible to see how the independence of America is to accomplish the ruin of England after the war is over, and yet not effect it before. America cannot be more independent of her, nor a greater enemy to her, hereafter, than she now is; nor can England derive less advantages from her than at present. Why, then, is ruin to follow in the best state of the case, and not in the worst? And, if not in the worst, why is it to follow at all?

That a nation is to be ruined by peace and commerce, and fourteen or fifteen millions a year less expenses than before, is a new doctrine in politics. We have heard much clamor of national savings and economy; but surely the true economy would be to save the whole charge of a silly, foolish, and headstrong war; because, compared with this, all other retrenchments are baubles and trifles.

But is it possible that Lord Shelburne can be serious in supposing the least advantage can be obtained by arms, or that any advantage can be equal to the expense or the danger of attempting it?

Will not the capture of one army after another satisfy him; must all become prisoners? Must England ever be the sport of hope and the victim of delusion? Sometimes our currency was to fail; another time our army was to disband; then whole provinces were to revolt. And thus, from year to year, has every straw been caught at, and every will-with-a-wisp led them a new dance.

This year a still new folly is to take place. Lord Shelburne on his head the ensigns of her disgust. It is kissing the hand that boxes his ears and proposes to renew the exchange.

The thought is as servile as the war is wicked and shows the last scene of the drama as inconsistent as the first.

As America is gone, the only act of manhood is to let her go. Your Lordship had no hand in the separation and you will gain no honor by temporizing politics. Besides, there is something so exceedingly whimsical, unsteady, and even insincere in the present conduct of England that she exhibits herself in the most dishonorable colors.

On the second of August last General Carlton and Admiral Digby wrote to General Washington in these words:

"The resolution of the House of Commons of the twenty-seventh of February last has been placed in Your Excellency's hands, and intimations given at the same time that further pacific measures were likely to follow. Since which, until the present time, we have had no direct communications from England; but a mail is now arrived which brings us very important information. We are acquainted, sir, by authority, that negotiations for a general peace have already commenced at Paris, and that Mr. Grenville is invested with full powers to treat with all the parties at war, and is now at Paris in the execution of his commission.

"And we are further, sir, made acquainted that His Majesty, in order to remove any obstacles to that peace which he so ardently wishes to restore, has commanded his ministers to direct Mr. Grenville that the independence of the Thirteen United Provinces should be proposed by him in the first instance, instead of making it a condition of a general treaty."

Now, taking your present measures into view and comparing them with the declaration in this letter, pray, what is the word of your King, or his ministers, or the Parliament good for? Must we not look upon you as a confederated body of faithless, treacherous men, whose assurances were fraud and their language deceit? What opinion can we possibly form of you, but that you are a lost, abandoned, profligate nation, who sport even with your own character, and to be held by nothing but the bayonet or the halter?

To say, after this, that the sun of Great Britain will be set whenever she acknowledges the independence of America, when the not doing it is the unqualified lie of government, can be no other than the language of ridicule, the jargon of inconsistency. There were thousands in America who predicted the delusion, and looked upon it as a trick of treachery, to take us from our wishes to be sent to Congress, and he thinks that something may be done.

Are not the repeated declarations of Congress, and which all America supports, that they will not even hear any proposals whatever until the unconditional and unequivocal independence of America is recognized; are not, I say, these declarations answer enough?

But for England to receive anything from America now, after so many insults, injuries, and outrages acted toward us, would show such a spirit of meanness in her that we could not but despise her for accepting it. And so far from Lord Shelburne coming here to solicit it, it would be the greatest disgrace we could do them to offer it.

England would appear a wretch indeed, at this time of day, to ask or owe anything to the bounty of America. Has not the name of Englishman blots enough upon it without inventing more? Even Lucifer would scorn to reign in heaven by permission, and yet an Englishman can creep for only an entrance into America. Or, has a land of liberty so many charms that to be a doorkeeper in it is better than to be an English minister of state?

But what can this expected something be? Or, if obtained, what can it amount to but new disgraces, contentions, and quarrels?

The people of America have for years accustomed themselves to think and speak freely and contemptuously of English authority, and the inveteracy is so deeply rooted that a person invested with any authority from that country and attempting to exercise it here would have the life of a toad under a harrow.

They would look upon him as an interloper to whom their compassion permitted a residence. He would be no more than the Mungo of a farce; and, if he disliked that, he must set off. It would be a station of degradation, debased by our pity and despised by our pride, and would place England in a more contemptible situation than any she has yet suffered by the war.

We have too high an opinion of ourselves ever to think of yielding again the least obedience to outlandish authority; and, for a thousand reasons, England would be the last country in the world to yield it to. She has been treacherous, and we know it. Her character is gone, and we have seen the funeral.

Surely she loves to fish in troubled waters and drink the cup of contention, or she would not now think of mingling her affairs with those of America. It would be like a foolish dotard taking to his arms the bride that despises him, or who placed guard, and draw off our attention from the only system of finance by which we can be called, or deserve to be called, a sovereign, independent people. The fraud, on your part, might be worth attempting, but the sacrifice to obtain it is too high.

There are others who credited the assurance because they thought it impossible that men who had their characters to establish would begin it with a lie. The prosecution of the war by the former ministry was savage and horrid, since which it has been mean, trickish, and delusive. The one went greedily into the passion of revenge, the other into the subtleties of low contrivances; till, between the crimes of both, there is scarcely left a man in America, be he Whig or Tory, who does not despise or detest the conduct of Britain.

The management of Lord Shelburne, whatever may be his views, is a caution to us, and must be to the world, never to regard British assurances. A perfidy so notorious cannot be hid. It stands, even in the public papers of New York, with the names of Carlton and Digby affixed to it. It is a proclamation that the King of England is not to be believed; that the spirit of lying is the governing principle of the ministry. It is holding up the character of the House of Commons to public infamy, and warning all men not to credit them. Such are the consequences which Lord Shelburne's management has brought upon his country.

After the authorized declarations contained in Carlton and Digby's letter you ought, from every motive of honor, policy, and prudence, to have fulfilled them, whatever might have been the event. It was the least atonement you could possibly make to America, and the greatest kindness you could do to yourselves; for you will save millions by a general peace, and you will lose as many by continuing the war.

COMMON SENSE.

Philadelphia, October 29, 1782.

PARLIAMENT'S ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE

At last the ministry and the King realized that independence would have to be explicitly granted, and so agreed to a provisional treaty which should do this.

Preliminary treaties between Great Britain and France and Spain were also signed (on January 20, 1783). These and the American treaty were laid before Parliament in February and precipitated a violent debate, which resulted in forcing Shelburne to resign, and, indeed, a new ministry to be appointed, the Duke of Portland becoming prime minister, and Lord North and Mr. Fox, by an extraordinary coalition, secretaries of state. In April the new administration sent David Hartley to Paris to complete the treaty. On the 15th of the same month the American Congress ratified the terms. The definitive treaty, differing little from the provisional, was signed at Paris on September 3, 1783, and was ratified by Congress on January 14, 1784.

THE need of a definite form of union was early felt, but, owing to the prevalent idea of primary allegiance to the States, was not easily agreed upon. Even before the Declaration of Independence was adopted, Dr. Franklin had, on July 21, 1775, presented to Congress a draft of Articles of Confederation as a plan of colonial union. Though not copied in the Journal of Congress, they remained on file in his handwriting, and had a considerable influence in the formation of the Articles of Confederation which were afterward adopted.

As Jefferson has stated (page 191), on June 11, 1776, Congress appointed a committee to prepare the form of a confederation to be entered into between the colonies. On July 12 the committee made its report.

THE CONFEDERATION

In the debate which ensued upon the report the principal speakers were: Samuel Chase [Md.], John Adams [Mass.], Benjamin Harrison [Va.], James Wilson [Pa.], Dr. John Witherspoon [N. J.], Dr. Benjamin Franklin [Pa.], Dr. Benjamin Rush [Pa.], and Stephen Hopkins [R. I.].

Jefferson has given the following notes of the debate upon the proposed Articles of Confederation:

DEBATE ON THE CONFEDERATION

NOTES OF THOMAS JEFFERSON

On Friday, July 12, the committee appointed to draw the Articles of Confederation reported them, and on the 22d the House resolved themselves into a committee to take them into consideration. On the 30th and 31st of that month and 1st of the ensuing those articles were debated which determined the proportion, or quota, of money which each State should furnish to the common treasury, and the manner of voting in Congress. The first of these articles was expressed in the original draft in these words:

"Art. XI. All charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence or general welfare and allowed by the United States assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several colonies in proportion to the number of inhabitants of every age, sex, and quality, except Indians not paying taxes, in each colony—a true account of which, distinguishing the white inhabitants, shall be triennially taken and transmitted to the Assembly of the United States."

MR. CHASE moved that the quotas should be fixed, not by the number of inhabitants of every condition, but by that of the "white inhabitants." He admitted that taxation should be always in proportion to property; that this was, in theory, the true rule; but that, from a variety of difficulties, it was a rule which could never be adopted in practice. The value of the property in every State could never be estimated justly and equally. Some other measures for the wealth of the State must therefore be devised, some standard referred to, which would be more simple. He considered the number of inhabitants as a tolerably good criterion of property, and that this might always be obtained. He therefore thought it the best mode which we could adopt, with one exception only: he observed that negroes are property, and, as such, cannot be distinguished from the lands or personalities held in those States where there are few slaves; that the surplus of profit which a northern farmer is able to lay by, he invests in cattle, horses, etc., whereas a southern farmer lays out the same surplus in slaves. There is no more reason, therefore, for taxing the southern States on the farmer's head, and on his slave's head, than the northern ones on their farmers' heads and the heads of their cattle; that the method proposed would, therefore, tax the southern States according to their numbers and their wealth conjointly, while the northern would be taxed on numbers only; that negroes, in fact, should not be considered as members of the State, more than cattle, and that they have no more interest in it.

MR. JOHN ADAMS observed that the numbers of people are taken, by this article, as an index of the wealth of the State, and not as subjects of taxation; that, as to this matter, it was of no consequence by what name you called your people, whether by that of freemen or of slaves; that, in some countries, the laboring poor are called freemen, in others they were called slaves; but that the difference as to the State was imaginary only. What matters it whether a landlord, employing ten laborers on his farm, give them annually as much money as will buy them the necessaries of life or give them those necessaries at short hand? The ten laborers add as much wealth to the State, increase its exports as much in the one case as the other. Certainly five hundred freemen produce no more profits, no greater surplus for the payment of taxes than five hundred slaves. Therefore the State in which the laborers called freemen should be taxed no more than that in which are those called slaves. Suppose, by an extraordinary operation of nature or of law, one-half the laborers of a State could, in the course of one night, be transformed into slaves; would the State be made the poorer, or the less able to pay taxes? That the condition of the laboring poor in most countries—that of the fishermen particularly of the northern States—is as abject as that of slaves. It is the number of laborers which produces the surplus for taxation; and numbers, therefore, indiscriminately, are the fair index to wealth; that it is the use of the word "property" here, and its application to some of the people of the State, which produces the fallacy. How does the southern farmer procure slaves? Either by importation or by purchase from his neighbor. If he imports a slave he adds one to the number of laborers in his country, and, proportionately, to its profits and ability to pay taxes. If he buys from his neighbor it is only a transfer of a laborer from one farm to another, which does not change the annual produce of the State and therefore should not change its tax; that if a northern farmer works ten laborers on his farm he can, it is true, invest the surplus of ten men's labor in cattle; but so may the southern farmer working ten slaves; that a State of one hundred thousand freemen can maintain no more cattle than one of one hundred thousand slaves. Therefore they have no more of that kind of property. That a slave may, indeed, from the custom of speech, be more properly called the wealth of his master than the free laborer might be called the wealth of his employer; but, as to the state, both were equally its wealth and should therefore equally add to the quota of its tax.

Mr. HARRISON proposed, as a compromise, that two slaves should be counted as one freeman. He affirmed that slaves did not do as much work as freemen and doubted if two effected more than one; that this was proved by the price of labor—the hire of a laborer in the southern colonies being from £8 to £12, while in the northern it was generally £24.

Mr. WILSON said that, if this amendment should take place, the southern colonies would have all the benefit of slaves, while the northern ones would bear the burden; that slaves increase the profits of a State, which the southern States mean to take to themselves; that they also increase the burden of defence, which would, of course, fall so much the heavier on the northern; that slaves occupy the places of freemen and eat their food. Dismiss your slaves and freemen will take their places. It is our duty to lay every discouragement on the importation of slaves; but this amendment would give the jus trium liberorum to him who would import slaves; that other kinds of property were pretty equally distributed through all the colonies—there were as many cattle, horses, and sheep in the north as the south, and south as the north, but not so as to slaves—that experience has shown that those colonies have been always able to pay most which have the most inhabitants, whether they be black or white; and the practice of the southern colonies has always been to make every farmer pay poll taxes upon all his laborers, whether they be black or white. He acknowledges, indeed, that freemen work the most; but they consume the most also. They do not produce a greater surplus for taxation. The slave is neither fed nor clothed so expensively as a freeman. Again, white women are exempted from labor generally, but negro women are not. In this, then, the southern States have an advantage as the article now stands. It has sometimes been said that slavery is necessary, because the commodities they raise would be too dear for market if cultivated by freemen; but now it is said that the labor of the slave is the dearest.

Mr. PAYNE urged the original resolution of Congress to proportion the quotas of the States to the number of souls.

Dr. WITHERSPOON was of opinion that the value of lands and houses was the best estimate of the wealth of a nation, and that it was practicable to obtain such a valuation. This is the true barometer of wealth. The one now proposed is imperfect in itself and unequal between the States. It has been objected that negroes eat the food of freemen and therefore should be taxed: horses also eat the food of freemen; therefore they also should be taxed. It has been said, too, that, in carrying slaves into the estimate of the taxes the State is to pay, we do no more than those States themselves do who always take slaves into the estimate of the taxes the individual is to pay. But the cases are not parallel. In the southern colonies slaves pervade the whole colony; but they do not pervade the whole continent. That, as to the original resolution of Congress, to proportion the quotas according to the souls it was temporary only and related to the moneys heretofore emitted; whereas we are now entering into a new compact and therefore stand on original ground.

The question being put on August 1, the amendment proposed was rejected by the votes of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, against those of Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina. Georgia was divided.

The other article was in these words: "Art. XVII: In determining questions, each colony shall have one vote."

July 30, 31, August 1.—Present forty-one members. Mr. CHASE observed that this article was the most likely to divide us of any one proposed in the draft then under consideration. That the larger colonies had threatened they would not confederate at all if their weight in Congress should not be equal to the numbers of people they added to the confederacy; while the smaller ones declared against a union if they did not retain an equal vote for the protection of their rights. That it was of the utmost consequence to bring the parties together, as, should we sever from each other, either no foreign power will ally with us at all or the different States will form different alliances and thus increase the horrors of those scenes of civil war and bloodshed which, in such a state of separation and independence, would render us a miserable people. That our importance, our interests, our peace, required that we should confederate, and that mutual sacrifices should be made to effect a compromise of this difficult question. He was of opinion the smaller colonies would lose their rights if they were not in some instances allowed an equal vote, and, therefore, that a discrimination should take place among the questions which would come before Congress. That the smaller States should be secured in all questions concerning life or liberty, and the greater ones in all respecting property. He therefore proposed that, in votes relating to money, the voice of each colony should be proportioned to the number of its inhabitants.

Dr. FRANKLIN thought that the votes should be so proportioned in all cases. He took notice that the Delaware counties had bound up their delegates to disagree to this article. He thought it very extraordinary language to be held by any State that they would not confederate with us unless we would let them dispose of our money. Certainly, if we vote equally, we ought to pay equally; but the smaller States will hardly purchase the privilege at this price. That, had he lived in a State where the representation, originally equal, had become unequal by time and accident, he might have submitted rather than disturb government; but that we should be very wrong to set out in this practice when it is in our power to establish what is right. That at the time of the union between England and Scotland the latter had made the objection which the smaller States now do, but experience had proved that no unfairness had ever been shown them; that their advocates had prognosticated that it would again happen, as in times of old, that the whale would swallow Jonah; but he thought the prediction reversed in event and that Jonah had swallowed the whale; for the Scotch had, in fact, got possession of the government and gave laws to the English. He reprobated the original agreement of Congress to vote by colonies, and, therefore, was for their voting, in all cases, according to the number of taxables.

Dr. WITHERSPOON opposed every alteration of the article. All men admit that a confederacy is necessary. Should the idea get abroad that there is likely to be no union among us it will damp the minds of the people, diminish the glory of our struggle, and lessen its importance; because it will open to our view future prospects of war and dissension among ourselves. If an equal vote be refused the smaller States will become vassals to the larger, and all experience has shown that the vassals and subjects of free states are the most enslaved. He instanced the helots of Sparta and the provinces of Rome. He observed that foreign powers, discovering this blemish, would make it a handle for disengaging the smaller States from so unequal a confederacy. That the colonies should, in fact, be considered as individuals; and that, as such, in all disputes they should have an equal vote; that they are now collected as individuals making a bargain with each other, and, of course, had a right to vote as individuals. That in the East India Company they voted by persons and not by their proportion of stock. That the Belgic confederacy voted by provinces. That in questions of war the smaller States were as much interested as the larger and therefore should vote equally; and, indeed, that the larger States were more likely to bring war on the confederacy in proportion as their frontier was more extensive. He admitted that equality of representation was an excellent principle, but then it must be of things which are coördinate, that is, of things similar and of the same nature; that nothing relating to individuals could ever come before Congress; nothing but what would respect colonies. He distinguished between an incorporating and a federal union. The union of England was an incorporating one; yet Scotland had suffered by that union: for that its inhabitants were drawn from it by the hopes of places and employments; nor was it an instance of equality of representation, because, while Scotland was allowed nearly a thirtieth of representation, they were to pay only one-fortieth of the land tax. He expressed his hopes that in the present enlightened state of men's minds we might expect a lasting confederacy if it was founded on fair principles.

JOHN ADAMS advocated the voting in proportion to numbers. He said that we stand here as the representatives of the people; that in some States the people are many, in others they are few; that, therefore, their vote here should be proportioned to the numbers from whom it comes. Reason, justice, and equity never had weight enough on the face of the earth to govern the councils of men. It is interest alone which does it and it is interest alone which can be trusted; that, therefore, the interests within doors should be the mathematical representatives of the interests without doors; that the individuality of the colonies is a mere sound. Does the individuality of a colony increase its wealth or numbers? If it does, pay equally. If it does not add weight in the scale of the confederacy, it cannot add to their rights nor weigh in argument. A has £50, B £500, C £1,000 in partnership. Is it just they should equally dispose of the moneys of the partnership? It has been said we are independent individuals making a bargain together. The question is not what we are now, but what we ought to be when our bargain shall be made. The confederacy is to make us one individual only; it is to form us, like separate parcels of metal, into one common mass. We shall no longer retain our separate individuality, but become a single individual as to all questions submitted to the confederacy. Therefore all those reasons which prove the justice and expediency of equal representation in other assemblies hold good here. It has been objected that a proportional vote will endanger the smaller States. We answer that an equal vote will endanger the larger. Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts are the three greater colonies. Consider their distance, their difference of produce, of interests, and of manners, and it is apparent they can never have an interest or inclination to combine for the oppression of the smaller; that the smaller will naturally divide on all questions with the larger. Rhode Island, from its relation, similarity, and intercourse, will generally pursue the same objects with Massachusetts; Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland, with Pennsylvania.

DR. RUSH took notice that the decay of the liberties of the Dutch republic proceeded from three causes: 1. the perfect unanimity requisite on all occasions; 2. their obligation to consult their constituents; 3. their voting by provinces. This last destroyed the equality of representation; and the liberties of Great Britain, also, are sinking from the same defect. That a part of our rights is deposited in the hands of our legislatures. There, it was admitted, there should be an equality of representation. Another part of our rights is deposited in the hands of Congress. Why is it not equally necessary there should be an equal representation there? Were it possible to collect the whole body of the people together they would determine the questions submitted to them by their majority. Why should not the same majority decide when voting here by their representatives? The larger colonies are so providentially divided in situation as to render every fear of their combining visionary. Their interests are different and their circumstances dissimilar. It is more probable they will become rivals and leave it in the power of the smaller States to give preponderance to any scale they please. The voting by the number of free inhabitants will have one excellent effect—that of inducing the colonies to discourage slavery and to encourage the increase of their free inhabitants.

MR. HOPKINS observed there were four larger, four smaller, and four middle sized colonies. That the four largest would contain more than half the inhabitants of the confederating States, and, therefore, would govern the others as they should please. That history affords no instance of such a thing as equal representation. The Germanic body votes by states; the Helvetic body does the same; and so does the Belgic confederacy. That too little is known of the ancient confederations to say what was their practice.

MR. WILSON thought that taxation should be in proportion to wealth, but that representation should accord with the number of freemen. That government is a collection or result of the wills of all; that if any government could speak the will of all it would be perfect; and that, so far as it departs from this, it becomes imperfect. It has been said that Congress is a representation of States, not of individuals. I say that the objects of its care are all the individuals of the States. It is strange that annexing the name of "state" to ten thousand men should give them an equal right with forty thousand. This must be the effect of magic not of reason. As to those matters which are referred to Congress, we are not so many States; we are one large state. We lay aside our individuality whenever we come here. The Germanic body is a burlesque on government, and their practice on any point is a sufficient authority and proof that it is wrong. The greatest imperfection in the constitution of the Belgic confederacy is their voting by provinces. The interest of the whole is constantly sacrificed to that of the small states. The history of the war in the reign of Queen Anne sufficiently proves this. It is asked: Shall nine colonies put it into the power of four to govern them as they please? I invert the question and ask: Shall two millions of people put it into the power of one million to govern them as they please? It is pretended, too, that the smaller colonies will be in danger from the greater. Speak in honest language and say: the minority will be in danger from the majority. And is there an assembly on earth where this danger may not be equally pretended? The truth is that our proceedings will then be contemporaneous with the interests of the majority, and so they ought to be. The probability is much greater that the larger States will disagree than that they will combine. I defy the wit of man to invent a possible case, or to suggest any one thing on earth, which shall be for the interests of Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts, and which will not also be for the interests of the other States.

The Articles of Confederation were debated from day to day, and time to time, for two years. On November 17, 1777, Congress, then in session at York, Pa., sent copies of the plan of Confederation to the legislatures of the States, and urged their early action upon it, saying:

"More than any other consideration it will confound our foreign enemies, defeat the flagitious practices of the disaffected, strengthen and confirm our friends, support our public credit, restore the value of our money, enable us to maintain our fleets and armies, and add weight and respect to our councils at home and to our treaties abroad.

"In short, this salutary measure can no longer be deferred. it seems essential to our very existence as a free people; and, without it, we may soon be constrained to bid adieu to independence, to liberty, and safety—blessings which, from the justice of our cause, and the favor of our Almighty Creator visibly manifested in our protection, we have reason to expect, if, in an humble dependence on His divine providence, we strenuously exert the means which are placed in our power."

The Articles were ratified on July 9, 1778, by eight States; but the ratifications were not completed until January 30, 1781, when Maryland, the last State to give her assent, empowered her delegates to subscribe and ratify the Articles. Congress assembled on the 2d of March under the new powers.

The following is the text of the Articles:

THE ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION

TO ALL TO WHOM THESE PRESENTS SHALL COME,

We, the undersigned, Delegates of the States affixed to our names, send greeting:

WHEREAS the delegates of the United States of America in Congress assembled, did, on the fifteenth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven, and in the second year of the Independence of America, agree to certain Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union, between the States¹ of New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island, and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, in the words following, viz.:

¹The initial of "States" is not capitalized anywhere in the original.

Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union, between the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island, and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.

Article 1. The style of this confederacy shall be, "The United States of America."

Art. 2. Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled.

Art. 3. The said States hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other for their common defence, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare; binding themselves to assist each other against all force offered to, or attacks made upon, them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretence whatever.

Art. 4. The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different States in this Union, the free inhabitants of each of these States—paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice, excepted—shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States; and the people of each State shall have free ingress and regress to and from any other State, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions, and restrictions as the inhabitants thereof, respectively, provided that such restrictions shall not extend so far as to prevent the removal of property imported into any State from any other State, of which the owner is an inhabitant; provided, also, that no imposition, duty, or restriction shall be laid by any State on the property of the United States, or either of them.

If any person guilty of, or charged with, treason, felony, or other high misdemeanor in any State shall flee from justice and be found in any of the United States, he shall, upon demand of the governor or executive power of the State from which he fled, be delivered up and removed to the State having jurisdiction of his offence.

Full faith and credit shall be given in each of these States to the records, acts, and judicial proceedings of the courts and magistrates of every other State.

Art. 5. For the more convenient management of the general interests of the United States, delegates shall be annually appointed in such manner as the legislature of each State shall direct, to meet in Congress on the first Monday in November, in every year, with a power reserved to each State to recall its delegates, or any of them, at any time within the year, and to send others in their stead for the remainder of the year.

No State shall be represented in Congress by less than two, nor by more than seven members; and no person shall be capable of being a delegate for more than three years in any term of six years; nor shall any person, being a delegate, be capable of holding any office under the United States, for which he, or another for his benefit, receives any salary, fees, or emolument of any kind.

Each State shall maintain its own delegates in a meeting of the States, and while they act as members of the committee of the States.

In determining questions in the United States in Congress assembled, each State shall have one vote.

Freedom of speech and debate in Congress shall not be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Congress; and the members of Congress shall be protected in their persons from arrests and imprisonments during the time of their going to and from, and attendance on, Congress, except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace.

Art. 6. No State, without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, shall send any embassy to, or receive any embassy from, or enter into any conference, agreement, alliance, or treaty, with any king, prince, or state; nor shall any person holding any office of profit or trust under the United States, or any of them, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state; nor shall the United States in Congress assembled, or any of them, grant any title of nobility.

No two or more States shall enter into any treaty, confederation, or alliance whatever between them without consent of the United States in Congress assembled, specifying accurately the purposes for which the same is to be entered into, and how long it shall continue.

No State shall lay any imposts or duties which may interfere with any stipulations in treaties entered into by the United States in Congress assembled with any king, prince, or state, in pursuance of any treaties already proposed by Congress to the courts of France and Spain.

No vessel of war shall be kept up in time of peace by any State, except such number only as shall be deemed necessary by the United States in Congress assembled for the defence of such State, or its trade; nor shall any body of forces be kept up by any State in time of peace, except such number only as, in the judgment of the United States in Congress assembled, shall be deemed requisite to garrison the forts necessary for the defence of such State; but every State shall always keep up a well-regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred, and shall provide and have constantly ready for use in public stores a due number of field-pieces and tents and a proper quantity of arms, ammunition, and camp equipage.

No State shall engage in any war without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, unless such State be actually invaded by enemies, or shall have received certain advice of a resolution being formed by some nation of Indians to invade such State, and the danger is so imminent as not to admit of a delay till the United States in Congress assembled can be consulted; nor shall any State grant commissions to any ships or vessels of war, nor letters of marque or reprisal, except it be after a declaration of war by the United States in Congress assembled, and then only against the kingdom or state, and the subjects thereof, against which war has been so declared, and under such regulations as shall be established by the United States in Congress assembled, unless such State be infested by pirates; in which case, vessels of war may be fitted out for that occasion and kept so long as the danger shall continue, or until the United States in Congress assembled shall determine otherwise.

Art. 7. When land forces are raised by any State for the common defence, all officers of or under the rank of colonel shall be appointed by the legislature of each State, respectively, by whom such forces shall be raised, or in such manner as such State shall direct; and all vacancies shall be filled up by the State which first made the appointment.

Art. 8. All charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence or general warfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States, in proportion to the value of all land within each State, granted to or surveyed for any person, as such land, and the buildings and improvements thereon, shall be estimated, according to such mode as the United States in Congress assembled shall, from time to time, direct and appoint.

The taxes for paying that proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the legislatures of the several States within the time agreed upon by the United States in Congress assembled.

Art. 9. The United States in Congress assembled shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war, except in the cases mentioned in the sixth article—of sending and receiving ambassadors—entering into treaties and alliances; provided that no treaty of commerce shall be made whereby the legislative power of the respective States shall be restrained from imposing such imposts and duties on foreigners as their own people are subjected to, or from prohibiting the exportation or importation of any species of goods or commodities whatsoever—of establishing rules for deciding, in all cases, what captures, on land or water, shall be legal, and in what manner prizes taken by land or naval forces in the service of the United States shall be divided or appropriated—of granting letters of marque and reprisal in times of peace—appointing courts for the trial of piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and establishing courts for receiving and determining finally appeals in all cases of capture; provided that no member of Congress shall be appointed a judge of any of the said courts.

The United States in Congress assembled shall also be the last resort on appeal in all disputes and differences now subsisting, or that hereafter may arise, between two or more States concerning boundary, jurisdiction, or any other cause whatever; which authority shall always be exercised in the manner following: Whenever the legislative or executive authority, or lawful agent, of any State in controversy with another shall present a petition to Congress stating the matter in question and praying for a hearing, notice thereof shall be given by order of Congress to the legislative or executive authority of the other State in controversy, and a day assigned for the appearance of the parties by their lawful agents, who shall then be directed to appoint, by joint consent, commissioners or judges to constitute a court for hearing and determining the matter in question; but if they cannot agree Congress shall name three persons out of each of the United States, and from the list of such persons each party shall alternately strike out one, the petitioners beginning, until the number shall be reduced to thirteen; and from that number not less than seven nor more than nine names, as Congress shall direct, shall, in the presence of Congress, be drawn out by lot; and the persons whose names shall be so drawn, or any five of them, shall be commissioners or judges, to hear and finally determine the controversy, so always as a major part of the judges, who shall hear the cause, shall agree in the determination; and, if either party shall neglect to attend at the day appointed, without showing reason which Congress shall judge sufficient, or, being present, shall refuse to strike, the Congress shall proceed to nominate three persons out of each State, and the secretary of Congress shall strike in behalf of such party absent or refusing; and the judgment and sentence of the court, to be appointed in the manner before prescribed, shall be final and conclusive; and, if any of the parties shall refuse to submit to the authority of such court, or to appear or defend their claim or cause, the court shall nevertheless proceed to pronounce sentence or judgment, which shall, in like manner, be final and decisive—the judgment or sentence, and other proceedings, being in either case transmitted to Congress, and lodged among the acts of Congress for the security of the parties concerned; provided that every commissioner, before he sits in judgment, shall take an oath, to be administered by one of the judges of the supreme or superior court of the State where the cause shall be tried, "well and truly to hear and determine the matter in question, according to the best of his judgment, without favor, affection, or hope of reward"; provided, also, that no State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States.

All controversies concerning the private right of soil, claimed under different grants of two or more States, whose jurisdiction, as they may respect such lands, and the States which passed such grants, are adjusted, the said grants, or either of them, being at the same time claimed to have originated antecedent to such settlement of jurisdiction, shall, on the petition of either party to the Congress of the United States, be finally determined, as near as may be, in the same manner as is before prescribed for deciding disputes respecting territorial jurisdiction between different States.

The United States in Congress assembled shall also have the sole and exclusive right and power of regulating the alloy and value of coin struck by their own authority, or by that of the respective States; fixing the standard of weights and measures throughout the United States; regulating the trade and managing all affairs with the Indians not members of any of the States, provided that the legislative right of any State within its own limits be not infringed or violated; establishing and regulating post-offices from one State to another throughout all the United States, and exacting such postage on the papers passing through the same as may be requisite to defray the expenses of the said office; appointing all officers of the land forces in the service of the United States, excepting regimental officers; appointing all the officers of the naval forces, and commissioning all officers whatever in the service of the United States; making rules for the government and regulation of the said land and naval forces, and directing their operations.

The United States in Congress assembled shall have authority to appoint a committee to sit in the recess of Congress, to be denominated "a committee of the States," and to consist of one delegate from each State; and to appoint such other committees and civil officers as may be necessary for managing the general affairs of the United States under their direction—to appoint one of their number to preside, provided that no person be allowed to serve in the office of president more than one year in any term of three years—to ascertain the necessary sums of money to be raised for the service of the United States, and to appropriate and apply the same for defraying the public expenses—to borrow money or emit bills on the credit of the United States, transmitting, every half year, to the respective States an account of the sums of money so borrowed or emitted—to build and equip a navy—to agree upon the number of land forces, and to make requisition from each State for its quota, in proportion to the number of white inhabitants in such State; which requisitions shall be binding; and thereupon the legislature of each State shall appoint the regimental officers, raise the men, and clothe, arm, and equip them in a soldier-like manner, at the expense of the United States; and the officers and men so clothed, armed, and equipped shall march to the place appointed, and within the time agreed on by the United States in Congress assembled: but, if the United States in Congress assembled shall, on consideration of circumstances, judge proper that any State should not raise men, or should raise a smaller number than its quota, and that any other State should raise a greater number of men than the quota thereof, such extra number shall be raised, officered, clothed, armed, and equipped in the same manner as the quota of such State, unless the legislature of such State shall judge that such extra number cannot be safely spared out of the same; in which case they shall raise, officer, clothe, arm, and equip as many of such extra number as they judge can be safely spared. And the officers and men so clothed, armed, and equipped shall march to the place appointed and within the time agreed on by the United States in Congress assembled.

The United States in Congress assembled shall never engage in a war; nor grant letters of marque and reprisal in time of peace; nor enter into any treaties or alliances; nor coin money; nor regulate the value thereof; nor ascertain the sums and exby this Confederation, are submitted to them. And the articles of this Confederation shall be inviolably observed by every State, and the union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them, unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterward confirmed by the legislature of every State.

RATIFICATION

And whereas it has pleased the Great Governor of the world to incline the hearts of the legislatures we respectively represent in Congress to approve of and to authorize us to ratify the said Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union: Know ye, That we, the undersigned delegates, by virtue of the power and authority to us given for that purpose, do, by these presents, in the name and in behalf of our respective constituents, fully and entirely ratify and confirm each and every of the said Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union, and all and singular the matters and things therein contained; and we do further solemnly plight and engage the faith of our respective constituents that they shall abide by the determinations of the United States in Congress assembled on all questions which by the said Confederation are submitted to them, and that the articles thereof shall be inviolably observed by the States we respectively represent; and that the union shall be perpetual.

In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands, in Congress. Done at Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, the ninth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, and in the third year of the Independence of America.

On July 4, 1778, Dr. David Ramsay delivered at Charleston, S. C., an eloquent and scholarly oration, in which he dwelt particularly upon the advantages which would result to the States from their recent adoption of new constitutions, and the confederacy which they had adopted to maintain their common independence. It was afterward published with a dedication to Governor Christopher Gadsden as one who, "fearless of danger, undaunted by opposition, uninfluenced by the hope of reward, in the worst of times, has stood among the foremost, an early, active, zealous, disinterested champion in the cause of American Liberty and Independence."

penses necessary for the defence and welfare of the United States, or any of them; nor emit bills; nor borrow money on the credit of the United States; nor appropriate money; nor agree upon the number of vessels of war to be built or purchased, or the number of land or sea forces to be raised; nor appoint a commander-in-chief of the army or navy—unless nine States assent to the same; nor shall a question on any other point, except for adjourning from day to day, be determined unless by the votes of a majority of the United States in Congress assembled.

The Congress of the United States shall have power to adjourn to any time within the year, and to any place within the United States, so that no period of adjournment be for a longer duration than the space of six months; and shall publish the journal of their proceedings monthly, except such parts thereof relating to treaties, alliances, or military operations as, in their judgment, require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the delegates of each State on any question shall be entered on the journal when it is desired by any delegate; and the delegates of a State, or any of them, at his or their request, shall be furnished with a transcript of the said journal, except such parts as are above excepted, to lay before the legislatures of the several States.

Art. 10. The committee of the States, or any nine of them, shall be authorized to execute, in the recess of Congress, such of the powers of Congress as the United States in Congress assembled, by the consent of nine States, shall, from time to time, think expedient to vest them with, provided that no power be delegated to the said committee for the exercise of which, by the Articles of Confederation, the voice of nine States in the Congress of the United States assembled is requisite.

Art. 11. Canada, according to this Confederation, and joining in the measures of the United States, shall be admitted into, and entitled to, all the advantages of this union; but no other colony shall be admitted into the same unless such admission be agreed to by nine States.

Art. 12. All bills of credit emitted, moneys borrowed, and debts contracted, by or under the authority of Congress, before the assembling of the United States in pursuance of the present Confederation, shall be deemed and considered as a charge against the United States, for payment and satisfaction whereof the said United States, and the public faith, are hereby solemnly pledged.

Art. 13. Every State shall abide by the determination of the United States in Congress assembled, on all questions which,

Owing to its revelation of the light in which the question of sovereignty was viewed by one who was born and educated in the North, where also he was engaged in his profession, and who had entered into both professional and political activities in the South, the oration is a most significant document in its bearing upon the State Rights issue.

The following text of the speech is but a small portion of the address, since only those extracts are presented which bear upon constitutional matters.

OUR INDEPENDENT CONSTITUTIONS

DR. DAVID RAMSAY

We are the first people in the world who have had it in their power to choose their own form of government. Constitutions were forced on all other nations by the will of their conquerors, or they were formed by accident, caprice, or the overbearing influence of prevailing parties or particular persons. But, happily for us, the bands of British Government were dissolved at a time when no rank above that of freemen existed among us, and when we were in a capacity to choose for ourselves among the various forms of government, and to adopt that which best suited our country and people. Our deliberations on this occasion were not directed by the overgrown authority of a conquering general, or the ambition of an aspiring nobility, but by the pole star of public good, inducing us to prefer those forms that would most effectually secure the greatest portion of political happiness to the greatest number of people. We had the example of all ages for our instruction, and many among us were well acquainted with the causes of prosperity and misery in other governments.

In times of public tranquillity, the mighty have been too apt to encroach on the rights of the many, but it is the great happiness of America that her independent constitutions were agreed upon by common consent at a time when her leading men needed the utmost support of the multitude, and therefore could have no other object in view but the formation of such constitutions as would best suit the people at large, and unite them most heartily in repelling common dangers.

As the strength of a people consists in their numbers, our separate States, sensible of their weakness, were actually excited by self-interest to form such free governments as would encourage the greatest influx of inhabitants. In this manner an emigration has virtually taken place in all the thirteen States, each contending with the others who should form the freest constitution. Thus independence has been the fruitful parent of governments formed on equal principles, more favorable to the liberty and happiness of the governed than any that have yet been recorded in the annals of history.

Our independent constitutions, formed on the justest principles, promise fair to give the most perfect protection to life, liberty, and property, equally to the poor and the rich. As at the conflagration of Corinth, the various melted metals running together formed a new one called Corinthian brass, which was superior to any of its component parts; in like manner, perhaps, it is the will of Heaven that a new empire should be here formed of the different nations of the old world which will rise superior to all that have gone before it and extend human happiness to its utmost possible limits. None can tell to what perfection the arts of government may be brought. May we not therefore expect great things from the patriots of this generation, jointly coöperating to make the new-born Republic of America as complete as possible? Is it not to be hoped that human nature will here receive her most finished touches? That the arts and sciences will be extended and improved? That religion, learning, and liberty will be diffused over this continent? and, in short, that the American editions of the human mind will be more perfect than any that have yet appeared? Great things have been achieved in the infancy of states; and the ardor of a new people rising to empire and renown with prospects that tend to elevate the human soul encourages these flattering expectations.

Should any puny politician object that all these prospects are visionary, till we are certain of independence, I reply that we have been in possession of it for two years and are daily more able to support it, and our enemies less able to overturn it. When we first dared to contend with Britain we were a loose, disappointed people under no other government but that of a well-regulated mob. If, in these circumstances we were able to defend ourselves, what may we not expect when we can draw forth our whole strength in a regular constitutional manner? If the maiden courage of our new levies has successfully withstood the well-trained bands of our enemies, can we distrust when three campaigns have made them equal in happiness to a great continent. It is now our turn to figure on the face of the earth and in the annals of the world. The arts and sciences are planted among us, and, fostered by the auspicious influence of equal governments, are growing up to maturity, while truth and freedom flourish by their sides. Liberty, both civil and religious, in her noontide blaze shines forth with unclouded luster on all ranks and denominations of men.

Ever since the Flood true religion, literature, arts, empire, and riches have taken a slow and gradual course from east to west, and are now about fixing their long and favorite abode in this new western world. Our sun of political happiness is already risen, and hath lifted its head over the mountains, illuminating our hemisphere with liberty, light, and polished life. Our independence will redeem one-quarter of the globe from tyranny and oppression and consecrate it to the chosen seat of truth, justice, freedom, learning, and religion. We are laying the foundation of happiness for countless millions. Generations yet unborn will bless us for the blood-bought inheritance we are about to bequeath them. Oh happy times! Oh glorious days! Oh kind, indulgent, bountiful Providence, that we live in this highly favored period, and have the honor of helping forward these great events, and of suffering in a cause of such infinite importance!

PROPOSAL FOR NATIONAL REVENUE

One of the first matters which claimed the attention of Congress after the treaty of peace was the restoration of public credit and the establishment of funds for the payment of the debts incurred by the war.

Congress turned to customs duties as the most available means of securing funds to care for these obligations. It had, however, no power to levy a tariff without the assent of all the States.

After much debate, on the 18th of April, 1783, it recommended to the States to vest Congress with power to levy certain specified duties on spirits, wines, teas, pepper, sugar, molasses, cocoa, and coffee, and a flat duty of five per cent. ad valorem on all other imported goods.

These duties were to be applied solely to the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt, and for discipline with those with whom they are to contend? Such is the situation of Britain that, were we only able to keep up the appearance of an army, she could not afford to protest the war. But, instead of this, our troops are more numerous, better disciplined, clothed, and armed than they ever were. The most timid may dismiss all their doubts since Louis XVI of France, that illustrious protector of the rights of human nature, with a magnanimity worthy of himself, has guaranteed to us our independence. If Britain could not subdue America when she stood single and alone, how abortive must all her attempts prove when we are aided by the power of the greatest European monarch?

The special interposition of Providence in our behalf makes it impious to disbelieve the final establishment of our heaven-protected independence. Can any one seriously review the beginning, progress, and present state of the war and not see indisputable evidence of an overruling influence on the minds of men preparing the way for the accomplishment of this great event?

As all the tops of corn in a waving field are inclined in one direction by a gust of wind, in like manner the Governor of the World has given one and the same universal bent of inclination to the whole body of our people. Is it a work of man that thirteen States, frequently quarreling about boundaries, clashing in interests, differing in policy, manners, customs, forms of government, and religion, scattered over an extensive continent, under the influence of a variety of local prejudices, jealousies, and aversions, should all harmoniously agree, as if one mighty mind inspired the whole?

Our enemies seemed confident of the impossibility of our union; our friends doubted it, and all indifferent persons who judged of things present by what has heretofore happened considered the expectation thereof as romantic; but He who sitteth at the helm of the universe, and who boweth the hearts of a whole nation as the heart of one man, for the accomplishment of His own purposes, has effected that which to human wisdom and foresight seemed impossible. A review of the history of America, from its first discovery to the present day, forces upon us a belief that greater blessings are reserved for this continent than she ever could have possessed while lying low at the foot of an European island.

We have laid the foundations of a new empire which promises to enlarge itself to vast dimensions and to give that purpose they were to continue twenty-five years; the collectors to be chosen by the States, but to be removable by Congress.

260

The States were also required to establish for the same time, and for the same object, substantial and effectual revenues of such nature as they should judge convenient; the proportion of each State to be fixed according to the number of white and other free citizens, including those bound to servitude for a term of years, and three-fifths of all other persons.

This system was not to take effect until acceded to by every State, and when adopted by all to be a mutual compact among the States, and irrevocable by anyone without the consent of the whole or of a majority of the United States in Congress.

To enforce the importance and necessity of adopting and carrying into effect this system of finance, Congress presented an address to the States. This was prepared by a committee consisting of Oliver Ellsworth, James Madison, and Alexander Hamilton.

AN APPEAL TO NATIONAL HONOR

BY CONGRESS

After explaining the system itself, the address prepared for Congress by Ellsworth, Madison, and Hamilton appealed to the gratitude and pride, as well as justice and plighted faith of the nation. It urged particularly the propriety of the provision recommended for the payment of the national debt. "If other motives than that of justice," it said, "could be requisite, on this occasion, no nation could ever feel stronger; for to whom are the debts to be paid?"

To an ally, in the first place, who, to the exertion of his arms in support of our cause, has added the success of his treasure; who, to his important loans, has added liberal donations; and whose loans themselves carry the impression of his magnanimity and friendship.

To individuals in a foreign country, in the next place, who were the first to give us precious tokens of their confidence in our justice, and of their friendship for our cause, and who are members of a republic which was second in expounding our rank among nations.

Another class of creditors is that illustrious and patriotic band of fellow citizens, whose blood and whose bravery have defended the liberties of their country, who have patiently borne, among other distresses, the privation of their stipends, while the distresses of their country disabled it from bestowing them, and who even now ask for no more than such a portion of their dues as will enable them to retire from the field of glory into the bosom of peace and private citizenship, and for such effectual security for the residue of their claims as their country is now unquestionably able to provide.

The remaining class of creditors is composed partly of such of our fellow citizens as originally lent to the public the use of their funds, or have since manifested most confidence in their country by receiving transfers from the lenders, and partly of those whose property has been either advanced or assumed for the public service. To discriminate the merits of these several descriptions of creditors would be a task equally unnecessary and invidious. If the voice of humanity plead more loudly in favor of some than of others, the voice of policy, no less than justice, pleads in favor of all. A wise nation will never permit those who relieve the wants of their country, or who rely most on its faith, its frugeness, and its resources, when either of them is distrusted, to suffer by the event.

Let it be remembered finally that it has ever been the pride and boast of America that the rights for which she contended were the rights of human nature. By the blessing of the author of these rights, or the means exerted for their defence, they have prevailed against all opposition, and form the basis of thirteen independent States. No instance has heretofore occurred, nor can any instance be expected hereafter to occur, in which the unadulterated forms of republican government can pretend to so fair an opportunity of justifying themselves by their fruits. In this view the citizens of the United States are responsible for the greatest trust ever confided to a political society.

If justice, good faith, honor, gratitude, and all other qualities which ennoble the character of a nation and fulfill the ends of government be the fruits of our establishments, the cause of liberty will acquire a dignity and luster which it has never yet enjoyed, and an example will be set which cannot but have the most favorable influence on the rights of mankind.

If, on the other side, our government should be unfortunately blotted with the reverse of those cardinal and essential virtues, the great cause which we have engaged to vindicate will be dishonored and betrayed; the last and fairest experiment in favor of the rights of human nature will be turned against them, and their patrons and friends exposed to be insulted and silenced by the votaries of tyranny and usurpation.

WASHINGTON ON A STABLE GOVERNMENT

The propriety and necessity of adopting this system were strongly pressed upon the States by General Washington in a circular letter dated June 8, 1783, giving notice of his intended resignation, and congratulating the States on the happy termination of the war, and on the numerous advantages and blessings which, as a free and independent nation, they had now a right to expect. Having in the course of the war experienced, and at times too fatally experienced, the evils arising from a failure, on the part of the States, to comply with the requisitions of Congress, he reminded them that whether those advantages and blessings would be realized depended, in a great measure, on themselves, on their prompt and mutual coöperation in promoting the great interests of the Union. He considered four things as essentially necessary to the existence of the United States as an independent power.

1. An indissoluble union of the States under one federal head.
2. A sacred regard to justice.
3. The adoption of a proper peace establishment.
4. The prevalence of that peace and friendly disposition, among the people of the United States, which would induce them to forget their local prejudices and policies, to make those mutual concessions which were requisite to the general prosperity; and, in some instances, to sacrifice their individual advantages to the interest of the community.

FAILURE OF THE PLAN

This plan, however, though thus ably supported and recommended, was never accepted by the States in such a manner as to go into operation. The pressure of common danger being removed, the bond of federal union became weak and feeble, and the inefficiency of the national government more apparent. A jealousy between the State and general governments began to exist; and State interests predominated. The importing States levied contributions on their neighbors for their own benefit, and some of them would not relinquish the advantages of their local situation. Congress, indeed, had power to make treaties with foreign nations, but none to enforce the observance of them; they had power to contract debts, but were unable to enforce the collection of money for the payment of them. For this they were dependent on the will of thirteen distinct legislative bodies.

That part of the financial plan which required from the States a pledge of internal revenues for twenty-five years met with the greatest opposition. Congress was at length satisfied that a general compliance with this part of the system was not to be expected, and confined its requests to that relating to duties on imports. In 1786 all the States except New York had complied with this part of the system. The operation of the acts passed by some of the States, however, depended on similar acts from the others. The State of New York, instead of vesting Congress with the power of levying the duties, reserved this right to itself agreeably to a law passed in 1784; and also refused to make the collectors amenable to and removable by Congress.

While this system of revenue was under the consideration of the States, Congress could do nothing more than make requisitions, and, as those were not complied with, the interest of the domestic debt remained unpaid; and the money borrowed in Europe was applied to the payment of interest on foreign loans. In this situation the domestic debt was deemed of little value, and was sold for about one-tenth of its nominal amount.

COMMERCIAL NEGOTIATIONS WITH GREAT BRITAIN

Soon after the ratification of the treaty with Great Britain, Congress turned their attention to the subject of commercial intercourse with that nation.

But Great Britain refused to enter into a commercial treaty. Her statesmen could not be persuaded that the Americans would ever be united among themselves, or be able to form any lasting or beneficial engagements with other nations, not only for want of union, but from opposing interests, and from the imperfect powers of their general government. On this subject Lord Shelbourn no doubt spoke the language of Englishmen in general when he said, in his "Observations on the Commerce of the American States":

It will not be an easy matter to bring the American States to act as a nation; they are not to be feared as such by us. . . . Their climate, their staples, their manners are different; their interests opposite, and that which is beneficial to one is destructive to the other. . . . In short, every circumstance proves that it will be extremely folly to enter into any engagements by which we may not wish to be bound hereafter. . . . No treaty can be made with the American States that can be binding on the whole of them. The act of confederation does not enable Congress to form more than general treaties—at the moment of the highest authority of Congress the power in question was withheld by the several States. No treaty that could be made could suit the different interests. When treaties are necessary, they must be made with the States respectively. Each State has reserved every power relative to imports, exports, prohibitions, duties, &c., to itself. But no treaty at present is necessary. We trade with several very considerable nations without commercial treaties.

In accordance with this policy, in July, 1783, the British Government issued orders in council for regulating the trade between the United States and the British dominions. American vessels thereby were entirely excluded from the British West Indies; and certain articles from the States such as fish, beef, pork, &c., were not allowed to be carried there, even in British bottoms. This prohibition was continued by temporary acts until 1788, when it was permanently established by act of Parliament.

Difficulties with Great Britain were not confined to regulations respecting commerce. Serious disputes soon arose concerning the execution of the treaty of peace; and each nation complained of infractions by the other.

Congress, in order to remove the difficulties complained of, in March, 1787, unanimously declared that all the acts, or parts of acts, existing in any of the States, repugnant to the treaty of peace, ought to be repealed; and they recommended to the States to make such repeal by a general law. They at the same time unanimously resolved "that the legislatures of the several States cannot of right pass any act or acts for interpreting, explaining, or construing a national treaty or any part or clause of it; nor for restraining, limiting, or in any manner impeding, retarding, or contracting the operation and execution of the same; for that, on being constitutionally made, ratified, and published, they become, in virtue of the Confederation, part of the law of the land, and are not only independent of the will and power of such legislatures, but also binding and obligatory on them."

In consequence of these declarations the States having laws against the treaty abolished these, save Virginia, which did so provisionally upon Great Britain fulfilling her obligations, and South Carolina, which observed that the subjects of Great Britain had encountered no other difficulties, or impediments, in the recovery of their debts, than had the citizens of America; that such was the situation of the State the legislature had conceived it necessary to pass laws tantamount to shutting the courts.

The British court was not yet disposed to enter into any commercial treaty with the United States, the ministers being, no doubt, satisfied that the advantages they enjoyed under their own regulations were greater than could be obtained by any treaty they could make with America.

THE CONFEDERATION

with the general interest of the confederation, such State, however, might be admitted as a member of the Union with a less number than sixty thousand free inhabitants.

By the last article it was provided there should be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the Territory otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, of which the party should have been duly convicted.¹

FINANCIAL DISTRESS OF THE STATES

While Congress was thus forming a government for the Territory and laying the foundation of future new States at the west, it had lost all authority over the old States at the east. Many causes combined, at this period, to produce great distress, discontent, and disaffection in different parts of the Union. The General Government, as before stated, was totally inefficient, and the authority of the State governments greatly weakened, and in some instances almost destroyed.

In addition to the debts of the Union, the States individually had also incurred large debts during the war, for the payment of which they were called upon by their creditors. Immediately after peace, in consequence of large importations of foreign goods, particularly from Great Britain, large debts were contracted by individuals, and which, from the want of internal as well as external resources, they were unable to pay. The people were pressed at the same time for the payment of the debts of the Union, of the individual States, and of their own private debts. The courts of justice, which had been shut during the war, were filled with private suits. Under these circumstances, some of the States had recourse to the desperate expedient of paper money; others made personal property a tender, at an appraised value, in satisfaction of debts; and, in Massachusetts, not only were the judges in several counties prevented from holding courts, but the Government itself, in other respects, was set at defiance by an open and formidable insurrection of the people (Shay's Rebellion).

ORGANIZATION OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORY

The people of the United States had viewed the Western lands as a fund to aid in the payment of the national debt. Congress, therefore, in April, 1783, called upon those States who had not yet complied with their former requests on this subject to make liberal cessions of their territorial claims.

After a great deal of controversy the States claiming Western lands ceded these to the Federal Government; and Congress, in July, 1787, organized the North-West Territory, composed of the region now occupied by the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin, establishing an ordinance for its government. This ordinance remains the basis of the governments established by Congress in all the Territories of the United States. By it Congress established certain articles of compact, between the original States and the people in the territory, and which were to remain unalterable, unless by common consent. By these no person in the territory was ever to be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments; and every person was entitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, trial by jury, and all those other fundamental rights usually inserted in American bills of rights. Schools and the means of education were forever to be encouraged, and the utmost good faith to be observed toward the Indians; particularly their lands and property were never to be taken from them without their consent. The territory, and the States that might be formed therein, were forever to remain a part of the American confederacy; but not less than three nor more than five States were to be established.

It was also provided that, whenever in any of those States there should be sixty thousand free inhabitants, such State was to be admitted into the Union, on the same footing with the original States in all respects whatever; and be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government; such constitution and government, however, was to be republican and conformable to the principles of the articles. If consistent

WASHINGTON ON FAILURE OF THE CONFEDERACY

The enemies of the Revolution, who had predicted that the Americans, when separated from their parent country, would be unable to govern themselves, but fall into confusion, now secretly rejoiced at the verification of their predictions. Its friends began almost to despair of the commonwealth, and at times were led to doubt whether the people of America were indeed capable of self-government. Some, indeed, suggested that it might be necessary for the country to adopt a monarchical form of government. In reference to this suggestion General Washington said in a letter to John Jay:

What astonishing changes a few years are capable of producing! I am told that even respectable characters speak of a monarchical form of government without horror. From thinking proceeds speaking, thence to acting is often but a single step. But how irrevocable and tremendous! What a triumph for our enemies to verify their predictions! What a triumph for the advocates of despotism to find that we are incapable of governing ourselves, and that systems founded on the basis of equal liberty are merely ideal and fallacious! Would to God that wise measures may be taken in time to avert the consequences we have but too much reason to apprehend.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

[PLANS OF GOVERNMENT]

First Proposal of the Constitution—Pelatiah Webster [Pa.] on Defects of the Confederation—Webster's Comparison of the Adopted Constitution with That Which He Had Proposed—George Washington on the Necessary Change in the Federal Government—Resolutions of Virginia—Suggestion of John Jay to Call a Convention to Revise the Articles of Confederation—The Annapolis Convention—It Issues Call for a Constitutional Convention—New York Legislature Votes upon Alexander Hamilton's Resolution to Give Congress Power to Levy Federal Duties on Imports—His Speech: "On Granting Taxing Powers to Congress"—Resolve of Constitutional Convention to Form an Entirely New Government—Plans of Government by Edmund Randolph and Charles Pinckney—Letter of James Madison to Randolph—The Plans Are Referred to a Committee—Its Resolutions—Plan of William Paterson.

THE Articles of Confederation were the result of an old order of what might be called colonial statesmanship that was admirably adapted to secure the independence of the several States, but was woefully inadequate for the still greater task of welding them into a nation. To save the country from the anarchy into which it had fallen required a new order of what might be called national statesmanship in which the lead was taken by young men and those older persons whose political activities had begun with the movement for national independence. Of the younger men of this order, James Madison, Alexander Hamilton, and Charles Pinckney were the most influential in devising plans of government in which the principle of federation was subordinated to that of nationality. Of the older representatives, the most influential was a man with a type of mind new to the country, the politico-economic as distinguished from the purely political, and whose genius, therefore, cases the right is the same, but the exercise of the right is different; and this difference produced the most momentous consequences."

And William E. Gladstone said in the same tenor: "As the British Constitution is the most subtle organism which has proceeded from progressive history, so the American Constitution is the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of a man."

Other American historians and students of the origin of the Constitution do not view the plan of the Constitution so much of an "invention" as an almost necessary and even obvious development of the conditions of the time, one which arose naturally in the minds of all the constructive (as opposed to initiative) minds which set themselves freshly at work upon the problem. Thus George Ticknor Curtis, in his "History of the Origin, Formation, and Adoption of the Constitution" (1854), says: "The Constitution of the United States was eminently the creature of circumstances—not of circumstances blindly leading the blind to an unconscious submission to an accident, but of circumstances which offered an intelligent choice of the means of happiness, and opened, from the experience of the past, the plain path of duty and success stretching onward to the future."

According to this view Webster's plan of the Constitution was simply a formulation of the ideas which were "in the air" during the period, being generated all over the country by the formation of the State constitutions and applied from these to the obviously needed new Federal Constitution by such constructive minds as James Madison of Virginia, Charles Pinckney of South Carolina, and Alexander Hamilton of New York. Nevertheless Webster is certainly entitled to the credit of presenting the plan first, and in a thoroughly elaborated form.

In a note upon his "Dissertation," published in his collected writings (1791), Webster tells how he came to write the work. It was, he said, because of the failure of the Confederation.

was little appreciated and correspondingly unrecognized up to this period—and, indeed, not adequately so until 1911, when probably more than justice was done him by the Hon. Hannis Taylor in his "The Origin and Growth of the American Constitution." This was Pelatiah Webster, to whom Mr. Taylor ascribes the entire merit of "inventing" the plan of the Constitution, and whose book presenting the invention he styles "the epoch-making achievement," which "must forever stand forth as a beacon light in the world's political history."

In October, 1776, Webster published an essay, in which he strongly urged the laying of a tax to provide for the speedy redemption of the continental bills of credit—a plan, however, which could not be followed owing to the fact that the powers of Congress were only advisory, and not mandatory upon the States. Undoubtedly the failure to adopt his plan, and the consequent disaster to the country, directed Webster's attention to the need of recognizing the Federal Government so that it should have the supreme essential of sovereignty—-independent power. Though his succeeding work was in the field of economics—"Essays on Free Trade and Finance"—in one of the seven essays contained in this work he proposed the calling of a "Constitutional Convention" for making an entirely new Constitution. This essay was published in May, 1781. Two years later (in February, 1783) Webster "humbly offered to the public" an anonymous "Dissertation on the Political Union and Constitution of the Thirteen United States of North America Which Is Necessary to Their Preservation and Happiness," by "a Citizen of Philadelphia."

The view of Taylor that the American Constitution was an "invention" is held by many other writers, native and foreign, on the subject.

Alexis de Tocqueville, in his book "On Democracy in America" (1835), says of the Constitution that it was based "upon a wholly novel theory which may be considered a great discovery in modern political science. . . . The American States, which combined in 1789, agreed that the Federal Government should not only dictate, but should execute its own enactments. In both

DEFECTS OF THE CONFEDERATION

PELATIAH WEBSTER

Forming a plan of confederation or a system of general government of the United States engrossed the attention of Congress from the Declaration of Independence, July 4, 1776, till the same was completed by Congress, July 9, 1778, and recommended to the several States for ratification, which finally took place March 1, 1781, from which time the said confederation was considered as the grand constitution of the general government, and the whole administration was conformed to it.

And as it had stood the test of discussion in Congress for two years before they completed and adopted it, and in all the States for three years more before it was finally ratified one would have thought that it must have been a very finished and perfect plan of government.

But on trial of it in practice it was found to be extremely weak, defective, totally inefficient, and altogether inadequate to its great ends and purposes, for

1. It blended the legislative and executive powers together in one body.
2. This body, viz.: Congress, consisted of but one house, without any check upon their resolutions.
3. The powers of Congress in very few instances were definite and final; in the most important articles of government they could do no more than recommend to the several States, the consent of every one of which was necessary to give legal sanction to any act so recommended.
4. They could assess and levy no taxes.
5. They could institute and execute no punishments except in the military department.
6. They had no power of deciding or controlling the contentions and disputes of different States with each other.
7. They could not regulate the general trade; or,
8. Even make laws to secure either public treaties with foreign states, or the persons of public ambassadors, or to punish violations or injuries done to either of them.
9. They could institute no general judiciary powers.
10. They could regulate no public roads, canals, or inland navigation, etc., etc., etc.

And what caps all the rest was that (while under such an inefficient political constitution the only chance we had of any tolerable administration lay wholly in the prudence and wisdom of the men who happened to take the lead in our public councils) it was fatally provided by the absurd doctrine of rotation that if any member of Congress by three years' experience and application had qualified himself to manage our public affairs with consistency and fitness, that he should be constitutionally and absolutely rendered incapable of serving any longer, till by three years' discontinuance he had pretty well lost the cue or train of the public counsels and forgot the ideas and plans which made his service useful and important, and in the meantime his place should be supplied by a fresh man who had the whole matter to learn, and when he had learned it was to give place to another fresh man, and so on to the end of the chapter.

The sensible mind of the United States by long experience of the fatal mischief of anarchy, or (which is about the same thing) of this ridiculous inefficient form of government, began to apprehend that there was something wrong in our policy which ought to be redressed and mended, but nobody undertook to delineate the necessary amendments.

I was then pretty much at leisure, and was fully of opinion (though the sentiment at that time would not very well bear) that it would be ten times easier to form a new Constitution than to mend the old one. I therefore sat myself down to sketch out the leading principles of that political constitution which I thought necessary to the preservation and happiness of the United States of America, which are comprised in this Dissertation.

I hope the reader will please consider that these are the original thoughts of a private individual, dictated by the nature of the subject only, long before the important theme became the great object of discussion in the most dignified and important assembly which ever sat or decided in America.

The "Dissertation" is a treatise on the nature of government so sound and searching that, while many of its propositions were not embodied in the Constitution, they all, in one form or another, have arisen as political issues in our national history. Besides the strictly Constitutional proposals there may be mentioned the following subjects of interest and importance to the student of politics:

Trade a chief concern of Government.

Supreme importance of the taxing power.

Retention of efficient officers in the public service

Hannis Taylor's "Origin and Growth of the American Constitution."

COMPARISON OF THE ADOPTED CONSTITUTION WITH THAT PROPOSED BY WEBSTER

At the time when this Dissertation was written (February 16, 1783) the defects and insufficiency of the Old Federal Constitution were universally felt and acknowledged. It was manifest, not only that the internal policy, justice, security, and peace of the States could never be preserved under it, but the finances and public credit would necessarily become so embarrassed, precarious, and void of support that no public movement which depended on the revenue could be managed with any effectual certainty; but though the public mind was under full conviction of all these mischiefs and was contemplating a remedy, yet the public ideas were not at all concentrated, much less arranged into any new system or form of government which would obviate these evils. Under these circumstances I offered this Dissertation to the public. How far the principles of it were adopted or rejected in the new Constitution, which was four years afterwards (September 17, 1787) formed by the general convention and since ratified by all the States, is obvious to every one.

I wish here to remark the great particulars of my plan which were rejected by the convention.

1. My plan was to keep the legislative and executive departments entirely distinct; the one to consist of the two Houses of Congress, the other to rest entirely in the Grand Council of State.

2. I proposed to introduce a Chamber of Commerce, to consist of merchants who should be consulted by the legislature in all matters of trade and revenue, and which should have the conducting the revenue committed to them.

The first of these the convention qualified; the second they say nothing of, i. e., take no notice of it.

3. I proposed that the great officers of state should have the perusal of all bills before they were enacted into laws, and should be required to give their opinion of them as far as they affected the public interest in their several departments, which report of them Congress should cause to be read in their respective Houses and entered on their minutes. This is passed over without notice.

4. I proposed that all public officers appointed by the vs. rotation in office (a point in the discussion of Civil Service).

Frequent elections as a check on inefficiency and misconduct of public officers (a point in the discussion of the Recall).

The value of land, being created by population, as a natural and just standard of determining contributions to public revenue (a point in the discussion of the "Single Tax").

Unsettled lands the common property of the nation. Open and thorough discussions in legislative bodies as a check on the election of knavish wire-pulling politicians, and upon hasty and ill-advised legislation.

Advantages of two chambers in legislative bodies over one in the above respect.

Departments of investigation to give information to Congress as an important feature of government.

Amendment, repeal, and new legislation as the proper cure for bad laws (a point in the discussion of the Initiative and Referendum).

A Chamber of Commerce as an advisory board and bureau of commercial information for the benefit of Congress (a point in the discussion of matters relative to the Departments of Commerce and Labor, the Consular Service, etc.).

Advantages of a dictatorship during war (a point in the discussion of the Suspension of Habeas Corpus Act, and similar issues of Lincoln's administration).

Complete control of the purse by the Legislature.

Executive departments to be directed by a Council of State.

All laws to carry power of enforcing them (Supremacy of Federal Legislation over State).

Coercion of a State by the Federal Government for the national welfare (a point in the discussion of Secession).

The strictly constitutional propositions of Webster may be inferred from a comparison which he instituted between them and the Constitution which was adopted. This he published in 1791 in his complete works. For the full text of the "Dissertation" see Appendix XI in executive authority should be amenable both to them and to the legislative power, and removable for just cause by either of them. This is qualified by the convention.

And inasmuch as my sentiments in these respects were either qualified or totally neglected by the convention, I suppose they were wrong. However, the whole matter is submitted to the politicians of the present age and to our posterity in future.

In sundry other things the convention have gone into minutes, e. g., respecting elections of presidents, senators and representatives in Congress, etc., which I proposed to leave at large to the wisdom and discretion of Congress and of the several States.

Great reasons may doubtless be assigned for their decision, and perhaps some little ones for mine. Time, the great arbiter of all human plans, may, after a while, give his decision; but neither the convention nor myself will probably live to feel either the exultation or mortification of his approbation or disapprobation of either of our plans.

But if any of these questions should in future time become objects of discussion, neither the vast dignity of the convention, nor the low, unnoticed state of myself, will be at all considered in the debates; the merits of the matter and the interests connected with or rising out of it will alone dictate the decision.

THE CALL FOR A CONVENTION

In 1780, one year before Webster's first proposal of an entirely new Constitution, Alexander Hamilton, then twenty-three years of age, proposed in a letter to James Duane a convention of all the States to revise the Articles of Confederation. In 1782 the legislature of his State, New York, recommended such a convention, and, in 1784, Gen. Washington, in a letter to the Governor of Virginia, urged that a radical change in the Federal Government was necessary. He said:

The disinclination of the individual States to yield competent powers to Congress for the Federal Government, their unreasonable jealousy of that body, and of one another, and the disposition which seems to pervade each, of being all-wise and all-powerful within itself, will, if there is not a change in the system, be our downfall as a nation. This is as clear to me as A, B, C, and I think we have opposed Great Britain, and have arrived at the present state of peace and independency to very little purpose if we cannot conquer our own prejudices. The powers of Europe begin to see this, and our newly acquired friends, the British, are already acting upon this ground; and wisely, too, if we are determined in our folly. They know that individual opposition to their measures is futile, and boast that we are not sufficiently united as a nation to give a general one! Is not the indignity alone of this declaration, while we are in the act of peace-making and reconciliation, sufficient to stimulate us to vest more extensive and adequate powers in the sovereigns of these United States?

In 1785 the legislature of Massachusetts passed resolutions similar to those of New York. Congress, however, whose adoption of the acts of the convention would be necessary to put them into effect, failed to approve of these recommendations, and the proposals came to nothing.

The meeting of such a convention was destined to develop in a fashion less formal and more natural, and therefore all the more effective in showing the proper relations of the Federal Government to the States. The legislatures of Virginia and Maryland were forced by the demands of commerce to adopt inter-State rules for the navigation of the Potomac River and Chesapeake Bay, which formed the common boundary of the States. Washington was consulted in the matter, and probably by his suggestion the appointment of a joint commission for framing the regulations led to the call by the Virginia legislature in January, 1786, of a convention of all the States:

To take into consideration the trade and commerce of the United States; to consider how far an uniform system, in their commercial intercourse and regulations, might be necessary to their common interest and permanent harmony, and to report to the several States such an act relative to this great object, as when unanimously ratified by them, would enable the United States, in Congress assembled, effectually to provide for the same.

It was afterward agreed that this meeting should be held at Annapolis, Md., in September of the same year.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

General Washington replied, heartily endorsing Jay's views.

THE ANNAPOLIS CONVENTION

At the convention only the States of Virginia, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York were represented. Delegates were appointed by New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and North Carolina, but did not attend. In consequence of such a partial representation of the States, the commissioners present thought it improper to proceed on the important business with which they were intrusted. They were now, more than ever, sensible of the necessity of a general convention of all the States, and were also satisfied that the powers of this convention should extend to other objects than merely the regulation of trade and commerce. They therefore drew up a report and address to the States, in which, after stating the defects of the Federal Government and that the situation of the United States "was delicate and critical, calling for an exertion of the virtue and wisdom of all the members of the Confederacy," they recommended to all the States to concur "in the appointment of commissioners, to meet at Philadelphia, on the second Monday in May, 1787, to take into consideration the situation of the United States, to devise such further provisions as should appear to them necessary to render the Constitution of the Federal Government adequate to the exigencies of the Union." This address was sent to Congress as well as to the several States.

The Virginia legislature first appointed delegates, according to the recommendation of the meeting at Annapolis. Other States soon after followed the example of Virginia. In February, 1787, Congress indorsed the Convention, and this hastened the appointment of delegates from all the States except Rhode Island.

LETTERS OF JAY TO WASHINGTON

In a letter to General Washington, written in February, John Jay observed:

Experience has pointed out errors in our National Government which call for correction, and which threaten to blast the fruit we expected from our tree of liberty. The convention proposed by Virginia may do some good, and would perhaps do more if it comprehended more objects. An opinion begins to prevail that a general convention for revising the Articles of Confederation would be expedient. Whether the people are yet ripe for such a measure, or whether the system proposed to be obtained by it is only to be expected from calamity and commotion, is difficult to ascertain.

In a second letter to General Washington, in June of the same year, Jay thus expressed his feelings and views:

Our affairs seem to lead to some crisis, some revolution, something that I cannot foresee or conjecture. I am uneasy and apprehensive, more so than during the war. Then we had a fixed object, and though the means and time of obtaining it were often problematical, yet I did firmly believe that justice was with us. The case is now altered. We are going and doing wrong, and therefore I look forward to evils and calamities, but without being able to guess at the instrument, nature, or measure of them. That we shall again recover, and things again go well, I have no doubt. Such a variety of circumstances would not, almost miraculously, have combined to liberate and make us a nation for transient and unimportant purposes. I therefore believe we are yet to become a great and respectable people, but when and how only the spirit of prophecy can discern.

What I most fear is that the better kind of people (by which I mean the people who are orderly and industrious, who are content with their situation, and not uneasy in their circumstances) will be led by the insecurity of property, the loss of confidence in their rulers, and the want of public faith and rectitude to consider the claims of liberty as imaginary and delusive. This state of uncertainty and fluctuation must disgust and alarm such men and prepare their minds for almost any change that may promise them quiet and security.

taining national revenue again came before the legislature of New York, and, though it was supported by the eloquence of Hamilton, was defeated by a majority of fifteen. Nevertheless the legislature agreed to send representatives to the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia, and appointed Hamilton, with Robert Yates and John Lansing, Jr., as the delegates.

The following is an abridgment of Hamilton's speech before the legislature. It was delivered on February 18, 1787.

ON GRANTING TAXING POWER TO CONGRESS

ALEXANDER HAMILTON

In the interpretation of laws it is admitted to be a good rule to resort to the coexisting circumstances, and collect from thence the intention of the framers of the law. Let us apply this rule to the present case.

In the commencement of the Revolution, delegates were sent to meet in Congress with large discretionary powers. In short, generally speaking, with full power "to take care of the republic." In the whole of this transaction the idea of an union of the colonies was carefully held up. It pervaded all our public acts.

In the Declaration of Independence we find it continued and confirmed. . . . "These United Colonies, . . . as free and independent States, have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and do all other acts and things that independent States may of right do."

Hence we see that the union and independence of these States are blended and incorporated in one and the same act, which, taken together, clearly imports that the United States had in their origin full power to do all acts and things which independent States may of right do, or, in other words, full power of sovereignty.

Accordingly we find that, upon the authority of that act only approved by the several States, they did levy war, contract alliances, and exercise other high powers of sovereignty, even to the appointment of a dictator, prior to the present confederation.

In this situation and with this plenitude of power, our Constitution knows and acknowledges the United States in Congress assembled, and provides for the annual appointment of delegates to represent this State in that body, which, in substance, amounts to a constitutional recognition of the union with complete sovereignty.

A government may exist without any formal organization or precise definition of its powers. However improper it might have been that the Federal Government should have continued to exist with such absolute and undefined authority, this does not militate against the position that it did possess such authority. It only proves the propriety of a more regular formation to ascertain its limits. This was the object of the present confederation, which is in fact an abridgment of the original sovereignty of the union.

It may be said (for it has been said upon other occasions) that though the Constitution did consider the United States in the light I have described, and left the legislature at liberty in the first instance to have organized the Federal Government in such a manner as they thought proper, yet that liberty ceased with the establishment of the present confederacy. The discretion of the legislature was then determined.

This, upon the face of it, is a subtility uncountenanced by a single principle of government or a single expression of the Constitution. It is saying that a general authority given to the legislature for the permanent preservation and good of the community has been exhausted and spent by the exercise of a part of that authority. The position is the more destitute of color because the confederation, by the express terms of the compact, preserves and continues this power. The last clause of it authorizes Congress to propose, and the States to agree to, such alterations as might be afterwards found necessary or expedient.

We see, therefore, that the Constitution knows and acknowledges the United States in Congress; that it provides for the annual appointment of delegates to represent this State in that body without prescribing the objects or limits of that representation; that at the time our Constitution was framed the Union existed with full sovereignty, and that therefore the idea of sovereignty in the Union is not incompatible with it. We see further that the doctrine contained in the objection against granting legislative power would equally operate against granting executive power, would prove that the powers already vested in the Union are illegal and unconstitutional, would render a confederacy of the States in any form impracticable, and would defeat all those provisions of our own Constitution which relate to the United States. I submit it to the committee, whether a doctrine pregnant with such consequences can be true; whether it is not as opposite to our Constitution as to the principles of national safety and prosperity, and whether it would not be lamentable if the zeal of opposition to a particular measure should carry us to the extreme of imposing upon the Constitution a sense foreign to it, which must embarrass the national councils upon future occasions when all might agree in the utility and necessity of a different construction.

I return to the examination of the question: How far the power proposed to be conferred upon Congress would be dangerous to the liberty of the people? And here I ask:

Whence can this danger arise? The members of Congress are annually chosen by the members of the several legislatures. They come together with different habits, prejudices and interests. They are in fact continually changing. How is it possible for a body so composed to be formidable to the liberties of States—several of which are largely empires in themselves?

In a contest of this kind the body of the people will always be on the side of the State governments. This will not only result from their love of liberty and regard to their own safety, but from other strong principles of human nature. The State governments operate upon those immediate familiar personal concerns to which the sensibility of individuals is awake. The distribution of private justice belonging to them, they must always appear to the senses of the people as the immediate guardians of their rights. They will, of course, have the strongest hold on their attachment, respect, and obedience.

What is to be feared from the efforts of Congress to establish a tyranny with the great body of the people, under the direction of their State governments, combined in opposition to their views?

The causes taken notice of as securing the attachment of the people to their local governments present us with another important truth—the natural imbecility of Federal governments, and the danger that they will never be able to exercise power enough to manage the general affairs of the Union, though the States will have a common interest, yet they will also have a particular interest. For example, as a part of the Union, it will be the interest of every State to pay as little itself, and to let its neighbors pay as much as possible. Particular interests have always more influence upon men than general. The Federal States, therefore, consulting their immediate advantage, may be considered as so many eccentric powers tending in a contrary direction to the government of the Union, and, as they will generally carry the people along with them, the confederacy will be in continual danger of dissolution. This, Mr. Chairman, is the real rock upon which the happiness of this country is likely to split. This is the point to which our fears and cares should be directed—to guard against this, and not to terrify ourselves with imaginary dangers from the speaker of power in Congress, will be our true wisdom.

It is no objection to say that a great part of this fund will be dedicated to the use of the United States. Their exigencies must be supplied in some way or other. The more is done toward it by means of the import, the less will be to be done in other modes. If we do not employ that resource to the best account, we must find others in direct taxation. And to this are opposed all the habits and prejudices of the community. There is not a farmer in the State who would not pay a shilling in the voluntary consumption of articles on which a duty is paid rather than a penny imposed immediately on his house and land.

Having now shown, Mr. Chairman, that there is no constitutional impediment to the adoption of the bill, that there is no danger to be apprehended to the public liberty from giving the power in question to the United States; that in the view of revenue the measure under consideration is not only expedient, but necessary—let us turn our attention to the other side of this important subject. Let us ask ourselves what will be the consequence of rejecting the bill. What will be the situation of our national affairs if they are left much longer to float in the chaos in which they are now involved?

Can our national character be preserved without paying our debts? Can the Union subsist without revenue? Have we realized the consequences which would attend its dissolution?

If these States are not united under a Federal Government, they will infallibly have wars with each other, and their divisions will subject them to all the mischiefs of foreign influence and intrigue. The human passions will never want objects of hostility. The Western Territory is an obvious and fruitful source of contest.

Wars with each other would beget standing armies—a source of more real danger to our liberties than all the powers that could be conferred upon the representatives of the Union.

And wars with each other would lead to opposite alliances with foreign powers and plunge us into all the labyrinths of European politics.

The Romans, in their progress to universal dominion, when they conceived the project of subduing the refractory spirit of the Grecian republics, which composed the famous Achaian League, began by sowing dissensions among them and instilling jealousies of each other, and of the common head, and finished by making them a province of the Roman empire.

The application is easy: if there are any foreign enemies, if there are any domestic foes to this country, all their arts and artifices will be employed to effect a dissolution of the Union. This cannot be better done than by sowing jealousies of the Federal head, and cultivating in each State an undue attachment to its own power.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

The convention met as appointed (in Philadelphia in May, 1787).

Rhode Island, which had positively refused to pay her quota of national expenses, was not represented in the convention, and the delegation from New Hampshire, for whom the State legislature had failed to provide expenses, did not appear until late in the proceedings, when this failure had been remedied.

The delegates, while recognizing the greatness of the task before them, were determined to do their utmost to accomplish it. Thus the delegates of North Carolina said in a report to the governor of their State:

A very large field presents to our view without a single straight or eligible road that has been trodden by the feet of nations. An union of sovereign States, preserving their civil liberties and connected together by such ties as to preserve permanent and effective governments is a system not described, it is a circumstance that has not occurred in the history of men; if we shall be so fortunate as to find this in descript our time will have been well spent. Several members of the convention have their wives here and other gentlemen have sent for theirs. This seems to promise a summer's campaign. Such of us as can remain here from the inevitable avocation of private business are resolved to continue whilst there is any prospect of being able to serve the State and Union.

George Washington was unanimously elected as the chairman of the convention. Deputies from seven States were accounted a quorum, and a majority of fully represented States was to decide questions. The proceedings were to be secret (except where special leave was granted to the contrary) in order, as James Madison wrote to Thomas Jefferson in Paris on June 6, "to secure unbiased discussion within doors, and to prevent misconceptions and misconstructions without." In reference to this Jefferson wrote to John Adams on August 30:

I am sorry they began their deliberations by so abominable a precedent as that of tying up the tongues of their members. Nothing can justify this example but the innocence of their intentions and ignorance of the value of public discussions. I have no doubt that all their other measures will be good and wise. It is really an assembly of demigods.

This secrecy has been especially deplored by historians because the literal text of almost all the speeches made in the convention was lost, and many interesting incidents, referred to obscurely in the diaries and letters of the time, consigned to oblivion. James Madison, in his "Papers," left an admirable digest of the proceedings of the convention, to which the reader is referred (see Volume V of "Elliott's Debates").

The first question among the members of this assembly was whether they should amend the old government or form a new system. By the resolve of Congress, as well as the instructions of some of the States, they were met "for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation." Such, however, were the radical defects of the old government, that a majority determined to form an entire new one.

On the 29th of May, Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, submitted to the convention fifteen resolutions as the basis of a new constitution.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

12. Provision to be made for continuance of a Congress until the Union is completely formed.

13. Articles of Union to be subject to amendment without assent of the national legislature.

14. The legislative, executive, and judiciary powers of the separate States to be sworn to support the Articles of Union.

15. The amendments to the Articles of Confederation to be submitted to conventions chosen by the States to consider them and decide thereon.

MADISON'S LETTER TO RANDOLPH

In forming this plan, Governor Randolph had been aided by correspondence with James Madison. In a letter to Randolph on April 8, 1787, Madison wrote:

I think with you that it will be well to retain as much as possible of the old Confederation, though I doubt whether it may not be best to work the valuable articles into the new system, instead of engrafting the latter on the former. I am also perfectly of your opinion that in framing a system no material sacrifices ought to be made to local or temporary prejudices. . . . In truth my ideas of a reform strike so deeply at the old Confederation, and lead to such a systematic change, that they scarcely admit of the expedient.

I hold it for a fundamental point that an individual independence of the States is utterly irreconcilable with the idea of an aggregate sovereignty. I think at the same time that consolidation of the States into one simple republic is not less unattainable than it would be inexpedient. Let it be tried, then, whether any middle ground can be taken, which will at once support a due supremacy of the national authority and leave in force the local authorities so far as they can be subordinately useful.

The first step to be taken is, I think, a change in the principle of representation. According to the present form of the Union an equality of suffrage, if not just toward the larger members of it, is at least safe to them, as the liberty they exercise of rejecting or executing the acts of Congress is uncontrollable by the nominal sovereignty of Congress. Under a system which would operate without the intervention of the States, the case would be materially altered. A vote from Delaware would have the same effect as one from Massachusetts or Virginia.

RANDOLPH'S PLAN

The points of this plan were:

1. Correction and enlargement of the Articles of Confederation better to promote common defence, security of liberty, and general welfare.

2. Suffrage in Congress to be proportioned to quotas of contribution or number of free inhabitants.

3. Congress to consist of two branches.

4. Congressmen to be elected at stated times by the people; to be above a fixed age; to be paid; to be ineligible for other offices during time of service, and for a fixed time thereafter; to be incapable of reelection until after a fixed time; and to be subject to recall.

5. Second branch to be elected by first, from nominees by the State legislatures; to be above a fixed age; to hold office for a sufficient time to insure their independency; to be paid; to be ineligible for other offices during time of service, and for a fixed time thereafter.

6. Each branch to originate acts; Congress to possess its present powers, and in addition to legislate in all cases where the separate States are incompetent, or where the harmony of the United States may be interrupted by individual State legislation; Congress to negative such interrupting acts of the States, and to employ the force of the Union against any State failing to fulfill its duty under the Constitution.

7. A national executive to be instituted, chosen by Congress, for a fixed term, paid by a fixed sum which is not to be changed during the term, and ineligible for reelection.

8. The executive and a convenient number of the national judiciary to compose a council of revision of legislative acts before their promulgation, their veto, however, to be overridden by a fixed proportion of the members of each legislative branch.

9. A national judiciary to be established to hold office during good behavior, to be paid on conditions prevailing with the executive; its lower tribunals to pass with final force on international and Federal questions.

10. New States to be formed from the territory within the limits of the United States by a fixed proportion of the votes of the States (not necessarily unanimous).

11. A republican form of government to be guaranteed to each State, except in case of voluntary junction of government and territory.

Let the National Government be armed with a positive and complete authority in all cases where uniform measures are necessary, as in trade, etc., etc. Let it also retain the powers which it now possesses.

Let it have a negative in all cases whatsoever on the legislative acts of the States, as the King of Great Britain heretofore had. This I conceive to be essential and the least possible abridgment of the State sovereignties. Without such a defensive power, every positive power that can be given on paper will be unavailing. It will also give internal stability to the States. There has been no moment since the peace at which the Federal assent would have been given to paper money—etc., etc.

Let this national supremacy be extended also to the Judiciary Department. If the judges in the last resort depend on the States, and are bound by their oaths to them, and not to the Union, the intention of the law and the interests of the nation may be defeated by the obsequiousness of the tribunals to the policy or prejudices of the States. It seems at least essential that an appeal should lie to some national tribunals in all cases which concern foreigners or inhabitants of other States. The admiralty jurisdiction may be fully submitted to the National Government.

A government formed of such extensive powers ought to be well organized. The legislative department may be divided into two branches. One of them to be chosen every — years by the legislatures or the people at large; the other to consist of a more select number, holding their appointments for a longer term, and going out in rotation. Perhaps the negative on the State laws may be most conveniently lodged in this branch. A council of revision may be superadded, including the great ministerial officers.

A national executive will also be necessary. I have scarcely ventured to form my opinion yet, either of the manner in which it ought to be constituted, or of the authorities with which it ought to be clothed.

An article ought to be inserted expressly guaranteeing the tranquility of the States against internal as well as external dangers.

To give the new system its proper energy, it will be desirable to have it ratified by the authority of the people, and not merely by that of the legislatures.

I am afraid you will think this project, if not extravagant, absolutely unattainable and unworthy of being attempted. Conceiving it myself to go no further than is essential, the objections drawn from this source are to be laid aside. I flatter myself, however, that they may be less formidable on trial than in contemplation. The change in the principle of representation will be relinquished by a majority of the States, and those too of most influence. The Northern States will be reconciled to it by the actual superiority of their populousness; the Southern by their expected superiority on this point. This principle established, the repugnance of the large States to part with power will in a great degree subside, and the smaller States must ultimately yield to the predominant will. It is also already seen by many, and must by degrees be seen by all, that, unless the Union be organized efficiently on republican principles, innovation of a much more objectionable form may be obtruded; or, in the most favorable event, the partition of the Empire into rival and hostile confederacies will ensue.

One week later, April 16, 1787, Madison amplified his ideas in a letter to Washington. Hannis Taylor, in his "Origin and Growth of the American Constitution," contends that Madison had drafted the plan, but for policy's sake, since he had political opponents in his State, persuaded Governor Randolph, the head of Virginia, as well as of the Virginia delegation to the convention, to father it. Taylor draws this conclusion from his letters to Randolph and Washington, as well as from the circumstances that Madison had been engaged for a year previously in preparing himself for the Constitutional Convention, and that Randolph said, in his speech supporting the plan, not that he had written it, but proposed it at the instigation of his colleagues, and also from the fact that the plan is spread upon the journal of the Congress in Madison's hand.

Taylor also infers from the presence in Philadelphia of Madison at the time when Pelatiah Webster published his "Dissertation on the Constitution" that he got his essential ideas from this pamphlet.

On the same day on which the Randolph resolutions were presented, Charles Pinckney of South Carolina laid before the convention his draft of a proposed Federal Government.

Article VI. The Legislature of the United States shall have the power to lay and to collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises;

To regulate commerce with all nations, and among the several States;

To borrow money and emit bills of credit;

To establish postoffices;

To raise armies;

To build and equip fleets;

To pass laws for arming, organizing, and disciplining the militia of the United States;

To subdue a rebellion in any State on application of its legislature;

To coin money and regulate the value of all coins, and to fix the standard of weights and measures;

To provide such dockyards and arsenals and erect such fortifications as may be necessary for the United States, and to exercise exclusive jurisdiction therein;

To appoint a Treasurer, by ballot;

To constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court;

To establish post and military roads;

To establish and provide for a national university at the seat of government of the United States;

To establish uniform rules of naturalization;

To provide for the establishment of a seat of government for the United States not exceeding ——— miles square, in which they shall have exclusive jurisdiction;

To make rules concerning captures from an enemy;

To declare the law and punishment of piracies and felonies at sea, and of counterfeiting coin, and of all offences against the laws of nations;

To call forth the aid of the militia to execute the laws of the Union, enforce treaties, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions;

And to make all laws for carrying the foregoing powers into execution.

The legislature of the United States shall have the power to declare the punishment of treason, which shall consist only in levying war against the United States, or any of them, or in adhering to their enemies. No person shall be convicted of treason but by the testimony of two witnesses.

The proportion of direct taxation shall be regulated by the whole number of inhabitants of every description, which number shall, within ——— years after the first meeting of the

THE PINCKNEY PLAN

The articles proposed were as follows. The substances of Articles II to V is given, and the text of the others.

Article I. The style of this government shall be: "The United States of America," and the government shall consist of supreme legislative, executive, and judicial powers.

Article II. There shall be two chambers of legislation, the House of Delegates and the Senate; these shall meet annually at a fixed time.

Article III. Delegates to be chosen by the people of the States; each to be a resident of the State he is chosen for; number of delegates from each State to be proportioned on population. All money bills to originate in House of Delegates, and not be altered by the Senate. House of Delegates to possess exclusive power of impeachment, and to choose its own officers; any vacancy in its membership to be supplied by the executive of the State represented.

Article IV. House of Delegates to elect Senators, a fixed number in each case from those citizens of each State who are above a fixed age. The Senators from New England to form class one, from the Middle States (New York to Delaware inclusive) class two, and from the Southern States (Maryland to Georgia inclusive) class three; terms of service of each class to be a fixed period, differing in duration from the other periods, and determined by lot. House of Delegates to supply vacancies. Senate to choose its own officers.

Article V. House of Delegates to be judges of the elections and qualifications of its members. Majority in each house to be a quorum. Freedom of debate; no speaker to be impeached for his words by an outside authority; members to be free of arrest while in attendance, except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace. Both houses to keep journals, and publish them, except on secret occasions. Yeas and Nays to be entered on them at request of a member. No adjournments to another place, or for more than a fixed time, to take place without consent of the other House. Members of each House not to hold other offices during service, and Senators not for one year after service. Members to be paid by the States which they represent. Bills to be approved by the President, or passed by a two-thirds majority over his veto or his failure to sign after a fixed number of days while Congress is in session.

legislature, and within the term of every ——— year after, be taken in the manner to be prescribed by the legislature.

No tax shall be laid on articles exported from the States; nor capitation tax, but in proportion to the census before directed.

All laws regulating commerce shall require the assent of two-thirds of the members present in each house. The United States shall not grant any title of nobility. The legislature of the United States shall pass no law on the subject of religion, nor touching or abridging the liberty of the press, nor shall the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus ever be suspended, except in case of rebellion or invasion.

All acts made by the legislature of the United States, pursuant to this Constitution, and all treaties made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and all judges shall be bound to consider them as such in their decisions.

Article VII. The Senate shall have the sole and exclusive power to declare war, and to make treaties, and to appoint ambassadors and other ministers to foreign nations, and judges of the Supreme Court.

They shall have the exclusive power to regulate the manner of deciding all disputes and controversies now existing, or which may arise between the States respecting jurisdiction or territory.

Article VIII. The executive power of the United States shall be vested in a President of the United States of America, which shall be his style; and his title shall be His Excellency. He shall be elected for ——— years, and shall be reëligible. He shall from time to time give information to the legislature of the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration the measures he may think necessary. He shall take care that the laws of the United States be duly executed. He shall commission all the officers of the United States; and, except as to ambassadors, other ministers, and judges of the Supreme Court, he shall nominate, and, with the consent of the Senate, appoint, all other officers of the United States. He shall receive public ministers from foreign nations, and may correspond with the executives of the different States. He shall have power to grant pardons and reprieves, except in impeachments. He shall be Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States; and shall receive a compensation which shall not be increased or diminished during his continuance in office. At entering on the duties of his office, he shall take an oath faithfully to execute the duties of a President of the United States. He shall be removed from his office on impeachment by the House of Delegates, and conviction in the Supreme Court of treason, bribery, or corruption. In case of his removal, death, resignation, or disability, the President of the Senate shall exercise the duties of his office until another President be chosen. And in case of the death of the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Delegates shall do so.

Article IX. The legislature of the United States shall have the power, and it shall be their duty, to establish such courts of law, equity, and admiralty as shall be necessary.

The judges of the courts shall hold their offices during good behavior, and receive a compensation which shall not be increased or diminished during their continuance in office. One of these courts shall be termed the Supreme Court, whose jurisdiction shall extend to all cases arising under the laws of the United States, or affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, to the trial of impeachment of officers of the United States, to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. In cases of impeachment affecting ambassadors and other public ministers this jurisdiction shall be original, and in all other cases appellate.

All criminal offences, except in cases of impeachment, shall be tried in the State where they shall be committed. The trials shall be open and public, and shall be by jury.

Article X. Immediately after the first census of the people of the United States, the House of Delegates shall apportion the Senate by electing for each State, out of the citizens resident therein, one Senator for every ——— members each State shall have in the House of Delegates. Each State shall be entitled to have at least one member in the Senate.

Article XI. No State shall grant letters of marque and reprisal, or enter into a treaty, or alliance, or confederation; nor grant any title of nobility; nor, without the consent of the legislature of the United States, lay any impost on imports; nor keep troops or ships of war in time of peace; nor enter into compacts with other States or foreign powers; nor emit bills of credit; nor make anything but gold, silver, or copper a tender in payment of debts; nor engage in war except for self-defence when actually invaded, or the danger of invasion be so great as not to admit of a delay until the Government of the United States can be informed thereof. And, to render these prohibitions effectual, the legislature of the United reported to the convention nineteen resolutions founded on those proposed by Randolph.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

1. Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that a national government ought to be established, consisting of a supreme legislative, judiciary, and executive.

2. Resolved, That the national legislature ought to consist of two branches.

3. Resolved, That the members of the first branch of the national legislature ought to be elected by the people of the several States for the term of three years, to receive fixed stipends, by which they may be compensated for the devotion of their time to public service to be paid out of the national treasury; to be ineligible to any office established by a particular State, or under the authority of the United States (except those peculiarly belonging to the functions of the first branch) during the term of service, and under the national government, for the space of one year after its expiration.

4. Resolved, That the members of the second branch of the national legislature ought to be chosen by the individual legislatures; to be of the age of thirty years at least; to hold their offices for a term sufficient to insure their independency—namely, seven years; to receive fixed stipends, by which they may be compensated for the devotion of their time to public service, to be paid out of the national treasury; to be ineligible to any office established by a particular State, or under the authority of the United States (except those peculiarly belonging to the functions of the second branch) during the term of service, and under the national government, for the space of one year after its expiration.

5. Resolved, That each branch ought to possess the right of originating acts.

6. Resolved, That the national legislature ought to be empowered to enjoy the legislative rights vested in Congress by the Confederation; and, moreover, to legislate in all cases to which the separate States are incompetent, or in which the harmony of the United States may be interrupted by the exercise of individual legislation; to negative all laws passed by the several States contravening, in the opinion of the national legislature, the Articles of Union, or any treaties subsisting under the authority of the Union.

7. Resolved, That the right of suffrage in the first branch

States shall have the power to revise the laws of the several States that may be supposed to infringe the powers exclusively delegated by this Constitution to Congress, and to negative and annul such as do.

Article XVII. The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. Any person charged with crimes in any State, fleeing from justice to another, shall, on demand of the executive of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, and removed to the State having jurisdiction of the offence.

Article XIII. Full faith shall be given in each State to the acts of the legislature, and to the records and judicial proceedings of the courts and magistrates of every State.

Article XIV. The Legislature shall have power to admit new States into the Union on the same terms with the original States, provided two-thirds of the members present in both Houses agree.

Article XV. On the application of the legislature of a State, the United States shall protect it against domestic insurrection.

Article XVI. If two-thirds of the legislatures of the States apply for the same, the legislature of the United States shall call a convention for the purpose of amending the Constitution, or, should Congress, with the consent of two-thirds of each House, propose to the States amendments to the same, agreement of two-thirds of the legislatures of the States shall be sufficient to make the said amendments parts of the Constitution.

The ratification of the ——— conventions of ——— States shall be sufficient for organizing this Constitution.

Some time before October 14, 1787, Mr. Pinckney published a pamphlet containing his "Observations on the Plan of Government Submitted to the Federal Convention Delivered at Different Times in the Course of Their Discussions." The text of this is found in Professor Farrand's "Records of the Federal Convention," Vol. III, page 106.

The plans of Randolph and Pinckney were referred to a committee of the whole, which debated the resolutions from day to day until June 13, when the committee of the national legislature ought not to be according to the rule established in the Articles of Confederation, but according to some equitable ratio of representation, namely, in proportion to the whole number of white and other free citizens, and inhabitants of every age, sex, and condition, including those bound to servitude for a term of years, and three-fifths of all other persons not comprehended in the foregoing description, except Indians not paying taxes, in each State.

8. Resolved, That the rights of suffrage in the second branch of the national legislature ought to be according to the rule established for the first.

9. Resolved, That a national executive be instituted, to consist of a single person; to be chosen by the national legislature, for the term of seven years; with power to carry into execution the national laws; to appoint to offices in cases not otherwise provided for; to be ineligible a second time; and to be removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractice, or neglect of duty; to receive a fixed stipend, by which he may be compensated for the devotion of his time to public service, to be paid out of the national treasury.

10. Resolved, That the national executive shall have a right to negative any legislative act, which shall not be afterwards passed unless by two-third parts of each branch of the national legislature.

11. Resolved, That a national judiciary be established, to consist of one supreme tribunal; the judges of which to be appointed by the second branch of the national legislature; to hold their offices during good behavior; to receive punctually, at stated times, a fixed compensation for their services, in which no increase or diminution shall be made, so as to affect the persons actually in office at the time of such increase or diminution.

12. Resolved, That the national legislature be empowered to appoint inferior tribunals.

13. Resolved, That the jurisdiction of the national judiciary shall extend to cases which respect the collection of the national revenue, impeachment of any national officers, and questions which involve the national peace and harmony.

14. Resolved, That provision ought to be made for the admission of States, lawfully arising within the limits of the United States, whether from a voluntary junction of government and territory, or otherwise, with the consent of a number of voices in the national legislature less than the whole.

15. Resolved, That provision ought to be made for the continuance of Congress and their authorities until a given day after the reform of the Articles of Union shall be adopted, and for the completion of all their engagements.

16. Resolved, That a republican constitution, and its existing laws, ought to be guaranteed to each State by the United States.

17. Resolved, That provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union whensoever it shall seem necessary.

18. Resolved, That the legislative, executive, and judiciary powers within the several States ought to be bound by oath to support the Articles of Union.

19. Resolved, That the amendments which shall be offered to the Confederation by the convention ought, at a proper time or times after the approbation of Congress, to be submitted to an assembly, or assemblies of representatives, recommended by the several legislatures to be expressly chosen by the people to consider and decide thereon.

On the 15th of June William Paterson of New Jersey presented a plan of the Constitution.

PATERSON'S PLAN

This plan was a revision of the Articles of Confederation, giving Congress power to impose customs duties, stamps on paper, and postage for Federal revenue; to regulate foreign and interstate commerce, fines, etc., to be adjudicated by the judiciaries of the State where offences were committed, with appeal to the Federal judiciary, and to make requisitions of funds upon the States in proportion to the number of free citizens in each when a fixed proportion of States should authorize the requisitions.

A Federal executive of a fixed number of persons was to be appointed by Congress to serve for a fixed term; to be paid a fixed sum out of the Federal treasury with no change in the same during service; to be ineligible to hold other offices during service, and for a fixed time thereafter, and to be impeachable by a majority of State executives—which Federal executive was empowered to execute Federal acts, appoint Federal officers not otherwise chosen, and direct military operations, though not in person.

A Federal judiciary was to be appointed by Congress to hold office during good behavior; to be paid under the conditions of the executive salaries; to adjudicate impeachments of

CHAPTER XI

PEOPLE OR STATES?

[DEBATE IN THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION ON THE BASIS OF REPRESENTATION]

Debate on the "Jersey Plan" of Equal Representation of States in Congress: in favor, John Lansing, Jr. [N. Y.], William Paterson [N. J.], Judge Oliver Ellsworth [Ct.]; opposed, James Wilson [Pa.], Gen. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney [S. C.], Gov. Edmund Randolph [Va.], Alexander Hamilton [N. Y.], James Madison [Va.]; the Plan Is Rejected.

THE great issue of the Convention was now fairly before it. The Virginia plan, presented by the committee of the whole, was not a mere revision of the Articles of the Confederation, but an entirely new national system, a government in which the people of the entire Union were proportionately represented, and which possessed supremacy in national affairs over the governments of the several States. The Jersey plan (as it was afterward called), presented by Mr. Paterson, was little more than a revision of the Articles of Confederation, enlarging the powers of Congress, it is true, but keeping it still in subordination to the State governments as far as was possible with this enlargement, and continuing the feature of equal representation of the States. Representatives of the more populous States were naturally in favor of the Virginia plan, and those from the less populous States of the Jersey plan.

Alexander Hamilton was not in accord with either plan, and suggested that both be committed to the committee of the whole, in order that a comparative estimate might be had of the two. Thereupon it was agreed that the convention resolve itself into a committee of Federal officers, and finally decide on all cases concerned with foreign affairs and Federal revenue.

State legislatures, executives, and judiciaries were to swear to support the Articles of Union.

Federal acts, above authorized, to be supreme over State acts on the subjects, and the Federal Government to be empowered to call on as many as necessary of the State governments to enforce them.

Provisions to be made for admission of new States and for adjudicating territorial disputes between the States.

Uniform rules of naturalization to be adopted by the States.

A citizen of one State committing an offence in another to be punished according to the law of his own State.

the whole to discuss both propositions on the following day.

On the morrow (June 16) began the great debate in the convention between the large and the small States (in respect to population) over the two plans.

From this point on the account of the debates is taken from the minutes made privately by Judge Robert Yates, delegate from New York. In all the votes taken during the proceedings reported by him only eleven States were represented [see page 284].

The leading speakers in this debate were: John Lansing, Jr. [N. Y.], William Paterson [N. J.], James Wilson [Pa.], Charles Cotesworth Pinckney [S. C.], Oliver Ellsworth [Conn.], Edmund Randolph [Va.], Alexander Hamilton [N. Y.], and James Madison [Va.].

NATION OR FEDERATION?

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, JUNE 16-19, 1787

MR. LANSING observed that both plans were fairly contrasted—the one federal and the other national. In the first (the Jersey plan) the powers are exercised as flowing from the respective State governments, the second deriving its authority from the people of the respective States, which latter must ultimately destroy or annihilate the State governments. To determine the powers on these grand objects with which we are invested, he said, let us recur to the credentials of the respective States and see what the views were of those who sent us. The language is there expressive—it is upon the revision of the present Confederation—to alter and amend such parts as may appear defective, so as to give additional strength to the Union. And he would venture to assert that, had the legislature of the State of New York apprehended that their powers would have been construed to extend to the formation of a national government, to the extinguishment of their independence, no delegates would have here appeared on the part of that State. This sentiment must have had its weight on a former occasion, even in this house, for when the second resolution of Virginia declared, in substance, that a federal government could not be amended for the good of the whole, the remark of an honorable member of South Carolina (Pinckney) that, by determining this question in the affirmative, their deliberative powers were at an end induced this house to waive the resolution.

It is in vain to adopt a mode of government which we have reason to believe the people gave us no power to recommend, as they will consider themselves, on this ground, authorized to reject it. See the danger of exceeding your powers by the example which the requisition of Congress of 1783 afforded. They required an impost on all imported articles, to which, on federal grounds, they had no right unless voluntarily granted. What was the consequence? Some who had least to give granted it, and others, under various restrictions and modifications, so that it could not be symmetized. If we form a government, let us do it on principles which are likely to meet the approbation of the States. Great changes can only be gradually introduced. The States will never sacrifice their essential rights to a national government. New plans annihilating the rights of the States (unless upon evident necessity) can never be approved. I may venture to assert that the prevalent opinion of America is that granting additional powers to Congress would answer their views, and every power recommended for their approbation exceeding this idea will be fruitless.

MR. PATERSON.—As I had the honor of proposing a new system of government for the Union [see page 297], it will be expected that I should explain its principles.

First. The plan accords with our own powers.

Second. It accords with the sentiments of the people.

But if the subsisting Confederation is so radically defective as not to admit of amendment, let us say so and report its insufficiency and wait for enlarged powers. We must, in the present case, pursue our powers if we expect the approbation of the people. I am not here to pursue my own sentiments of government, but of those who have sent me, and I believe that a little practical virtue is to be preferred to the finest theoretical principles which cannot be carried into effect. Can we, as representatives of independent States, annihilate the essential powers of independency? Are not the votes of this convention taken, on every question, under the idea of independency? Let us turn to the fifth article of Confederation. In this it is mutually agreed that each State should have one vote; it is a fundamental principle, arising from confederated governments. The thirteenth article provides for amendments, but they must be agreed to by every State; the dissent of one renders every proposal null. The Confederation is in the nature of a compact, and can any State, unless by the consent of the whole, either in politics or law, withdraw their powers? Let it be said by Pennsylvania, and the other large States, that they, for the sake of peace, assented to the Confederation; can she now resume her original right without the consent of the donee?

And although it is now asserted that the larger States reluctantly agreed to that part of the Confederation which secures an equal suffrage to each, yet let it be remembered that the smaller States were the last who approved the Confederation.

On this ground representation must be drawn from the States to maintain their independency, and not from the people composing those States.

The doctrine advanced by a learned gentleman from Pennsylvania that all power is derived from the people, and that in proportion to their numbers they ought to participate equally in the benefits and rights of government, is right in principle, but, unfortunately for him, wrong in the application to the question now in debate.

When independent societies confederate for mutual defence, they do so in their collective capacity, and then each State, for those purposes, must be considered as one of the contracting parties. Destroy this balance of equality, and you endanger the rights of the lesser societies by the danger of usurpation in the greater.

Let us test the government intended to be made by the Virginia plan on these principles. The representatives in the national legislature are to be in proportion to the number of inhabitants in each State. So far, it is right upon these principles of equality, when State distinctions are done away, but those to certain purposes still exist. Will the government of Pennsylvania admit a participation of their common stock of land to the citizens of New Jersey? I fancy not. It therefore follows that a national government upon the present plan is unjust and destructive of the common principles of reciprocity. Much has been said that this government is to operate on persons, not on States. This, upon examination, will be found equally fallacious, for the fact is it will, in the quotas of revenue, be proportioned among the States, as States, and in this business Georgia will have one vote and Virginia sixteen. The truth is, both plans may be considered to compel individuals to a compliance with their requisitions, although the requisition is made on the States.

Much has been said in commendation of two branches in a legislature, and of the advantages resulting from their being checks to each other. This may be true when applied to the State governments, but will not equally apply to a national legislature, whose legislative objects are few and simple.

Whatever may be said of Congress, or their conduct on particular occasions, the people in general are pleased with such a body, and in general wish an increase of their powers for the good government of the Union. Let us now see the plan of the national government on the score of expense. The least the second branch of the legislature can consist of is ninety members; the first branch of at least 270. How are they to be paid in our present impoverished situation? Let us therefore fairly try whether the Confederation cannot be mended, and, if it can, we shall do our duty, and I believe the people will be satisfied.

MR. WILSON first stated the difference between the two plans.

Virginia plan proposes two branches in the legislature.

Jersey, a single legislative body.

Virginia, the legislative powers derived from the people.

Jersey, from the States.

Virginia, a single executive.

Jersey, more than one.

Virginia, a majority of the legislature can act.

Jersey, a small majority can control.

Virginia, the legislature can legislate on all national concerns.

Jersey, only on limited objects.

Virginia, legislature to negative all State laws.

Jersey, giving power to the executive to compel obedience by force.

Virginia, to remove the executive by impeachment.

Jersey, on application of a majority of the States.

Virginia, for the establishment of inferior judiciary tribunals.

Jersey, no provision.

It is said, and insisted on, that the Jersey plan accords with our powers. As for myself, I consider my powers to extend to everything or nothing; and therefore that I have a right and am at liberty to agree to either plan or none. The people expect relief from their present embarrassed situation, and look up for it to this national convention, and it follows that they expect a national government; and therefore the plan from Virginia has the preference to the other. I would with a reluctant hand add any powers to Congress, because they are not a body chosen by the people, and consist only of one branch, and each State in it has one vote. Inequality in representation poisons every government.

The English courts are hitherto pure, just, and incorrupt, while their legislature are base and venal. The one arises from unjust representation, the other from their independency of the legislature.

Lord Chesterfield remarks that one of the States of the United Netherlands withheld its assent to a proposition until a major of their State was provided for. He needed not have added (for the conclusion was self-evident) that it was one of the lesser States. I mean no reflection, but I leave it to gentlemen to consider whether this has not also been the case in Congress. The argument in favor of the Jersey plan goes too far, as it cannot be completed unless Rhode Island assents. A single legislature is very dangerous; despotism may present itself in various shapes. May there not be legislative despotism if, in the exercise of their power, they are unchecked or unrestrained by another branch? On the contrary an executive, to be restrained, must be an individual. The first triumvirate of Rome, combined, without law, was fatal to its liberties, and the second, by the usurpation of Augustus, ended in despotism. The two kings of Sparta, and the consuls of Rome, by sharing the executive, distracted their governments.

MR. C. C. PINCKNEY supposed that if New Jersey was indulged with one vote out of thirteen she would have no objection to a national government. He supposed that the convention have already determined virtually that the Federal Government cannot be made efficient. A national government being therefore the object, this plan must be pursued, as our business is not to conclude, but to recommend.

JUDGE ELLSWORTH was of opinion that the first question on the new plan will decide nothing materially on principle, and therefore moved the postponement thereof in order to bring on the second.

GOVERNOR RANDOLPH.—The question now is which of the two plans is to be preferred. If the vote on the first resolve will determine it, and it is so generally understood I have no objection that it be put. The resolutions from Virginia must have been adopted on the supposition that a federal government was impracticable. And it is said that power is wanting to institute such a government, but when our all is at stake I will consent to any mode that will preserve us. View our present deplorable situation. France, to whom we are indebted in every motive of gratitude and honor, is left unpaid the large sums she has supplied us with in the day of our necessity. Our officers and soldiers, who have successfully fought our battles, and the loaners of money to the public, look up to you for relief.

The bravery of our troops is degraded by the weakness of our government.

It has been contended that the 5th article of the Confederation cannot be repealed under the powers to new-modify the Confederation by the 13th article. This surely is false reasoning; since the whole of the Confederation, upon revision, is subject to amendment and alteration; besides, our business consists in recommending a system of government, not in making it. There are great reasons when persons with limited powers are justified in exceeding them, and a person would be contemptible not to risk it. Originally, our Confederation was founded on the weakness of each State to repel a foreign enemy; and we have found that the powers granted to Congress are insufficient. The body of Congress is ineffectual to carry the great objects of safety and protection into execution. What would their powers be over the commander of the military but for the virtue of the commander? As the State assemblies are constantly encroaching on the powers of Congress, the Jersey plan would rather encourage such encroachment than be a check to it; and, from the nature of the institution, Congress would never be governed by cabal and intrigue. They are, besides, too numerous for an executive; nor can any additional powers be sufficient to enable them to protect us against foreign invasion. Among other things, Congress was intended to be a body to preserve peace among the States; and, in the rebellion of Massachusetts, it was found they were not authorized to use the troops of the Confederation to quell it. Every one is impressed with the idea of a general regulation of trade and commerce. Can Congress do this, when, from the nature of their institution, they are so subject to cabal and intrigue? And would it not be dangerous to intrust such a body with the power, when they are dreaded on these grounds? I am certain that a national government must be established, and this is the only moment when it can be done; and let me conclude by observing that the best exercise of power is to exert it for the public good.

On June 18 Colonel Alexander Hamilton reopened the debate with a powerful speech of five hours' dura-them. We can only propose and recommend;—the power of ratifying or rejecting is still in the States. But on this great question I am still greatly embarrassed. I have before observed my apprehension of the inefficacy of either plan, and I have great doubts whether a more energetic government can pervade this wide and extensive country. I shall now show that both plans are materially defective.

1. A good government ought to be constant, and ought to contain an active principle. 2. Utility and necessity. 3. An habitual sense of obligation. 4. Force. 5. Influence.

I hold it that different societies have all different views and interests to pursue, and always prefer local to general concerns. For example: the New York legislature made an external compliance lately to a requisition of Congress; but do they not, at the same time, counteract their compliance by gratifying the local objects of the State, so as to defeat their concession? And this will ever be the case. Men always love power, and States will prefer their particular concerns to the general welfare; and as the States become large and important, will they not be less attentive to the general government? What, in the process of time, will Virginia be? She contains now half a million inhabitants: in twenty-five years she will double the number. Feeling her own weight and importance, must she not become indifferent to the concerns of the Union? And where, in such a situation, will be found national attachment to the general government?

By force I mean the coercion of law and the coercion of arms. Will this remark apply to the power intended to be vested in the government to be instituted by their plan? A delinquent must be compelled to obedience by force of arms. How is this to be done? If you are unsuccessful a dissolution of your government must be the consequence; and, in that case, the individual legislatures will reassume their powers; nay, will not the interests of the States be thrown into the State governments?

By influence, I mean the regular weight and support it will receive from those who find it their interest to support a government intended to preserve the peace and happiness of the community on the whole. The State governments, by either plan, will exert the means to counteract it. They have their State judges and militia all combined to support their State interests; and these will be influenced to oppose a national government. Either plan is therefore precarious. The national government cannot long exist when opposed by such a tion, in the course of which he presented a plan of government differing widely from both of those before the convention.

MR. HAMILTON.—To deliver my sentiments on so important a subject, when the first characters of the Union have gone before me, inspires me with the greatest diffidence, especially when my own ideas are so materially dissimilar to the plans now before the committee. My situation is disagreeable; but it would be criminal not to come forward on a question of such magnitude. I have well considered the subject, and am convinced that no amendment of the Confederation can answer the purpose of a good government so long as the State sovereignties do, in any shape, exist; and I have great doubts whether a national government on the Virginia plan can be made effectual. What is federal? An association of several independent states into one. How or in what manner this association is formed is not so clearly distinguishable. We find the Diet of Germany has, in some instances, the power of legislation on individuals. We find the United States of America have it in an extensive degree in the case of piracies.

Let us now review the powers with which we are invested. We are appointed for the sole and express purpose of revising the Confederation, and to alter or amend it, so as to render it effectual for the purposes of a good government. Those who suppose it to be federal lay great stress on the terms sole and express, as if these words intended a confinement to a federal government; when the manifest import is no more than that the institution of a good government must be the sole and express object of your deliberations. Nor can we suppose an annihilation of our powers by forming a national government, as many of the States have made, in their constitutions, no provision for any alteration; and thus much I can say for the State I have the honor to represent, that, when our credentials were under consideration in the Senate, some members were for inserting a restriction in the powers, to prevent an encroachment on the Constitution: it was answered by others, and thereupon the resolve carried on the credentials, that it might abridge the constitutional powers of the State, and that possibly, in the formation of a new union, it would be found necessary. This appears reasonable, and therefore leaves us at liberty to form such a national government as we think best adapted for the good of the whole. I have, therefore, no difficulty as to the extent of our powers, nor do I feel myself restrained in the exercise of my judgment under weighty rival. The experience of ancient and modern confederacies evinces this point, and throws considerable light on the subject. The Amphictyonic council of Greece had a right to require of its members troops, money, and the force of the country. Were they obeyed in the exercise of those powers? Could they preserve the peace of the greater states and republics? or where were they obeyed? History shows that their decrees were disregarded, and that the stronger States, regardless of their power, gave law to the lesser.

Let us examine the federal institution of Germany. It was instituted upon the laudable principle of securing the independency of the several states of which it was composed, and to protect them against foreign invasion. Has it answered these good intentions? Do we not see that their councils are weak and distracted, and that it cannot prevent the wars and confusions which the respective electors carry on against each other? The Swiss cantons, or the Helvetic union, are equally inefficient.

Such are the lessons which the experience of others affords us, and from whence results the evident conclusion that all federal governments are weak and distracted. To avoid the evils deducible from these observations, we must establish a general and national government, completely sovereign, and annihilate the State distinctions and State operations; and unless we do this no good purpose can be answered. What does the Jersey plan propose? It surely has not this for its object. By this we grant the regulation of trade and a more effectual collection of the revenue and some partial duties. These, at five or ten per cent., would only perhaps amount to a fund to discharge the debt of the corporation.

Let us take a review of the variety of important objects which must necessarily engage the attention of a national government. You have to protect your rights against Canada on the north, Spain on the south, and your western frontier against the savages. You have to adopt necessary plans for the settlement of your frontiers, and to institute the mode in which settlements and good governments are to be made.

How is the expense of supporting and regulating these important matters to be defrayed? By requisition on the States, according to the Jersey plan? Will this do it? We have already found it ineffectual. Let one State prove delinquent and it will encourage others to follow the example and thus the whole will fail. And what is the standard to quota among the States their respective proportions? Can lands be the standard? How would that apply between Russia and Holland? Compare Pennsylvania with North Carolina, or Connecticut with New York. Does not commerce or industry in the one or other make a great disparity between these different countries, and may not the comparative value of the States, from these circumstances, make an unequal disproportion when the data are numbers? I therefore conclude that either system would ultimately destroy the Confederation, or any other government which is established on such fallacious principles. Perhaps imposts—taxes on specific articles—would produce a more equal system of drawing a revenue.

Another objection against the Jersey plan is the unequal representation. Can the great States consent to this? If they did it would eventually work its own destruction. How are forces to be raised by the Jersey plan? By quotas? Will the States comply with the requisition? As much as they will with the taxes.

Examine the present Confederation and it is evident they can raise no troops nor equip vessels before war is actually declared. They cannot, therefore, take any preparatory measure before an enemy is at your door. How unwise and inadequate their powers! and this must ever be the case when you attempt to define powers: something will always be wanting. Congress, by being annually elected and subject to recall, will ever come with the prejudices of their States rather than the good of the Union. Add, therefore, additional powers to a body thus organized and you establish a sovereignty of the worst kind, consisting of a single body. Where are the checks? None. They must either prevail over the State governments, or the prevalence of the State governments must end in their dissolution. This is a conclusive objection to the Jersey plan.

Such are the insuperable objections to both plans: and what is to be done on this occasion? I confess I am at a loss. I foresee the difficulty, on a consolidated plan, of drawing a representation from so extensive a continent to one place. What can be the inducements for gentlemen to come six hundred miles to a national legislature? The expense would at least amount to a hundred thousand pounds. This, however, can be no conclusive objection, if it eventuates in an extinction of State governments. The burden of the latter would be saved and the expense, then, would not be great. State distinctions would be found unnecessary; and yet, I confess, to carry government to the extremities, the State governments, reduced to corporations, and with very limited powers, might as to bring forward its first characters in its support. I am, therefore, for a general government, yet would wish to go the full length of republican principles.

Let one body of the legislature be constituted during good behavior or life.

Let one executive be appointed who dares execute his powers. It may be asked: Is this a republican system? It is strictly so, as long as they remain elective.

And let me observe that an executive is less dangerous to the liberties of the people when in office during life than for seven years.

It may be said this constitutes an elective monarchy. Pray what is a monarchy? May not the governors of the respective States be considered in that light? But by making the executive subject to impeachment the term monarchy cannot apply. These elective monarchs have produced tumults in Rome, and are equally dangerous to peace in Poland; but this cannot apply to the mode in which I propose the election. Let electors be appointed in each of the States to elect the legislature (here Mr. H. produced his plan) to consist of two branches and I would give them the unlimited power of passing all laws without exception. The Assembly to be elected for three years by the people, in districts; the Senate to be elected by electors to be chosen for that purpose by the people, and to remain in office during life. The executive to have the power of negating all laws; to make war or peace, with the advice of the Senate; to make treaties with their advice, but to have the sole direction of all military operations; and to send ambassadors, and appoint all military officers, and to pardon all offenders, treason excepted, unless by advice of the Senate. On his death or removal, the president of the Senate to officiate, with the same powers, until another is elected. Supreme judicial officers to be appointed by the executive and the Senate. The legislature to appoint courts in each State, so as to make the State governments unnecessary to it.

All State laws to be absolutely void which contravene the general laws. An officer to be appointed in each State to have a negative on all State laws. All the militia and the appointment of officers to be under the national government.

I confess that this plan, and that from Virginia, are very remote from the idea of the people. Perhaps the Jersey plan is nearest their expectation. But the people are gradually ripening in their opinions of government. They begin to be tired of an excess of democracy. And what, even, is the Virginia plan but pork still, with a little change of the sauce?

Yet, I confess, I see great difficulty of drawing forth a good representation. What, for example, will be the inducements for gentlemen of fortune and abilities to leave their houses and business to attend annually and long? It cannot be the wages: for these, I presume, must be small. Will not the power, therefore, be thrown into the hands of the demagogue, or middling politician—who, for the sake of a small stipend, and the hopes of advancement, will offer himself as a candidate, and the real men of weight and influence, by remaining at home, add strength to the State governments? I am at a loss to know what must be done. I despair that a republican form of government can remove the difficulties. Whatever may be my opinion, I would hold it, however, unwise to change that form of government. I believe the British government forms the best model the world ever produced; and such has been its progress in the minds of the many that the truth gradually gains ground this government has for its object public strength and individual security. It is said with us to be unattainable. If it was once formed it would maintain itself. All communities divide themselves into the few and the many. The first are the rich and well born, the other the mass of the people. The voice of the people has been said to be the voice of God; and, however generally this maxim has been quoted and believed, it is not true in fact. The people are turbulent and changing; they seldom judge or determine right. Give, therefore, to the first class a distinct, permanent share in the government. They will check the unsteadiness of the second; and, as they cannot receive any advantage by a change, they therefore will ever maintain good government. Can a democratic assembly, who annually revolve in the mass of the people, be supposed steadily to pursue the public good? Nothing but a permanent body can check the imprudence of democracy. Their turbulent and uncontrollable disposition requires checks. The Senate of New York, although chosen for four years, we have found to be inefficient. Will, on the Virginia plan, a continuance of seven years do it? It is admitted that you cannot have a good executive upon a democratic plan. See the excellency of the British executive. He is placed above temptation—he can have no distinct interests from the public welfare. Nothing short of such an executive can be efficient. The weak side of a republican government is the danger of foreign influence. This is unavoidable, unless it is so constructed

HAMILTON'S PLAN

1. The supreme legislative power of the United States of America to be vested in two distinct bodies of men, the one to be called the Assembly, the other the Senate, who, together, shall form the legislature of the United States, with power to pass all laws whatsoever, subject to the negative hereafter mentioned.

2. The Assembly to consist of persons elected by the people, to serve for three years.

3. The Senate to consist of persons elected to serve during good behavior; their election to be made by electors chosen for that purpose by the people. In order to this, the States to be divided into election districts. On the death, removal, or resignation of any Senator his place to be filled out of the district from which he came.

4. The supreme executive authority of the United States to be vested in a governor, to be elected to serve during good behavior. His election to be made by electors, chosen by electors, chosen by the people in the election districts aforesaid. His authorities and functions to be as follows:

To have a negative upon all laws about to be passed, and the execution of all laws passed; to have the entire direction of war, when authorized or begun; to have, with the advice and approbation of the Senate, the power of making all treaties; to have the sole appointment of the heads or chief officers of the departments of Finance, War, and Foreign Affairs; to have the nomination of all other officers (ambassadors of foreign nations included), subject to the approbation or rejection of the Senate; to have the power of pardoning all offences except treason, which he shall not pardon without the approbation of the Senate.

5. On the death, resignation, or removal of the governor, his authorities to be exercised by the president of the Senate, until a successor be appointed.

6. The Senate to have the sole power of declaring war; the power of advising and approving all treaties; the power of approving or rejecting all appointments of officers, except the heads or chiefs of the departments of Finance, War, and Foreign Affairs.

7. The supreme judicial authority of the United States to be vested in judges, to hold their offices during good behavior, with adequate and permanent salaries. This court to have original jurisdiction in all causes of capture; and an appellate jurisdiction in all causes in which the revenues of the general government, or the citizens of foreign nations, are concerned.

8. The legislature of the United States to have power to institute courts in each State, for the determination of all matters of general concern.

9. The Governors, Senators, and all officers of the United States to be liable to impeachment for mal- and corrupt conduct; and, upon conviction, to be removed from office, and disqualified for holding any place of trust or profit. All impeachments to be tried by a court, to consist of the chief or senior judge of the superior court of law in each State; provided that such judge hold his place during good behavior and have a permanent salary.

10. All laws of the particular States, contrary to the Constitution or laws of the United States, to be utterly void. And the better to prevent such laws being passed, the governor or president of each State shall be appointed by the general government, and shall have a negative upon the laws about to be passed in the State of which he is governor or president.

11. No State to have any forces, land or naval, and the militia of all the States to be under the sole and exclusive direction of the United States, the officers of which to be appointed and commissioned by them.

Judge Yates remarked that "Hamilton was praised by everybody, but supported by none." His plan was not even referred to the "committee of detail" on July 26. Hamilton was severely censured throughout his career for his undemocratic propositions in the convention, and so, in 1803, he wrote a letter to Col. Timothy Pickering explaining and justifying them.

HAMILTON'S LETTER TO PICKERING

The highest toned propositions which I made in the convention were for a President, Senate, and judges during good behavior—a House of Representatives for three years. Though I would have enlarged the legislative power of the general Government, yet I never contemplated the abolition of the State governments; but, on the contrary, they were, in some particulars, constituent parts of my plan.

This plan was, in my conception, conformable with the strict theory of a government purely republican; the essential criteria of which are that the principal organs of the executive and leg-

PEOPLE OR STATES?

On June 19 Mr. Madison made the closing argument against the Jersey plan.

MR. MADISON.—Many persons scruple the powers of the convention. If this remark had any weight it is equally applicable to the adoption of either plan. The difference of drawing the powers in the one from the people and in the other from the States does not affect the powers. There are two States in the Union where the members of Congress are chosen by the people. A new government must be made. Our all is depending on it; and, if we have but a clause that the people will adopt, there is then a chance for our preservation. Although all the States have assented to the Confederation, an infraction of any one article by one of the States is a dissolution of the whole. This is the doctrine of the civil law on treaties.

Jersey pointedly refused complying with a requisition of Congress and was guilty of this infraction, although she afterward rescinded her non-complying resolve. What is the object of a confederation? It is twofold: first, to maintain the union; secondly, good government. Will the Jersey plan secure these points? No; it is still in the power of the confederated States to violate treaties. Has not Georgia, in direct violation of the Confederation, made war with the Indians, and concluded treaties? Have not Virginia and Maryland entered into a partial compact? Have not Pennsylvania and Jersey regulated the bounds of the Delaware? Has not the State of Massachusetts at this time a considerable body of troops in pay? Has not Congress been obliged to pass a conciliatory act in support of a decision of their federal court, between Connecticut and Pennsylvania, instead of having the power of carrying into effect the judgment of their own court? Nor does the Jersey plan provide for a ratification, by the respective States, of the powers intended to be vested. It is also defective in the establishment of the judiciary, granting only an appellate jurisdiction, without providing for a second trial; and, in case the executive of a State should pardon an offender, how will it affect the definite judgment on appeal? It is evident, if we do not radically depart from a federal plan, we shall share the fate of ancient and modern confederacies. The Amphictyonic council, like the American Congress, had the power of judging, in the last resort, in war and peace—to call out forces—send ambassadors. What was its fate or continuance? Philip of Macedon with little difficulty destroyed every appearance of it. The Athenian had nearly the same fate. The Helvetic confederacy is rather a league. In the German islative departments be elected by the people and hold their offices by a responsible and temporary or defeasible tenure.

A vote was taken on the proposition respecting the executive. Five States were in favor of it, among these Virginia; and, though, from the manner of voting by delegations, individuals were not distinguished, it was morally certain, from the known situation of the Virginia members (six in number, two of them, Mason and Randolph, professing popular doctrines), that Madison must have concurred in the vote of Virginia. Thus, if I sinned against republicanism, Mr. Madison was not less guilty.

I may truly then say that I never proposed either a President or Senate for life; and that I neither recommended nor meditated the annihilation of the State governments.

And I may add that, in the course of the discussions in the convention, neither the propositions thrown out for debate, nor even those voted in the earlier stages of deliberation, were considered as evidences of a definitive opinion in the proposer or voter. It appeared to me to be in some sort understood that, with a view to free investigation, experimental propositions might be made, which were to be received merely as suggestions for consideration.

Accordingly, it is a fact that my final opinion was against an executive during good behavior, on account of the increased danger to the public tranquillity incident to the election of a magistrate of this degree of permanency. In the plan of a constitution which I drew up while the convention was sitting, and which I communicated to Mr. Madison about the close of it, perhaps a day or two after, the office of President has no greater duration than for three years.

This plan was predicted upon these bases: 1. That the political principles of the people of this country would endure nothing but republican governments. 2. That, in the actual situation of the country, it was in itself right and proper that the republican theory should have a fair and full trial. 3. That to such a trial it was essential that the government should be so constructed as to give it all the energy and stability reconcilable with the principles of that theory.

These were the genuine sentiments of my heart, and upon them I acted.

I sincerely hope that it may not hereafter be discovered that, through want of sufficient attention to the last idea, the experiment of republican government, even in this country, has not been as complete, as satisfactory, and as decisive as could be wished.

316

confederacy the parts are too strong for the whole. The Dutch are in a most wretched situation—weak in all its parts, and only supported by surrounding contending powers.

The rights of individuals are infringed by many of the State laws—such as issuing paper money and instituting a mode to discharge debts differing from the form of the contract. Has the Jersey plan any checks to prevent the mischief? Does it in any instance secure internal tranquillity? Right and force, in a system like this, are synonymous terms. When force is employed to support the system, and men obtain military habits, is there no danger they may turn their arms against their employers? Will the Jersey plan prevent foreign influence? Did not Persia and Macedon distract the councils of Greece by acts of corruption? And are not Jersey and Holland at this day subject to the same distractions? Will not the plan be burdensome to the smaller States, if they have an equal representation? But how is military coercion to enforce government? True, a smaller State may be brought to obedience, or crushed; but what if one of the larger States should prove disobedient—are you sure you can, by force, effect a submission? Suppose we cannot agree on any plan; what will be the condition of the smaller States? Will Delaware and Jersey be safe against Pennsylvania, or Rhode Island against Massachusetts? And how will the smaller States be situated in case of partial confederacies? Will they not be obliged to make larger concessions to the greater States? The point of representation is the great point of difference, and which the greater States cannot give up; and, although there was an equalization of States, State distinctions would still exist. But this is totally impracticable; and what would be the effect of the Jersey plan if ten or twelve new States were added?

At the conclusion of Mr. Madison's remarks the Convention in committee of the whole reported the Jersey plan as inadmissible.

STRONG OR WEAK GOVERNMENT?

[DEBATE IN THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION ON BASIS OF REPRESENTATION]

Debate on the Virginia Plan of Representation of States in Congress According to Population: in favor (in the main), James Wilson [Pa.], James Madison [Va.], Charles Pinckney [S. C.], Alexander Hamilton [N. Y.], Hugh Williamson [N. C.], Elbridge Gerry [Mass.], Rufus King [Mass.], Gov. Edmund Randolph [Va.]; opposed (in the main), John Lansing, Jr. [N. Y.], George Mason [Va.], Dr. William Samuel Johnson [Ct.], Judge Oliver Ellsworth [Ct.], Luther Martin [Md.], Gov. Benjamin Franklin [Pa.], George Read [Del.], Abraham Baldwin [Ga.], Gunning S. Bedford, Jr. [Del.], Gouverneur Morris [Pa.], Robert Yates and Lansing, of New York, Leave the Convention—Their Report to Gov. George Clinton—George Washington's Despairing Letter to Hamilton.

IN the debate which ensued on the adoption of the Virginia plan, the chief speakers were, mainly in the affirmative: James Wilson [Pa.], James Madison [Va.], Charles Pinckney [S. C.], Alexander Hamilton [N. Y.], Hugh Williamson [N. C.], Elbridge Gerry [Mass.], Rufus King [Mass.], and Gov. Edmund Randolph [Va.]; mainly in the negative: John Lansing, Jr. [N. Y.], George Mason [Va.], Dr. William Samuel Johnson [Ct.], Judge Oliver Ellsworth [Ct.], Luther Martin [Md.], Gov. Benjamin Franklin [Pa.], George Read [Del.], Abraham Baldwin [Ga.], Gunning S. Bedford, Jr. [Del.], and Gouverneur Morris [Pa.].

STRONG OR WEAK GOVERNMENT?

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, JUNE 19-JULY 5, 1787

MR. LANSING.—I am clearly of opinion that I am not authorized to accede to a system which will annihilate the State governments, and the Virginia plan is declarative of such extinction.

of those who sent them. The impracticability of the plan is still more groundless. These measures are supported by one who, at his time of life, has little to hope or expect from any government. Let me ask: Will the people intrust their dearest rights and liberties to the determination of one body of men, and those not chosen by them, and who are invested both with the sword and purse? They never will—they never can—to a conclave, transacting their business secret from the eye of the public. Do we not discover by their public journals of the years 1778-9 and 1780 that factions and party spirit had guided many of their acts? The people of America, like all other people, are unsettled in their minds, and their principles fixed to no object, except that a republican government is the best and that the legislature ought to consist of two branches. The constitutions of the respective States, made and approved of by them, evince this principle. Congress, however, from other causes, received a different organization. What! would you use military force to compel the observance of a social compact? It is destructive to the rights of the people. Do you expect the militia will do it? or do you mean a standing army? The first will never, on such an occasion, exert any power; and the latter may turn its arms against the government which employs them. I never will consent to destroy State governments, and will ever be as careful to preserve the one as the other. If we should, in the formation of the latter, have omitted some necessary regulation, I will trust my posterity to amend it. That the one government will be productive of disputes and jealousies against the other, I believe; but it will produce mutual safety. I shall close with observing that, though some have expressed much warmth on this and former occasions, I can excuse it as the result of sudden passion; and hope that, although we may differ in some particular points, if we mean the good of the whole, that our good sense, upon reflection, will prevent us from spreading our discontent farther.

MR. WILSON.—The question before us may admit of the three following considerations:

1. Whether the legislature shall consist of one or two branches.
2. Whether they are to be elected by the State governments or by the people.
3. Whether in proportion to State importance, or States individually.

Confederations are usually of a short date. The Amphictyonic council was instituted in the infancy of the Grecian re-

It has been asserted that the public mind is not known. To some points it may be true; but we may collect from the fate of the requisition of the impost what it may be on the principles of a national government. When many of the States were so tenacious of their rights on this point, can we expect that thirteen States will surrender their governments up to a national plan? Rhode Island pointedly refused granting it. Certainly she had a federal right to do so; and I hold it as an undoubted truth, as long as State distinctions remain, let the national government be modified as you please, both branches of your legislature will be impressed with local and State attachments. The Virginia plan proposes a negative on the State laws where, in the opinion of the national legislature, they contravene the national government; and no laws can pass unless approved by them. They will have more than a law in a day to revise; and are they competent to judge of the wants and necessities of remote States?

This national government will, from their power, have great influence in the State governments; and the existence of the latter is only saved in appearance. And has it not been asserted that they expect their extinction? If this be the object, let us say so, and extinguish them at once. But remember, if we devise a system of government which will not meet the approbation of our constituents, we are dissolving the Union; but, if we act within the limits of our power, it will be approved of; and should it, upon experiment, prove defective, the people will intrust a future convention again to amend it. Fond as many are of a general government, do any of you believe that it can pervade the whole continent so effectually as to secure the peace, harmony, and happiness of the whole? The excellence of the British model of government has been much insisted on; but we are endeavoring to complicate it with State governments, on principles which will gradually destroy the one or the other. You are sowing the seeds of rivalry, which must at last end in ruin.

MR. MASON.—The material difference between the two plans has already been clearly pointed out. The objection to that of Virginia arises from the want of power to institute it, and the want of practicability to carry it into effect. Will the first objection apply to a power merely recommendatory? In certain seasons of public danger it is commendable to exceed power. The treaty of peace, under which we now enjoy the blessings of freedom, was made by persons who exceeded their powers. It met the approbation of the public and thus deserved the praises publics. As those grew in strength the council lost its weight and power. The Achaean league met the same fate. Switzerland and Holland are supported in their confederation, not by its intrinsic merit, but the incumbent pressure of surrounding bodies. Germany is kept together by the house of Austria. True, Congress carried us through the war even against its own weakness. That powers were wanting, you, Mr. President, must have felt. To other causes, not to Congress, must the success be ascribed. That the great States acceded to the Confederation, and that they, in the hour of danger, made a sacrifice of their interest to the lesser states, is true. Like the wisdom of Solomon, in adjudging the child to its true mother, from tenderness to it, the greater states well knew that the loss of a limb was fatal to the Confederation: they, too, through tenderness, sacrificed their dearest rights to preserve the whole. But the time is come when justice will be done to their claims. Situations are altered.

Congress have frequently made their appeal to the people. I wish they had always done it: the national government would sooner have been extricated.

DR. JOHNSON.—It appears to me that the Jersey plan has for its principal object the preservation of the State governments. So far it is a departure from the plan of Virginia, which, although it concentrates in a distinct national government, is not totally independent of that of the States. A gentleman from New York, with boldness and decision, proposed a system totally different from both; and, though he has been praised by everybody, he has been supported by none. How can the State governments be secured on the Virginia plan? I could have wished that the supporters of the Jersey system could have satisfied themselves with the principles of the Virginia plan, and that the individuality of the States could be supported. It is agreed, on all hands, that a portion of government is to be left to the States. How can this be done? It can be done by joining the States, in their legislative capacity, with the right of appointing the second branch of the national legislature, to represent the States individually.

MR. WILSON.—If security is necessary to preserve the one it is equally so to preserve the other. How can the national government be secured against the States? Some regulation is necessary. Suppose the national government had a competent number in the State legislature. But where the one government clashed with the other the State government ought to yield, as the preservation of the general interest must be preferred to a particular. But let us try to designate the powers of each, and then no danger can be apprehended, nor can the general government be possessed of any ambitious views to encroach on the State rights.

MR. MADISON.—I could have wished that the gentleman from Connecticut had more accurately marked his objections to the Virginia plan. I apprehend the greatest danger is from the encroachment of the States on the national government. This apprehension is justly founded on the experience of ancient confederacies, and our own is a proof of it.

The right of negating, in certain instances, the State laws affords one security to the national government. But is the danger well founded? Have any State governments ever encroached on the corporate rights of cities? And if it was the case that the national government usurped the State government, if such usurpation was for the good of the whole, no mischief could arise. To draw the line between the two is a difficult task. I believe it cannot be done, and therefore I am inclined for a general government.

If we cannot form a general government, and the States become totally independent of each other, it would afford a melancholy prospect.

The second resolve was then put and carried—seven States for, three against, one divided.

The third resolve was then taken into consideration by the Convention.

After debate it was carried: 8 ayes, 2 noes, 1 State divided. The fourth resolution of the committee was now taken up.

MR. C. PINCKNEY.—There is more equality of rank and fortune in America than in any other country under the sun; and this is likely to continue as long as the unappropriated western lands remain unsettled. They are equal in rights, nor is extreme poverty to be seen in any part of the Union. If we are thus singularly situated, both as to fortune and rights, it evidently follows that we cannot draw any useful lessons from the examples of any of the European states or kingdoms; much less can Great Britain afford us any striking institution, which can be adapted to our own situation—unless we indeed intend to establish an hereditary executive, or one for life. Great Britain drew its first rude institutions from the forests of Germany, and with them that of its nobility. These having originally in their isfy the people. But a general government must not be dependent on the State governments.

The United States include a territory of about fifteen hundred miles in length, and in breadth about four hundred, the whole of which is divided into States and districts. While we were dependent on the Crown of Great Britain, it was in contemplation to form the whole into one; but it was found impracticable. No legislature could make good laws for the whole, nor can it now be done. It would necessarily place the power in the hands of the few nearest the seat of government. State governments must therefore remain, if you mean to prevent confusion. The general negative powers will support the general government. Upon these considerations I am led to form the second branch differently from the report. Their powers are important, and the number not too large, upon the principle of proportion. I have considered the subject with great attention; and I propose this plan¹ [reads it]; and if no better plan is proposed I will then move its adoption.

MR. WILSON.—The question now before us is whether the second branch of the general legislature shall, or shall not, be appointed by the State legislatures. In every point of view it is an important question. The magnitude of the objects is indeed embarrassing. The great system of Henry IV of France, aided by the greatest statesmen, is small when compared to the fabric we are now about to erect. In laying the stone amiss we may injure the superstructure; and what will be the consequence if the corner-stone should be loosely placed? It is improper that the State legislatures should have the power contemplated to be given them. A citizen of America may be considered in two points of view—as a citizen of the general government, and as a citizen of the particular State in which he may reside. We ought to consider in what character he acts in forming a general government. I am both a citizen of Pennsylvania and of the United States. I must therefore lay aside my State connections and act for the general good of the whole. We must forget our local habits and attachments. The general government should not depend on the State governments. This ought to be a leading distinction between the one and the other; nor ought the general government to be composed of an assemblage of different State governments. We have unanimously agreed to establish a general government—that the powers of peace, war, treaties, coinage, and regulation of commerce ought to reside in that government. And if we reason in this manner we shall soon see the hands the property of the state, the crown of Great Britain was obliged to yield to the claims of power which those large possessions enabled them to assert. The Commons were then too contemptible to form part of the national councils. Many parliaments were held without their being represented; until, in process of time, under the protection of the Crown, and forming distinct communities, they obtained some weight in the British government. From such discordant materials, brought casually together, those admirable checks and balances, now so much the boast of the British constitution, took their rise. But will we be able to copy from this original? Do not suppose that in the Confederation there are one hundred gentlemen of sufficient fortunes to establish a nobility; and the equality of others as to rank would never admit of the distinctions of nobility. I lay it therefore down as a settled principle that equality of condition is a leading axiom in our government. It may be said we must necessarily establish checks, lest one rank of people usurp the rights of another. Commerce can neither interfere with the government nor give a complexion to its councils. Can we copy from Greece or Rome? Have we their nobles or patricians? With them offices were open to few. The different ranks in the community formed opposite interests, and produced unceasing struggles and disputes. Can this apply to the free yeomanry of America? We surely differ from the whole. Our situation is unexampled; and it is in our power, on different grounds, to secure civil and religious liberty; and when we secure these we secure everything that is necessary to establish happiness. We cannot pretend to rival the European nations in their grandeur or power; nor is the situation of any two nations so exactly alike as that the one can adopt the regulations or government of the other. If we have any distinctions they may be divided into three classes:

1. Professional men. 2. Commercial men. 3. The landed interest.

The latter is the governing power of America, and the other two must ever be dependent on them. Will a national government suit them? No. The three orders have necessarily a mixed interest; and in that view—I repeat it again—the United States of America compose, in fact, but one order. The clergy and nobility of Great Britain can never be adopted by us. Our government must be made suitable to the people; and we are, perhaps, the only people in the world who ever had sense enough to appoint delegates to establish a general government. I believe that the propositions from Virginia, with some amendments, will sat-impropriety of interference of State governments with the general government. Equality of representation cannot be established if the second branch is elected by the State legislatures. When we are laying the foundation of a building which is to last for ages, and in which millions are interested, it ought to be well laid. If the national government does not act upon State prejudices State distinctions will be lost. I therefore move that the second branch of the legislature of the national government be elected by electors chosen by the people of the United States.

JUDGE ELLSWORTH.—I think the second branch of the general legislature ought to be elected agreeably to the report. The other way, it is said, will be more the choice of the people. The one mode is as much so as the other. No doubt every citizen of every State is interested in the State governments; and elect him in whatever manner you please, whenever he takes a seat in the general government, it will prevail in some shape or other. The State legislatures are more competent to make a judicious choice than the people at large. Instability pervades their choice. In the second branch of the general government we want wisdom and firmness. As to balances, where nothing can be balanced it is a perfect Utopian scheme. But still great advantages will result in having a second branch endowed with the qualifications I have mentioned. Their weight and wisdom may check the inconsiderate and hasty proceedings of the first branch.

I cannot see the force of the reasoning in attempting to detach the State governments from the general government. In that case, without a standing army, you cannot support the general government but on the pillars of the State governments. Are the larger States more energetic than the smaller? Massachusetts cannot support a government at the distance of one hundred miles from her capital without an army; and how long Virginia and Pennsylvania will support their governments it is difficult to say. Shall we proceed like unskilful workmen, and make use of timber which is too weak to build a first-rate ship? We know that the people of the States are strongly attached to their own constitutions. If you hold up a system of general government, destructive of their constitutional rights, they will oppose it. Some are of opinion that, if we cannot form a general government so as to destroy State governments, we ought at least to balance the one against the other. On the contrary, the only chance we have to support a general government is to draft it on the State governments. I want to proceed on this ground, as the safest, and I believe no other plan is practicable. In this way, and in this way only, can we rely on the confidence and support of the people.

MR. MASON.—All agree that a more efficient government is necessary. It is equally necessary to preserve the State governments, as they ought to have the means of self-defence. On the motion of Mr. Wilson, the only means they ought to have would be destroyed.

The question was put for postponing, in order to take into consideration the 8th resolve, and lost—7 noes, 4 ayes.

Question on the 1st clause in the 4th resolve—9 States for, 2 against it.

The question of the constitution of the Senate now came before the convention.

MR. READ moved that the term of "nine years" be inserted, in triennial rotation.

MR. MADISON.—We are now to determine whether the republican form shall be the basis of our government. I admit there is weight in the objection of the gentleman from South Carolina; but no plan can steer clear of objections. That great powers are to be given there is no doubt; and that those powers may be abused is equally true. It is also probable that members may lose their attachments to the States which sent them; yet the first branch will control them in many of their abuses. But we are now forming a body on whose wisdom we mean to rely, and their permanency in office secures a proper field in which they may exert their firmness and knowledge. Democratic communities may be unsteady, and be led to action by the impulse of the moment. Like individuals they may be sensible of their own weakness, and may desire the counsels and checks of friends, to guard them against the turbulence and weakness of unruly passions. Such are the various pursuits of this life that, in all civilized countries, the interest of a community will be divided. There will be debtors and creditors, and an unequal possession of property; and hence arise different views and different objects in government. This, indeed, is the groundwork of aristocracy, and we find it blended in every government, both ancient and modern. Even where titles have survived property we discover the noble beggar haughty and assuming.

The man who is possessed of wealth, who lolls on his sofa or rolls in his carriage, cannot judge of the wants or feelings of MR. GERRY.—It appears to me that the American people have the greatest aversion to monarchy; and the nearer our government approaches to it the less chance have we for their approbation. Can gentlemen suppose that the reported system can be approved of by them? Demagogues are the great pests of our government, and have occasioned most of our distresses. If four years are insufficient, a future convention may lengthen the time.

MR. WILSON.—The motion is now for nine years, and a triennial rotation. Every nation attends to its foreign intercourse; to support its commerce; to prevent foreign contempt; and to make war and peace. Our Senate will be possessed of these powers, and therefore ought to be dignified and permanent. What is the reason that Great Britain does not enter into a commercial treaty with us? Because Congress has not the power to enforce its observance. But give them those powers, and give them the stability proposed by the motion, and they will have more permanency than a monarchical government. The great objection of many is that this duration would give birth to views inconsistent with the interests of the Union. This can have no weight if the triennial rotation is adopted; and this plan may possibly tend to conciliate the minds of the members of the convention on this subject, which have varied more than on any other question.

The question was then put on Mr. Read's motion, and lost—8 noes, 3 ayes.

The question on five years and a biennial rotation was carried—7 ayes, 4 noes.

The 5th resolve, that each house have the right of originating bills, was taken into consideration, and agreed to.

The 6th resolve was postponed, in order to take into consideration the 7th and 8th resolves. The 1st clause of the 7th, which respected the suffrage of each State in the first branch of the legislature, was proposed for consideration. Says Judge Yates:

MR. MARTIN, the attorney-general from Maryland, spoke on this subject upward of three hours. As his arguments were too diffuse, and in many instances desultory, it was not possible to trace him through the whole, the day-laborer. The government we mean to erect is intended to last for ages. The landed interest, at present, is prevalent; but in process of time, when we approximate to the states and kingdoms of Europe—when the number of landholders shall be comparatively small, through the various means of trade and manufactures—will not the landed interest be overbalanced in future elections? and, unless wisely provided against, what will become of your government? In England, at this day, if elections were open to all classes of people, the property of landed proprietors would be insecure. An agrarian law would soon take place. If these observations be just our government ought to secure the permanent interests of the country against innovation. Landholders ought to have a share in the government, to support these invaluable interests, and to balance and check the other. They ought to be so constituted as to protect the minority of the opulent against the majority. The Senate, therefore, ought to be this body; and, to answer these purposes, they ought to have permanency and stability. Various have been the propositions; but my opinion is, the longer they continue in office, the better will these views be answered.

MR. HAMILTON.—This question has already been considered in several points of view. We are now forming a republican government. Real liberty is neither found in despotism nor the extremes of democracy, but in moderate governments.

Those who mean to form a solid republican government ought to proceed to the confines of another government. As long as offices are open to all men, and no constitutional rank is established, it is pure republicanism. But if we incline too much to democracy we shall soon shoot into a monarchy. The difference of property is already great among us. Commerce and industry will still increase the disparity. Your government must meet this state of things, or combinations will, in process of time, undermine your system. What was the tribunitial power of Rome? It was instituted by the plebeians, as a guard against the patricians. But was this a sufficient check? No. The only distinction which remained at Rome was, at last, between the rich and poor. The gentleman from Connecticut forgets that the democratic body is already secure in a representation. As to Connecticut, what were the little objects of their government before the revolution? Colonial concerns merely. They ought now to act on a more extended scale; and dare they do this? Dare they collect the taxes and requisitions of Congress? Such a government may do well if they do not tax; and this is precisely their situation.

or to methodize his ideas into a systematic or argumentative arrangement. I shall therefore note only such points as I conceive merit most particular notice.

The question is important (said Mr. Martin), and I have already expressed my sentiments on the subject. My opinion is that the general government ought to protect and secure the State governments. Others, however, are of a different sentiment, and reverse the principle.

The present reported system is a perfect medley of confederated and national government, without example and without precedent. Many, who wish the general government to protect the State governments, are anxious to have the line of jurisdiction well drawn and defined, so that they may not clash. This suggests the necessity of having this line well detailed; possibly this may be done. If we do this the people will be convinced that we meant well to the State governments; and should there be any defects they will trust a future convention with the power of making further amendments.

A general government may operate on individuals in cases of general concern, and still be federal. This distinction is with the States, as States, represented by the people of those States. States will take care of their internal police and local concerns. The general government has no interest but the protection of the whole. Every other movement must fail. We are proceeding, in forming this government, as if there were no State governments at all. The States must approve, or you will have none at all. I have never heard of a confederacy having two legislative branches. Even the celebrated Mr. Adams, who talks so much of checks and balances, does not suppose it necessary in a confederacy. Public and domestic debts are our great distress. The treaty between Virginia and Maryland, about the navigation of the Chesapeake and Potomac, is no infraction of the Confederacy. The corner-stone of a federal government is equality of votes. States may surrender this right; but if they do their liberties are lost. If I err on this point it is the error of the head, not of the heart.

The first principle of government is founded on the natural rights of individuals, and in perfect equality. Locke, Vattel, Lord Somers, and Dr. Priestley all confirm this principle. This principle of equality, when applied to an individual, is lost, in some degree, when he becomes a member of a society, to which it is transferred; and this society, by the name of state or kingdom, is, with respect to others, again on a perfect footing of equality —a right to govern themselves as they please. Nor can any other state, of right, deprive them of this equality. If such a state confederates it is intended for the good of the whole; and if it again confederates those rights must be well guarded. Nor can any state demand a surrender of any of those rights; if it can, equality is already destroyed. We must treat, as free states, with each other, upon the same terms of equality that men originally formed themselves into societies. Vattel, Rutherford, and Locke are united in support of the position, that states, as to each other, are in a state of nature.

Thus, says Mr. Martin, have I traveled with the most respectable authorities in support of principles all tending to prove the equality of independent states. This is equally applicable to the smallest as well as the largest states, on the true principles of reciprocity and political freedom.

Unequal confederacies can never produce good effects. Apply this to the Virginia plan. Out of the number 90 Virginia has 16 votes, Massachusetts 14, Pennsylvania 12; in all 42. Add to this a State having four votes, and it gives a majority in the general legislature. Consequently, a combination of these States will govern the remaining nine or ten States. Where are the safety and independency of those States? Pursue this subject farther. The executive is to be appointed by the legislature, and becomes the executive in consequence of this undue influence; and hence flows the appointment of all your officers, civil, military, and judicial. The executive is also to have a negative on all laws. Suppose the possibility of a combination of ten States: he negatives a law; it is totally lost, because those States cannot form two-thirds of the legislatures. I am willing to give up private interest to the public good; but I must be satisfied first that it is the public interest; and who can decide this point? A majority, only, of the Union.

The Lacedemonians insisted, in the Amphictyonic council, to exclude some of the smaller states from a right to vote, in order that they might tyrannize over them. If the plan now on the table be adopted three States in the Union have the control, and they may make use of their power when they please.

If there exist no separate interests there is no danger in an equality of votes; and if there be danger the smaller States cannot yield. If the foundation of the existing Confederation is well laid powers may be added. You may safely add a third story to a house where the foundation is good. Read, then, the votes and proceedings of Congress on forming the Confederation. Virginia only was opposed to the principles of equality.

legislatures, will be called upon for approbation—with an evident design to separate the interest of the governors from the governed. What must be the consequence? Anarchy and confusion. We lose the idea of the powers with which we are intrusted. The legislatures must approve.

By them it must, on your own plan, be laid before the people. How will such a government, over so many great States, operate? Wherever new settlements have been formed in large States they immediately want to shake off their dependency. Why? Because the government is too remote for their good. The people want it nearer home.

The basis of all ancient and modern confederacies is the freedom and the independency of the states composing it. The states forming the Amphictyonic council were equal, though Lacedemon, one of the greatest states, attempted the exclusion of three of the lesser states from this right. The plan reported, it is true, only intends to diminish those rights, not to annihilate them. It was the ambition and power of the great Grecian states which at last ruined their respectable council. The states, as societies, are ever respectable. Has Holland or Switzerland ever complained of the equality of the states which compose their respective confederacies? Berne and Zurich are larger than the remaining eleven cantons. So of many of the states of Germany; and yet their governments are not complained of. Berne alone might usurp the whole power of the Helvetic confederacy, but she is contented still with being equal.

The admission of the larger States into the Confederation, on the principles of equality, is dangerous. But on the Virginia system it is ruinous and destructive. Still it is the true interest of all the States to confederate. It is their joint efforts which must protect and secure us from foreign danger, and give us peace and harmony at home.

Here Mr. Martin entered into a detail of the comparative powers of each State, and stated their probable weakness and strength.

At the beginning of our troubles with Great Britain the smaller States were attempted to be cajoled to submit to the views of that nation, lest the larger States should usurp their rights. We then answered them, Your present plan is slavery, which, on the remote prospect of a distant evil, we will not submit to.

I would rather confederate with any single State than submit

The smaller States yielded rights, not the large States. They gave up their claim to the unappropriated lands with the tenderness of the mother recorded by Solomon. They sacrificed affection to the preservation of others. New Jersey and Maryland rendered more essential services during the war than many of the larger States. The partial representation in Congress is not the cause of its weakness, but the want of power. I would not trust a government, organized upon the reported plan, for all the slaves of Carolina, or the horses and oxen of Massachusetts. Price says that laws made by one man, or a set of men, and not by common consent, is slavery. And it is so when applied to States, if you give them an unequal representation. What are called human feelings, in this instance, are only the feelings of ambition and the lust of power.

On federal grounds it is said that a minority will govern a majority; but on the Virginia plan a minority would tax a majority. In a federal government a majority of States must and ought to tax. In local government of States counties may be unequal: still numbers, not property, govern. What is the government now forming—over States or persons? As to the latter, their rights cannot be the object of a general government. These are already secured by their guardians, the State governments. The general government is, therefore, intended only to protect and guard the rights of the States as states.

This general government, I believe, is the first upon earth which gives checks against democracies or aristocracies. The only necessary check, in a general government, ought to be a restraint to prevent its absorbing the powers of the State governments. Representation, on federal principles, can only flow from State societies. Representation and taxation are ever inseparable—not according to the quantum of property, but the quantum of freedom.

Will the representatives of a State forget State interests? The mode of election cannot change it. These prejudices cannot be eradicated. Your general government cannot be just or equal, upon the Virginia plan, unless you abolish State interests. If this cannot be done, you must go back to principles purely federal.

On this latter ground the State legislatures and their constituents will have no interests to pursue different from the general government, and both will be interested to support each other.

Under these ideas, can it be expected that the people can approve the Virginia plan? But it is said the people, not the State to the Virginia plan. But we are already confederated, and no power on earth can dissolve it but by the consent of all the contracting powers; and four States, on this floor, have already declared their opposition to annihilate it. Is the old Confederation dissolved, because some of the States wish a new Confederation?

MR. LANSING.—I move that the word "not" be struck out of the resolve, and then the question will stand on its proper ground; and the resolution will read thus: that the representation of the first branch be according to the Articles of the Confederation; and the sense of the convention on this point will determine the question of a federal or national government.

MR. MADISON.—I am against the motion. I confess the necessity of harmonizing; and if it could be shown that the system is unjust or unsafe, I would be against it. There has been much fallacy in the argument advanced by the gentleman from Maryland. He has, without advertent to many manifest distinctions, considered confederacies and treaties as standing on the same basis. In the one the powers act collectively, in the other individually. Suppose, for example, that France, Spain, and some of the smaller states in Europe should treat on war or peace, or on any other general concern; it would be done on principles of equality. But if they were to form a plan of general government, would they give, or are the greater states obliged to give to the lesser, the same and equal legislative powers? Surely not. They might differ on this point, but no one can say that the large states were wrong in refusing this concession. Nor can the gentleman's reasoning apply to the present powers of Congress; for they may, and do, in some cases, affect property—and in case of war the lives of the citizens. Can any of the lesser States be endangered by an adequate representation? Where is the probability of a combination? What the inducements? Where is the similarity of customs, manners, or religion? If there possibly can be a diversity of interest it is the case of the three large States. Their situation is remote, their trade different. The staple of Massachusetts is fish, and the carrying trade; of Pennsylvania, wheat and flour; of Virginia, tobacco. Can States thus situated in trade ever form such a combination? Do we find those combinations in the larger counties in the different State governments to produce rivalships? Does not the history of the nations of the earth verify it? Rome rivaled Carthage, and could not be satisfied before she was destroyed. The houses of Austria and Bourbon acted on the same view; and the wars of France and England have been waged through rivalry; and let me add that we, in a great measure, owe our independency to be disgraced, through little party views. I move that we have prayers every morning.

DR. JOHNSON.—States are political societies. For whom are we to form a government? for the people of America, or for those societies? Undoubtedly for the latter. They must, therefore, have a voice in the second branch of the general government if you mean to preserve their existence. The people already compose the first branch. This mixture is proper and necessary; for we cannot form a general government on any other ground.

JUDGE READ.—I would have no objection, if the government was more national; but the proposed plan is so great a mixture of both that it is best to drop it altogether. A State government is incompatible with a general government. If it was more national I would be for a representation proportionate to population.

MR. WILSON.—Some gentlemen are afraid that the plan is not sufficiently national, while others, that it is too much so. If this point of representation was once well fixed we would come nearer to one another in sentiment. The necessity would then be discovered of circumscribing more effectually the State governments, and enlarging the bounds of the general government. Some contend that States are sovereign, when in fact they are only political societies. There is a gradation of power in all societies, from the lowest corporation to the highest sovereign. The States never possessed the essential rights of sovereignty. These were always vested in Congress. Their voting, as States, in Congress, is no evidence of sovereignty. The State of Maryland voted by counties. Did this make the counties sovereign? The States, at present, are only great corporations, having the power of making by-laws, and these are effectual only if they are not contradictory to the general Confederation. The States ought to be placed under control of the general government—at least as much so as they formerly were under the King and British Parliament. The arguments, I observe, have taken a different turn, and I hope may tend to convince all of the necessity of a strong energetic government, which would equally tend to give energy to and protect the State governments. What was the origin of the military establishment of Europe? It was the jealousy which one state or kingdom entertained of another. This jealousy was productive of evil. In Rome the patricians were often obliged to excite a foreign war to divert the attention of the plebeians from encroaching on the senatorial rights. In England and France perhaps this jealousy may give energy to those national contending passions. France, through this motive, joined us. She might, perhaps, with less expense, have induced England to divide America between them. In Greece the contention was ever between the larger states. Sparta against Athens—and these again, occasionally, against Thebes—were ready to devour each other. Germany presents the same prospects—Prussia against Austria. Do the greater provinces in Holland endanger the liberties of the lesser? And let me remark that the weaker you make your confederation, the greater the danger to the lesser States. They can only be protected by a strong federal government. Those gentlemen who oppose the Virginia plan do not sufficiently analyze the subject. Their remarks, in general, are vague and inconclusive.

MR. WILLIAMSON.—If any argument will admit of demonstration, it is that which declares that all men have an equal right in society. Against this position, I have heard, as yet, no argument; and I could wish to hear what could be said against it. What is tyranny? Representatives of representatives, if you give them the power of taxation. From equals take equals, and the remainder is equal. What process is to annihilate smaller States I know not. But I know it must be tyranny, if the smaller States can tax the greater, in order to ease themselves. A general government cannot exercise direct taxation. Money must be raised by duties and imposts, etc., and this will operate equally. It is impossible to tax according to numbers. Can a man over the mountains, where produce is a drug, pay equal with one near the shore?

MR. WILSON.—I should be glad to hear the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Martin] explain himself upon the remark on Old Sarum, when compared with the city of London. He has allowed this to be an unjust proportion; as in the one place one man sends two members, and in the other one million are represented by four members. I would be glad to hear how he applies this to the larger and smaller States in America; and whether the borough, as a borough, is represented, or the people of the borough.

MR. MARTIN rose to explain. Individuals, as composing a part of the whole of one consolidated government, are there represented.

GOV. FRANKLIN read some remarks acknowledging the difficulties of the present subject. Neither ancient nor modern history (said Gov. Franklin) can give us light. As a sparrow does not fall without divine permission, can we suppose that governments can be erected without his will? We shall, I am afraid, their governments, and contribute to their existence. But a state of danger is like a state of war, and it unites the various parts of the government to exertion. May not our distractions, however, invite danger from abroad? If the power is not immediately derived from the people, in proportion to their numbers, we may make a paper confederacy, but that will be all. We know the effects of the old Confederation, and without a general government this will be like the former.

MR. HAMILTON.—The course of my experience in human affairs might perhaps restrain me from saying much on this subject. I shall, however, give birth to some of the observations I have made during the course of this debate. The gentleman from Maryland has been at great pains to establish positions which are not denied. Many of them, as drawn from the best writers on government, are become almost self-evident principles. But I doubt the propriety of his application of those principles in the present discussion. He deduces from them the necessity that states entering into a confederacy must retain the equality of votes. This position cannot be correct. Facts plainly contradict it. The Parliament of Great Britain asserted a supremacy over the whole empire; and the celebrated Judge Blackstone labors for the legality of it, although many parts were not represented. This parliamentary power we opposed as contrary to our colonial rights. With that exception, throughout that whole empire, it is submitted to. May not the smaller and greater States so modify their respective rights as to establish the general interest of the whole, without adhering to the right of equality? Strict representation is not observed in any of the State governments. The Senate of New York are chosen by persons of certain qualifications, to the exclusion of others. The question, after all is, Is it our interest, in modifying this general government, to sacrifice individual rights to the preservation of the rights of an artificial being, called states? There can be no truer principle than this—that every individual of the community at large has an equal right to the protection of government. If, therefore, three States contain a majority of the inhabitants of America, ought they to be governed by a minority? Would the inhabitants of the great States ever submit to this? If the smaller States maintain this principle, through a love of power, will not the larger, from the same motive, be equally tenacious to preserve their power? They are to surrender their rights: for what?—for the preservation of an artificial being. We propose a free government. Can it be so if partial distinctions are maintained? I agree with the gentleman from Delaware that, if the State governments are to act in the general government, it affords the strongest reason for exclusion. In the State of New York five counties form a majority of representatives, and yet the government is in no danger, because the laws have a general operation. The small States exaggerate their danger, and on this ground contend for an unproportion of power. But their danger is increased if the larger States will not submit to it. Where will they form new alliances for their support? Will they do this with foreign powers? Foreigners are jealous of our increasing greatness, and would rejoice in our distractions. Those who have had opportunities of conversing with foreigners respecting sovereigns in Europe have discovered in them an anxiety for the preservation of our democratic governments, probably for no other reason but to keep us weak. Unless your government is respectable foreigners will invade your rights; and to maintain tranquillity you must be respectable; even to observe neutrality you must have a strong government. I confess our present situation is critical. We have just finished a war which has established our independence, and loaded us with a heavy debt. We have still every motive to unite for our common defence. Our people are disposed to have a good government; but this disposition may not always prevail. It is difficult to amend confederations. It has been attempted in vain, and it is perhaps a miracle that we are now met. We must therefore improve the opportunity, and render the present system as perfect as possible. Their good sense, and, above all, the necessity of their affairs, will induce the people to adopt it.

MR. GERRY.—It appears to me that the States never were independent; they had only corporate rights. Confederations are a mongrel kind of government, and the world does not afford a precedent to go by. Aristocracy is the worst kind of government, and I would sooner submit to a monarchy. We must have a system that will execute itself.

The question was then put on Mr. Lansing's motion, and lost—4 ayes, 6 noes, 1 State divided.

Question on the clause—6 ayes, 4 noes, and 1 State divided.

JUDGE ELLSWORTH.—I move that the consideration of the 8th resolve be postponed. Carried—9 ayes, 2 noes.

I now move the following amendment to the resolve—that, in the second branch, each State have an equal vote. I confess that the effect of this motion is to make the general government partly federal and partly national. This will secure tranquillity, and still make it efficient; and it will meet the objections of the larger States. In taxes they will have a proportional weight in the first branch of the general legislature. If the great States refuse this plan we will be forever separated. Even in the executive the larger States have ever had influence. The province of Holland ever had it. If all the states are to exist they must necessarily have an equal vote in the general government. Small communities, when associating with greater, can only be supported by an equality of votes. I have always found, in my reading and experience, that in all societies the governors are ever gradually rising into power.

The large States, although they may not have a common interest for combination, yet they may be partially attached to each other for mutual support and advancement. This can be more easily effected than the union of the remaining small States to check it; and ought we not to regard antecedent plighted faith to the Confederation already entered into, and by the terms of it declared to be perpetual? And it is not yet obvious to me that the States will depart from this ground. When in the hour of common danger we united as equals, shall it now be urged by some that we must depart from this principle when the danger is over? Will the world say that this is just? We then associated as free and independent States, and were well satisfied. To perpetuate that independence I wish to establish a national legislature, executive and judiciary; for under these we shall, I doubt not, preserve peace and harmony. Nor would I be surprised (although we made the general government the most perfect, in our opinion) that it should hereafter require amendment. But at present this is as far as I possibly can go. If this convention only chalk out lines of good government we shall do well.

MR. BALDWIN.—It appears to be agreed that the government we should adopt ought to be energetic and formidable, yet I would guard against the danger of being too formidable. The second branch ought not to be elected as the first. Suppose we take the example of the Constitution of Massachusetts, as it is commended for its goodness. There the first branch represents the people, and the second its property.

MR. MADISON.—I would always exclude inconsistent principles in framing a system of government. The difficulty of getting its defects amended are great, and sometimes insurmountable. The Virginia State government was the first which was made; and, though its defects are evident to every person, we cannot get it amended. The Dutch have made four several attempts to amend their system, without success. The few alterations made in it were by tumult and faction, and for the worse. If there was real danger I would give the smaller States the defensive weapons. But there is none from that quarter. The great danger to our general government is the great southern and northern interests of the continent being opposed to each other. Look to the votes in Congress, and most of them stand divided by the geography of the country, not according to the size of the States.

Suppose the first branch granted money; may not the second branch, from State views, counteract the first? In Congress the single State of Delaware prevented an embargo, at the time that all the other States thought it absolutely necessary for the support of the army. Other powers, and those very essential, besides the legislative, will be given to the second branch—such as the negating all State laws. I would compromise on this question, if I could do it on correct principles, but otherwise not. If the old fabric of the Confederation must be the groundwork of the new we must fail.

MR. WILSON.—The question now before us is of so much consequence that I cannot give it a silent vote. Gentlemen have said that, if this amendment is not agreed to, a separation to the north of Pennsylvania may be the consequence. This staggers me neither in my sentiments nor my duty. If a minority should refuse their assent to the new plan of a general government, and if they will have their own will, and without it separate the Union, let it be done; but we shall stand supported by stronger and better principles. The opposition to this plan is as 22 to 90, in the general scale—not quite a fourth part of the Union. Shall three-fourths of the Union surrender their rights for the support of that artificial being called State interest? If we must join issue, I am willing. I cannot consent that one-fourth shall control the power of three-fourths.

If the motion is adopted seven States will control the whole, and the lesser seven compose 24 out of 90. One-third must control two-thirds—24 overrule 66. For whom do we form a Constitution? For men, or for imaginary beings called States—a mere metaphysical distinction? Will a regard to State rights justify the sacrifice of the rights of men? If we proceed on any other foundation than the last our building will neither be solid nor lasting. Weight and numbers is the only true principle: every other is local, confined, or imaginary. Much has been said of the danger of the three larger States combining together to give rise to monarchy or an aristocracy. Let the probability of this combination be explained, and it will be found that a rival-ship, rather than a confederacy, will exist among them. Is there a single point in which this interest coincides? Supposing that the executive should be selected from one of the larger States; can the other two be gratified? Will not this be a source of jealousy among them; and will they not separately court the interest of the smaller States, to counteract the views of a favorite rival? How can aristocracy arise from this combination, more than among the smaller States? On the contrary, the present claims of the smaller States lead directly to the establishment of an aristocracy, which is the government of the few over the many; and the Connecticut proposal removes only a small part of the objection. There are only two kinds of bad government—the one, which does too much, and therefore oppressive, and the other, which does too little, and therefore weak. Congress partakes of the latter, and the motion will leave us in the same situation, and as much fettered as ever we were. The people see its weakness, and would be mortified in seeing our inability to correct it.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Baldwin] has doubts how to vote on this question, and wishes some qualification made. I admit there ought to be some difference as to the numbers in the second branch; and perhaps there are other distinctions which could, with propriety, be introduced; such, for example, as the qualifications of the elected, etc. However, if there are leading principles in the system which we adopt, much may be done in the detail. We all aim at giving the general Government more energy. The State governments are necessary and valuable. No liberty can be obtained without them. On this question depend the essential rights of the general Government and of the people.

JUDGE ELLSWORTH.—I have the greatest respect for the gentleman who spoke last. I respect his abilities, although I differ from him on many points. He asserts that the general government must depend on the equal suffrage of the people. But will this not put it in the power of the few States to control the rest? It is a novel thing in politics that the few control the many. In the British government the few, as a guard, have an equal share in the government. The House of Lords, although few in number, and sitting in their own right, have an equal share in the legislature. They cannot give away the property of the community, but they can prevent the Commons from being too lavish in their gifts. Where is, or was, a confederation ever formed, where equality of voices was not a fundamental principle? Mankind are apt to go from one extreme to another; and, because we have found defects in the Confederation, must we therefore pull down the whole fabric, foundation and all, in order to erect a new building, totally different from it, without retaining any of its materials? What are its defects? It is said equality of votes has embarrassed us. But how? Would the real evils of our situation have been cured had this not been the case? Would the proposed amendment on the Virginia plan, as to representation, have relieved us? I fancy not. Rhode Island has been often quoted as a small State, and by its refusal once defeated the grant of the impost. Whether she was right in doing so is not the question; but was it a federal requisition? And if it was not, she did not, in this instance, defeat a federal measure.

If the larger States seek security, they have it fully in the first branch of the general government. But can we turn the tables, and say that the lesser States are equally secure? In commercial regulations they will unite. If policy should require free ports they would be found at Boston, Philadelphia, and Alexandria. In the disposition of lucrative offices they would unite. But I ask no surrender of any of the rights of the great States; nor do I plead duress in the makers of the old Confederation, nor suppose they soothed the danger, in order to resume their rights when the danger was over. No; small States must possess the power of self-defence, or be ruined. Will any one say there is no diversity of interests in the States? And, if there is, should not those interests be guarded and secured? But if there is none, then the large States have nothing to apprehend from an equality of rights. And let it be remembered that these remarks are not the result of partial or local views. The State I represent is respectable, and in importance holds a middle rank.

MR. MADISON.—Notwithstanding the admirable and close reasoning of the gentleman who spoke last, I am not yet convinced that my former remarks are not well founded. I apprehend that he is mistaken as to the fact on which he builds one of his arguments. He supposes that equality of votes is the principle on which all confederacies are formed. That of Lycia, so justly applauded by the celebrated Montesquieu, was different. He also appeals to our good faith for the observance of the confederacy. We know we have found one inadequate to the purposes for which it was made. Why then adhere to a system which is proved to be so remarkably defective? I have impeached a number of States for the infraction of the Confederation; and I have not even spared my own State, nor can I justly spare his. Did not Connecticut refuse her compliance to the federal requisition? Has she paid, for the two last years, any money into the Contimental treasury? And does this look like government, or the observance of a solemn compact? Experience shows that the Confederation is radically defective; and we must, in a new national government, guard against those defects. Although the large States in the first branch have weight proportionate to their population, yet, as the smaller States have an equal vote in the second branch, they will be able to control and leave the larger without any essential benefit. As peculiar powers are intended to be granted to the second branch, such as the negating State laws, etc., unless the larger States have a proportionate weight in the representation they cannot be more secure.

MR. WILSON.—I think the second branch ought not to be numerous. I will propose an expedient: Let there be one member for every 100,000 souls, and the smallest States not less than one member each. This would give about twenty-six members. I make this proposal, not because I belong to a large State, but in order to pull down a rotten house, and lay a foundation for a new building. To give additional weight to an old building is to hasten its ruin.

GOV. FRANKLIN.—The smaller States, by this motion, would have the power of giving away the money of the greater States. There ought to be some difference between the first and second branches. Many expedients have been proposed, and, I am sorry to remark, without effect. A joiner, when he wants to fit two boards, takes off with his plane the uneven parts from each side, and thus they fit. Let us do the same. We are all met to do something.

I shall propose an expedient: Let the Senate be elected by the States equally; in all acts of sovereignty and authority let the votes be equally taken—the same in the appointment of all officers, and salaries; but in passing of laws each State shall have a right of suffrage in proportion to the sums they respectively contribute. Among merchants, where a ship has many owners, her destination is determined in that proportion. I have been one of the ministers to France from this country during the war, and we should have been very glad if they would have permitted us a vote in the distribution of the money to carry on the war.

MR. BEDFORD.—That all the States at present are equally sovereign and independent has been asserted from every quarter of this house. Our deliberations here are a confirmation of the position; and I may add to it that each of them acts from interested, and many from ambitious, motives. Look at the votes which have been given on the floor of this house, and it will be found that their numbers, wealth, and local views have actuated their determinations; and that the larger States proceed as if our eyes were already perfectly blinded. Impartiality, with them, is already out of the question; the reported plan is their political creed, and they support it, right or wrong. Even the diminutive State of Georgia has an eye to her future wealth and greatness. South Carolina, puffed up with the possession of her wealth and negroes, and North Carolina, are all, from different views, united with the great States. And these latter, although it is said they can never, from interested views, form a coalition, we find closely united in one scheme of interest and ambition (notwithstanding they endeavor to amuse us with the purity of their principle and the rectitude of their intentions) in asserting that the general government must be drawn from an equal representation of the people. Pretences to support ambition are never wanting. Their cry is, Where is the danger? and they insist that although the powers of the general government will be increased, yet it will be for the good of the whole; and, although the three great States form nearly a majority of the people of America, they never will hurt or injure the lesser States. I do not, gentlemen, trust you. If you possess the power, the abuse of it could not be checked; and what, then, would prevent you from exercising it to our destruction? You gravely allege that there is no danger of combination, and triumphantly ask, "How could combinations be effected? The large States," you say, "all differ in productions and commerce; and experience shows that, instead of combinations, they would be rivals, and counteract the views of one another." This, I repeat, is language calculated only to amuse us. Yes, sir, the larger States will be rivals, but not against each other—they will be rivals against the rest of the States. But it is urged that such a government would suit the people, and that its principles are equitable and just. How often has this argument been refuted, when applied to a federal government! The small States never can agree to the Virginia plan; and why, then, is it still urged? But it is said that it is not expected that the State governments will approve the proposed system, and that this House must directly carry it to the people for their approbation! Is it come to this, then, that the sword must decide this controversy, and that the horrors of war must be added to the rest of our misfortunes? But what have the people already said? "We find the Confederation defective. Go, and give additional powers to the Confederation—give to it the imposts, regulation of trade, power to collect the taxes, and the means to discharge our foreign and domestic debts."

Can we not, then, as their delegates, agree upon these points? As their ambassadors, can we not clearly grant those powers? Why, then, when we are met, must entire distinct and new grounds be taken, and a government of which the people had no idea be instituted? And are we to be told, if we won't agree to it, it is the last moment of our deliberations? I say, it is indeed the last moment, if we do not agree to this assumption of power. The States will never again be entrapped into a measure like this. The people will say, The small States would confederate, and grant further powers to Congress; but you, the large States, would not. Then the fault would be yours, and all the nations of the earth will justify us. But what is to become of our public debts, if we dissolve the Union? Where is your plighted faith? Will you crush the smaller States, or must they be left unmolested? Sooner than be ruined, there are foreign powers who will take us by the hand.

I say not this to threaten or intimidate, but that we should reflect seriously before we act. If we once leave this floor, and solemnly renounce your new project, what will be the consequence? You will annihilate your federal government, and ruin must stare you in the face. Let us, then, do what is in our power—amend and enlarge the Confederation, but not alter the federal system. The people expect this, and no more. We all agree in the necessity of a more efficient government—and cannot this be done? Although my State is small, I know and respect its rights, as much, at least, as those who have the honor to represent any of the larger States.

MR. KING.—I am in sentiment with those who wish the preservation of State governments; but the general Government may be so constituted as to effect it. Let the Constitution we are about forming be considered as a commission under which the general government shall act, and as such it will be the guardian of the State rights. The rights of Scotland are secure from all danger and encroachments, although in the Parliament she has a small representation. May not this be done in our general Government? Since I am up, I am concerned for what fell from the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. Bedford]—"Take a foreign power by the hand!" I am sorry he mentioned it, and I hope he is able to excuse it to himself on the score of passion. Whatever may be my distress, I never will court a foreign power to assist in relieving myself from it.

The question was put on Ellsworth's motion—5 ayes, 5 noes, 1 State divided. So the amendment was lost.

Mr. C. PINCKNEY.—As a professional man, I might say that there is no weight in the argument adduced in favor of the motion on which we are divided; but candor obliges me to own that equality of suffrage in the States is wrong. Prejudices will prevail, and they have an equal weight in the larger as in the smaller States. There is a solid distinction, as to interest, between the Southern and Northern States. To destroy the ill effects thereof, I renew the motion which I made in the early stage of this business. (See page 323.)

Gen. C. C. Pinckney moved for a select committee to take into consideration both branches of the legislature.

Mr. MARTIN.—It is again attempted to compromise. You must give each State an equal suffrage, or our business is at an end.

Mr. SHERMAN.—It seems we have got to a point that we cannot move one way or the other. Such a committee is necessary to set us right.

Mr. G. MORRIS.—The two branches, so equally poised, cannot have their due weight. It is confessed, on all hands, that the second branch ought to be a check on the first; for without its having this effect it is perfectly useless. The first branch, originating from the people, will ever be subject to precipitancy, changeability, and excess. Experience evinces the truth of this remark, without having recourse to reading. This can only be checked by ability and virtue in the second branch. On your present system, can you suppose that one branch will possess it more than the other? The second branch ought to be composed of men of great and established property—aristocracy; men who, from pride, will support consistency and permanency; and to make them completely independent they must be chosen for life, or they will be a useless body. Such an aristocratic body will keep down the turbulence of democracy. But if you elect them for a shorter period they will be only a name, and we had better be without them. Thus constituted, I hope they will show us the weight of aristocracy.

History proves, I admit, that the men of large property will uniformly endeavor to establish tyranny. How, then, shall we ward off this evil? Give them the second branch and you secure their weight for the public good. They become responsible for their conduct, and this lust of power will ever be checked by the democratic branch, and thus form a stability in your government. But if we continue changing our measures by the breadth of an unequal representation in the second branch, may not a check be found in the appointment of one executive, by electing him by an equality of State votes? He must have the right of interposing between the two branches, and this might give a reasonable security to the smaller States. Not one of the lesser States can exist by itself; and a dissolution of the Confederation, I confess, would produce contentions as well in the larger as in the smaller States. The principle of self-preservation induces me to seek for a government that will be stable and secure.

The motion was then put to appoint a committee to report upon the 8th resolve, and so much of the 7th as had not been agreed to. The motion was carried—9 States against 2.

The grand committee met on July 3. Mr. Gerry was chosen chairman. Says Judge Yates:

The committee proceeded to consider in what manner they should discharge the business with which they were intrusted. By the proceedings in the convention they were so equally divided on the important question of representation in the two branches, that the idea of a conciliatory adjustment must have been in contemplation of the house in the appointment of this committee. But still, how to effect this salutary purpose was the question. Many of the members, impressed with the utility of a general government, connected with it the indispensable necessity of a representation from the States according to their numbers and wealth; while others, equally tenacious of the rights of the States, would admit of no other representation but such as was strictly federal, or, in other words, equality of suffrage. This brought on a discussion of the principles on which the house had divided, and a lengthy recapitulation of the arguments advanced in the house in support of these opposite propositions. As I had not openly explained my sentiments on any former occasion on this question, but constantly, in giving my vote, showed by attachment to the national government on federal principles, I took this occasion to explain my motives.

These remarks gave rise to a motion of Dr. Franklin, which after some modification, was agreed to, and made the basis of the following report of the committee:

democracy, who will confide in our engagements? Who will trust us? Ask any person whether he reposes any confidence in the government of Congress, or that of the State of Pennsylvania, he will readily answer you, No. Ask him the reason, and he will tell you it is because he has no confidence in their stability.

You intend also that the second branch shall be incapable of holding any office in the general government. It is a dangerous expedient. They ought to have every inducement to be interested in your government. Deprive them of this right, and they will become inattentive to your welfare. The wealthy will ever exist; and you never can be safe unless you gratify them, as a body, in the pursuit of honor and profit. Prevent them by positive institutions, and they will proceed in some left-handed way. A son may want a place—you mean to prevent him from promotion. They are not to be paid for their services; they will in some way pay themselves; nor is it in your power to prevent it. It is good policy that men of property be collected in one body, to give them one common influence in your government. Let vacancies be filled up, as they happen, by the executive. Besides, it is of little consequence, on this plan, whether the States are equally represented or not. If the State governments have the division of many of the loaves and fishes, and the general government few, it cannot exist. This Senate would be one of the baubles of the general government. If you choose them for seven years, whether chosen by the people or the States, whether by equal suffrage or in any other proportion, how will they be a check? They will still have local and State prejudices. A government by compact is no government at all. You may as well go back to your congressional federal government, where, in the character of ambassadors, they may form treaties for each State.

I avow myself the advocate of a strong government; still I admit that the influence of the rich must be guarded; and a pure democracy is equally oppressive to the lower order of the community. This remark is founded on the experience of history. We are a commercial people, and as such will be obliged to engage in European politics. Local government cannot apply to the general government. These latter remarks I throw out only for the consideration of the committee who are to be appointed.

Gov. RANDOLPH.—I am in favor of appointing a committee; but, considering the warmth exhibited in debate, I have, I confess, no great hopes that any good will arise from it. Cannot a remedy be devised? If there is danger to the lesser States, from

The committee to whom was referred the 8th resolution reported from the committee of the whole house, and so much of the 7th as had not been decided on, submit the following report:

"That the subsequent propositions be recommended to the convention, on condition that both shall be generally adopted.

"That, in the first branch of the legislature, each of the States now in the Union be allowed one member for every 40,000 inhabitants of the description reported in the 7th resolution of the committee of the whole house. That each State, not containing that number, shall be allowed one member.

"That bills for raising or apportioning money, and for fixing salaries of the officers of government of the United States, shall originate in the first branch of the legislature, and shall not be altered or amended by the second branch; and that no money shall be drawn from the public treasury but in pursuance of appropriations to be originated in the first branch.

"That, in the second branch of the legislature, each State shall have an equal vote."

On July 5 the report of the committee was read to the convention. The astute manager of the "large States" interests expressed either real or assumed displeasure with it.

Mr. MADISON.—I restrain myself from animadverting on the report, from the respect I bear to the members of the committee. I must confess I see nothing of concession in it.

The originating money bills is no concession on the part of the smaller States; for, if seven States in the second branch should want such a bill, their interest in the first branch will prevail to bring it forward. It is nothing more than a nominal privilege.

The second branch, small in number, and well connected, will ever prevail. The power of regulating trade, imposts, treaties, etc., is more essential to the community than raising money, and no provision is made for those in the report. We are driven to an unhappy dilemma. Two-thirds of the inhabitants of the Union are to please the remaining one-third by sacrificing their essential rights.

When we satisfy the majority of the people in securing their rights, we have nothing to fear; in any other way, everything. The smaller States, I hope, will at last see their true and real interest; and I hope that the warmth of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. Bedford] will never induce him to yield to his own suggestion of seeking for foreign aid.

At this period (July 5, 1787) Messrs. Yates and Lansing left the convention, and the remainder of the session was employed to complete the Constitution, on the principles already adopted.

LETTER OF YATES AND LANSING TO GOV. CLINTON

After the Constitution was adopted Messrs. Yates and Lansing wrote a letter to Gov. George Clinton of New York justifying their course in leaving the convention. In it they state:

We have been reduced to the disagreeable alternative of either exceeding the powers delegated to us, and giving assent to measures which we conceive destructive to the political happiness of the citizens of the United States, or opposing our opinions to that of a body of respectable men, to whom those citizens had given the most unequivocal proofs of confidence. Thus circumstanced, under these impressions, to have hesitated would have been to be culpable. We therefore gave the principles of the Constitution, which has received the sanction of a majority of the convention, our decided and unreserved dissent; but we must candidly confess that we should have been equally opposed to any system, however modified, which had in object the consolidation of the United States into one government.

We beg leave, briefly, to state some cogent reasons, which, among others, influenced us to decide against a consolidation of the States. These are reducible into two heads:

1st. The limited and well-defined powers under which we acted, and which could not, on any possible construction, embrace an idea of such magnitude as to assent to a general Constitution, in subversion of that of the State.

2d. A conviction of the impracticability of establishing a general government, pervading every part of the United States, and extending essential benefits to all.

Our powers were explicit, and confined to the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation, and reporting such alterations and provisions therein as should render the Federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of government and the preservation of the Union. . . .

Exclusive of our objections originating from the want of power, we entertained an opinion that a general government, however guarded by declarations of rights, or cautionary provisions, must unavoidably, in a short time, be productive of the destruction of the civil liberty of such citizens as could be effectually coerced by it, by reason of the extensive territory of the United States, the dispersed situation of its inhabitants, and the insuperable difficulty of controlling or counteracting the views of a set of men (however unconstitutional and oppressive their acts might be) possessed of all the powers of government, and who, from their remoteness from their constituents, and necessary permanency of office, could not be supposed to be uniformly actuated by an attention to their welfare and happiness; that, however wise and energetic the principles of the general government might be, the extremities of the United States could not be kept in due submission and obedience to its laws, at the distance of many hundred miles from the seat of government; that, if the general legislature was composed of so numerous a body of men as to represent the interests of all the inhabitants of the United States, in the usual and true ideas of representation, the expense of supporting it would become intolerably burdensome; and that, if a few only were vested with a power of legislation, the interests of a great majority of the inhabitants of the United States must necessarily be unknown; or, if known, even in the first stage of the operations of the new government, unattended to.

These reasons were, in our opinion, conclusive against any system of consolidated government; to that recommended by the convention we suppose most of them very forcibly apply. . . .

We were not present at the completion of the new Constitution; but before we left the convention its principles were so well established as to convince us that no alteration was to be expected to conform it to our ideas of expediency and safety. A persuasion that our further attendance would be fruitless and unavailing rendered us less solicitous to return.

The retirement of Yates and Lansing as a protest against a strong government had a very depressing effect upon Washington. On July 10 he wrote as follows to Hamilton, who was in New York opposing the influence in that State of the two dissidents:

I almost despair of seeing a favorable issue to the proceedings of the convention, and do therefore repent having had any agency in the business.

The men who oppose a strong and energetic government are, in my opinion, narrow minded politicians, or are under the influence of local views.—The apprehension expressed by them that the people will not accede to the form proposed is the ostensible, not the real, cause of the opposition—but admitting that the present sentiment is as they prognosticate, the question ought nevertheless to be, is it, or is it not, the best form?—If the former, recommend it, and it will assuredly obtain mauger opposition.

I am sorry you went away. I wish you were back. The crisis is equally important and alarming, and no opposition under such circumstances should discourage exertions till the signature is fixed.

CHAPTER XIII

ON THE POWERS OF THE PRESIDENT, NATIONAL CONTROL OF COMMERCE, AND SLAVERY

[MINOR DEBATES IN THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION]

Debate on the Powers of the President—Debate on Congress's Power over Commerce, including Abolition of Slave Trade—Debate on Counting Slaves in Apportioning Representatives in Congress: in favor, Roger Sherman [Ct.], Oliver Ellsworth [Ct.], Gen. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney [S. C.], John Rutledge, Sr. [S. C.], Pierce Butler [S. C.]; opposed, Rufus King [Mass.], Gouverneur Morris [Pa.], James Wilson [Pa.], John Dickinson [Pa.], Jonathan Dayton [N. J.], George Mason [Va.]—Resolutions Adopted Are Referred to "Committee of Detail" to Draft Constitution—This Committee's Draft Referred to "Committee on Revision"—Finished Draft Signed and Sent to Congress—Letter to Congress—Dissolution of the Convention.

THE chief subjects of discussion after the settlement of the great question of the representation of the States in Congress were the nature and powers of the executive and the regulation by Congress of navigation, including the slave trade.

POWERS OF THE PRESIDENT

The organization of a supreme executive presented many difficulties, arising not merely from the nature of the subject, but from the complicated system of the government. The mode of choice, and whether to consist of one or more persons, the time for which the executive should be chosen, whether reëligible, and the powers to be granted to the person or persons who should administer the government were questions of new impression, and which the members of the convention found it extremely difficult to settle in a manner satisfactory even to themselves. After much deliberation, on the 26th of July, a majority of the States, being six against three and one divided,¹ agreed to the following plan:

That a national executive be instituted—
To consist of a single person;
To be chosen by the national legislature;
For the term of seven years;
To be ineligible a second time;
With power to carry into execution the national laws;
To appoint to offices in cases not otherwise provided for;
To be removeable on impeachment and conviction of malpractice or neglect of duty;
To receive a fixed compensation for the devotion of his time to public service;
To be paid out of the public treasury.

This plan was referred to the committee appointed to prepare the Constitution, and was incorporated in the first draft reported by them.

This important subject remained undecided until the 31st of August, when it was referred to a committee of one from each State; and on the 4th of September the committee reported an entirely new plan, which, after some amendments, was adopted.

NATIONAL CONTROL OF COMMERCE

As the national legislature was invested with the exclusive power of regulating commerce with foreign nations, and of course could pass navigation acts, a difference arose between the navigating and non-navigating States respecting the exercise of this power. The latter were jealous that the former might be disposed to secure to themselves improper advantages in the carrying trade. In the first draft of the Constitution, therefore, the power of Congress was limited in this respect by a special provision, that "no navigation acts should be passed, without the assent of two-thirds of the members present in each house."

¹ New Hampshire, Connecticut, New Jersey, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia were in the affirmative—Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, in the negative—and Virginia was divided. See also Hamilton's letter to Pickering on page 313.

DEBATE ON SLAVE REPRESENTATION

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, AUGUST 8-29, 1787

In the debate of August 8 on the adoption of the report of the committee.

MR. RUFUS KING (then of Massachusetts, afterward an eminent Senator from New York) wished to know what influence the vote just passed was meant to have on the succeeding part of the report concerning the admission of slaves into the rule of representation. He could not reconcile his mind to the article, if it was to prevent objections to the latter part. The admission of slaves was a most grating circumstance to his mind, because he had hoped that this concession would have produced a readiness which had not been manifested to strengthen the general government and to make a full confidence in it. The report under consideration had, by the tenor of it, put an end to all his hopes. In two great points the hands of the legislature were absolutely tied. The importation of slaves could not be prohibited. Exports could not be taxed. Is this reasonable? What are the great objects of the general system? First, defence against foreign invasion; second, against internal sedition. Shall all the States then be bound to defend each, and shall each be at liberty to introduce a weakness which will render defence more difficult? Shall one part of the United States be bound to defend another part, and that other part be at liberty, not only to increase its own danger, but to withhold a compensation for the burden? If slaves are to be imported, shall not the exports produced by their labor supply a revenue, the better to enable the general government to defend their masters? . . . He never could agree to let them be imported without limitation, and then be represented in the national legislatures. Indeed, he could so little persuade himself of the rectitude of such a practice that he was not sure that he could assent to it under any circumstances.

MR. ROGER SHERMAN (of Connecticut) regarded the slave trade as iniquitous, but the point of representation having been settled after much difficulty and deliberation he did not think himself bound to make opposition, especially as the present article, as amended, did not preclude any arrangement whatever on that point in another place reported.

MR. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS moved to insert "free" before the word "inhabitants." Much, he said, would depend on this

Some of the slave-holding States also wished to secure to themselves the right of importing slaves, free from any tax or duty. A clause was therefore at first inserted, declaring that Congress should not prohibit the importation of such persons as the States might think proper to admit, nor lay any tax on the persons so imported.

The question was at last referred to a committee of one from each State. This committee, by way of compromise, reported that "the migration or importation of such persons as the several States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by the legislature prior to the year 1800; but a tax may be imposed on such migration or importation at a rate not exceeding the average of the duties laid on imports."

The same committee also reported against the provision requiring the assent of two-thirds of the members of each house to pass navigation acts. This report, after an amendment, extending the time of allowing such importation to 1808, and limiting the tax on each person to ten dollars, was adopted by a majority of the States, those in favor of allowing the importation of slaves until 1808 being New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia—those against it being New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Virginia.

The adoption of this provision brought up the question of the counting of slaves when Representatives were to be assigned to the States in ratio of population. The following report of the discussion that ensued is taken from the "Madison Papers."

The chief speakers in favor of slave representation were: Roger Sherman and Oliver Ellsworth of Connecticut, Gen. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, John Rutledge, Sr., and Pierce Butler of South Carolina, and Abraham Baldwin of Georgia; those opposed were: Rufus King of Massachusetts, Gouverneur Morris, James Wilson, and John Dickinson of Pennsylvania, Jonathan Dayton of New Jersey, and George Mason of Virginia.

point. He never could concur in upholding domestic slavery. It was a nefarious institution. It was the curse of heaven on the States where it prevailed. Compare the free regions of the Middle States, where a rich and noble cultivation marks the prosperity and happiness of the people, with the misery and poverty which overspread the barren wastes of Virginia, Maryland, and the other States having slaves. Travel through the whole continent and you behold the prospect continually varying with the appearance and disappearance of slavery. . . . Upon what principle is it that the slaves shall be computed in the representation? Are they men? Then make them citizens and let them vote. Are they property? Why then is no other property included? The houses in this city (Philadelphia) are worth more than all the wretched slaves that cover the rice swamps of South Carolina. The admission of slaves into the representation, when fairly explained, comes to this: that the inhabitant of Georgia or South Carolina, who goes to the coast of Africa, and, in defiance of the most sacred laws of humanity, tears away his fellow-creatures from their dearest connections and dooms them to the most cruel bondage shall have more votes in a government instituted for the protection of the rights of mankind than the citizen of Pennsylvania or New Jersey, who views with a laudable horror so nefarious a practice. He would add that domestic slavery is the most prominent feature in the aristocratic countenance of the proposed Constitution. . . . Let it not be said that direct taxation is to be proportioned to representation. It is idle to suppose that the general government can stretch its hand directly into the pockets of the people scattered over so vast a country. They can only do it through the medium of exports, imports, and excises. For what then are all the sacrifices to be made? He would sooner submit himself to a tax, paying for all the negroes in the United States, than saddle posterity with such a Constitution.

MR. DAYTON (of New Jersey) seconded the motion. He did it, he said, that his sentiments on the subject might appear, whatever might be the fate of the amendment.

MR. SHERMAN did not regard the admission of negroes into the ratio of representation as liable to such insuperable objections, etc., etc.

GEN. C. C. PINCKNEY (of South Carolina) considered the fisheries and the western frontier as more burdensome to the United States than the slaves. He thought this could be demonstrated if the occasion were a proper one.

On the question on the motion to insert "free" before "inhabitants" it was disagreed to, New Jersey alone voting in the affirmative.

On Tuesday, August 21:

MR. LUTHER MARTIN (of Maryland) proposed to vary Article VII, Section 4, so as to allow a prohibition or tax on the importation of slaves. In the first place, as five slaves are to be counted as three freemen in the apportionment of representatives, such a clause would leave an encouragement to this traffic. In the second place, slaves weakened one part of the Union, which the other parts were bound to protect. The privilege of importing was therefore unreasonable. And, in the third place, it was inconsistent with the principles of the Revolution, and dishonorable to the American character, to have such a feature in the Constitution.

MR. RUTLEDGE (of South Carolina) did not see how the importation of slaves could be encouraged by this section. He was not apprehensive of insurrections and would readily exempt the other States from the obligation to protect the Southern against them. Religion and humanity had nothing to do with this question. Interest alone is the governing principle with nations, etc.

MR. ELLSWORTH (of Connecticut) was for leaving the clause as it stands, etc.

MR. PINCKNEY.—South Carolina can never receive the plan if it prohibits the Slave-Trade. In every proposed extension of the powers of Congress that State expressly and watchfully excepted that of meddling with the importation of negroes. If the States should be all left at liberty on this subject, South Carolina may, perhaps by degrees, do of herself what is wished, as Virginia and Maryland have already done.

In the debate of the following day—the consideration of Article VII, Section 4, being resumed—Colonel George Mason gave utterance to the following sentiments:

This infernal traffic originated in the avarice of British merchants. The British Government has constantly checked the attempts of Virginia to put a stop to it. The present question concerned not the importing of slaves alone, but the whole Union. The evil of having slaves was experienced during the late war. Had slaves been treated as they might have been by the enemy, they would have proved dangerous instruments didly that he did not think South Carolina would stop her importations of slaves in any short time, but only stop them occasionally as she now does. He moved to commit the clause that slaves might be made liable to an equal tax with other imports which he thought right and which would remove one difficulty that had been started.

MR. RUTLEDGE seconded the motion of General Pinckney.

MR. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS wished the whole subject to be committed, including the clause relating to tax on exports and the navigation act. These things may form a bargain among the Northern and Southern States.

MR. BUTLER (of South Carolina) declared that he would never agree to the power of taxing exports.

MR. SHERMAN said it was better to let the Southern States import slaves than to part with them if they made that a sin, quâ non.

On the question for committing the remaining part of Sections 4 and 5, of Article VII, the vote was 7 in the affirmative; 3 in the negative; Massachusetts absent.

Upon slave representation James Madison had this to say in "The Federalist."

It were doubtless to be wished that the power of prohibiting the importation of slaves had not been postponed until the year 1808, or rather, that it had been suffered to have immediate operation. But it is not difficult to account either for this restriction on the general government or for the manner in which the whole clause is expressed. It ought to be considered as a great point gained in favor of humanity that a period of twenty years may terminate forever within these States a traffic which has so long and so loudly upbraided the barbarism of modern policy; that within that period it will receive a considerable discouragement from the Federal Government and may be totally abolished by the concurrence of the few States which continue the unnatural traffic in the prohibitory example which is given by so large a majority of the Union. Happy would it be for the unfortunate Africans if an equal prospect lay before them of being redeemed from the oppression of their European brethren.

We subscribe to the doctrine, might one of our Southern brethren observe, that representation relates more immediately to persons, and taxation more immediately to property; and we join in the application of this distinction to the case of

in their hands. But their folly dealt by the slaves as it did by the Tories. . . . Maryland and Virginia, he said, had already prohibited the importation of slaves. North Carolina had done the same in substance. All this would be vain if South Carolina and Georgia be at liberty to import. The Western people are already calling for slaves for their new lands, and will fill that country with slaves if they can get through South Carolina and Georgia. Slavery discourages the arts and manufactures. The poor despise labor when performed by slaves. They prevent the emigration of whites who really enrich and strengthen a country. They produce the most pernicious effect on manners. Every master of slaves is born a petty tyrant. They bring the judgment of heaven on a country. As nations can not be punished in the next world, they must be in this. By an inevitable chain of causes and effects Providence punishes national sins by national calamities. . . . He held it essential in every point of view that the general government should have power to prevent the increase of slavery.

GENERAL PINCKNEY declared it to be his firm conviction that if himself and all his colleagues were to sign the Constitution and use their personal influence it would be of no avail toward obtaining the consent of their constituents. South Carolina and Georgia can not do without slaves. . . . He contended that the importation of slaves would be for the interest of the whole Union. The more slaves, the more products to employ the carrying trade; the more consumption also, and the more of this, the more revenue for the common treasury. He admitted it to be reasonable that slaves should be duties like other imports, but should consider a rejection of the clause as an exclusion of South Carolina from the Union.

MR. BALDWIN has similar conceptions in the case of Georgia.

MR. WILSON (of Pennsylvania) observed that if South Carolina and Georgia were thus disposed to get rid of the importation of slaves in a short time, as had been suggested, they would never refuse to unite because the importation might be prohibited. As the section now stands, all articles imported are to be taxed. Slaves alone are exempt. This is, in fact, a bounty on that article.

MR. DICKINSON (of Delaware) expressed his sentiments as of a similar character. And MESSRS. KING and LANGDON (of New Hampshire) were also in favor of giving the power to the general government.

GENERAL PINCKNEY thought himself bound to declare can-our slaves. But we deny the fact that slaves are considered merely as property, and in no respect whatever as persons. The true state of the case is that they partake of both these qualities, being considered by our laws in some respects as persons, and in other respects as property. In being compelled to labor, not merely for himself, but for a master—in being vendible by one master to another master, and being subject, at all times, to being restrained in his liberty and chastised in his body by the capricious will of his owner, the slave may appear to be degraded from the human rank and classed with that of the irrational animals which fall under the legal denomination of property. In being protected, on the other hand, in his life and in his limbs against the violence of all others, even the master of his labor and his liberty, and in being punished himself for all violence committed against others, the slave is no less regarded by the law as a member of society, not as a part of the irrational creation—as a moral person, not a mere object of property. The Federal Constitution, therefore, decides with great propriety on the case of our slaves when it views them in the mixed character of persons and property. This is, in fact, their true character. It is the character bestowed on them by the laws under which they live, and it will not be disputed that these are the proper criterion, because it is only under the pretext that the laws have transformed negroes into subjects of property that a place is denied to them in the computation of numbers, and it is admitted that if the laws were to restore the rights which have been taken away the negroes would no longer be refused an equal share of representation with the other inhabitants.

On August 29 Mr. Butler of South Carolina moved to insert after Article XV:

"If any person bound to service or labor in any of the United States shall escape into another State, he or she shall not be discharged from such service or labor in consequence of any regulations existing in the State to which they escape, but shall be delivered up to the person justly claiming their service or labor."

This, says Madison in his "Papers," was after some verbal modification agreed to, no one opposing.

In the debate in the North Carolina ratification convention in 1788:

Mr. IREDELL begged leave to explain the reason of this clause (last clause, Section 2, Article IV). In some of the Northern States they have emancipated all their slaves. If any of our slaves, said he, go there and remain there a certain time, they would, by the present laws, be entitled to their freedom so that their masters could not get them again. This would be extremely prejudicial to the inhabitants of the Southern States, and to prevent it this clause is inserted in the Constitution. Though the word slave is not mentioned, this is the meaning of it. The Northern delegates, owing to their peculiar scruples on the subject of Slavery, did not choose the word slave to be mentioned.

General Chas. C. Pinckney said in the South Carolina ratification convention in 1788:

"I am of the same opinion now as I was two years ago that while there remained one acre of swamp land uncleared in South Carolina I would raise my voice against restricting the importation of negroes. . . . The Middle States and Virginia were for an immediate and total prohibition. We endeavored to obviate the objections which were urged in the best manner we could, and assigned reasons for our insisting on the importation, which there is no occasion to repeat, as they must occur to every gentleman in the House. A committee of the States was appointed in order to accommodate this matter and after a great deal of difficulty it was settled on the footing of the Constitution. By this settlement we have secured an unlimited importation of negroes for twenty years. Nor is it declared when that importation shall be stopped; it may be continued. We have a right to recover our slaves in whatever part of America they may take refuge. In short, considering all circumstances, we have made the best terms for the security of this species of property it was in our power to make. We would have made better if we could, but on the whole, I do not think them bad."

We should here observe that amendments were proposed and even adopted until the day when the Constitution was signed. It will be remembered that in the arrangement with respect to the ratio of representation in the House there was to be one representative for every forty thousand inhabitants. This remained so until the last day of the session, when General Washington rose and said, in effect, that, "though he was sensible of the impropriety of the chairman's intermingling in the debates, yet he could not help observing that the small number which constituted the representative body appeared to him a defect in the plan—that it would better suit his ideas, and he believed it would be more agreeable to the people, if the number should be increased, and that the ratio should be one for every thirty thousand." The motion for reducing the ratio to this number was immediately put and almost unanimously carried. This is one instance of the influence of that great man in this assembly; and there can be no doubt his influence was also felt in other instances, though perhaps not in so direct a manner during the long deliberations of that body.

On July 23 the nineteen resolutions of the Virginia plan, with the amendments, were referred to a "committee of detail" to draft a Constitution in accordance with them. The plans of Pinckney and Paterson were also referred to the committee. The members composing the committees were elected by ballot: Rutledge, Randolph, Gorham, Ellsworth, and Wilson.

On the 6th of August the committee reported the draft it had agreed upon. (For the text of this, see Elliott's "Debates on the Federal Constitution," Vol. I, page 224.) This was debated upon until September 8, when a committee of five was chosen by ballot "to revise the style of and arrange the articles agreed to by the House." The members chosen were Johnson, Hamilton, Gouverneur Morris, Madison, and King.

On the 12th of September the committee submitted its draft, together with the draft of a letter to Congress. Both were approved, and the Constitution was ordered to be printed and copies furnished the members. This was done on the following day.

On September 17 the convention formally agreed to the Constitution, all the States voting "Ay," and ordered it to be transmitted to Congress to be laid before State conventions elected for the purpose of considering the ratification of the instrument, and that so soon as it was ratified by a constitutional majority Congress should take measures for the election of a President, and fix the time for beginning proceedings under it. The Journal of the Convention and other papers were deposited with its president (Washington) to be retained by him subject to the order of Congress if this body should be formed under the Constitution.

The members proceeded to sign the Constitution, and the convention then dissolved itself by an adjournment sine die.

The following is the text of the letter to Congress accompanying the Constitution:

THE LETTER TO CONGRESS

We have now the honor to submit to the consideration of the United States in Congress assembled that Constitution which has appeared to us the most advisable.

The friends of our country have long seen and desired that the power of making war, peace, and treaties; that of levying money and regulating commerce; and the correspondent executive and judicial authorities shall be fully and effectually vested in the general government of the Union. But the impropriety of delegating such extensive trust to one body of men is evident. Thence results the necessity of a different organization. It is obviously impracticable in the Federal Government of these States to secure all rights of independent sovereignty to each and yet provide for the interest and safety of all. Individuals entering into society must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest. The magnitude of the sacrifice must depend as well on situation and circumstances as on the object to be obtained. It is at all times difficult to draw with precision the line between those rights which must be surrendered and those which may be reserved. And on the present occasion this difficulty was increased by a difference among the several States as to their situation, extent, habits and particular interests.

In all our deliberations on this subject we kept steadily in our view that which appeared to us the greatest interest of every true American—the consolidation of the Union—in which are involved our prosperity, felicity, safety, perhaps our national existence. This important consideration, seriously and deeply impressed on our minds, led each State in the convention to be less rigid in points of inferior magnitude than might have been otherwise expected. And thus the Constitution which we now present is the result of a spirit of amity and of that mutual deference and concession which the peculiarity of our political situation rendered indispensable.

That it will meet the full and entire approbation of every State is not perhaps to be expected. But each will doubtless consider that, had her interest alone been consulted, the consequences might have been particularly disagreeable and injurious to others. That it is liable to as few exceptions as could reasonably have been expected we hope and believe; that it may promote the lasting welfare of that country so dear to us all, and secure her freedom and happiness, is our most ardent wish.

funds, burdened with debt, and without the power or means of discharging it, despised abroad, and threatened with anarchy at home, that small majorities were at last induced to yield their assent, trusting to future amendments.

THE MASSACHUSETTS CONVENTION

In the convention of Massachusetts, which met in January, 1788, were men of the first talents who exerted their utmost energies in favor of the adoption of the Constitution. They encountered strong opposition from a class who had small personal interests at stake, and among these persons were eighteen or twenty who had actually been in Shay's army.

Fisher Ames delivered the most powerful of the speeches in favor of ratification. In the conclusion he said:

UNION, THE DYKE OF THE NATION

FISHER AMES

Shall we put every thing to hazard by rejecting this Constitution? Who is there that really loves liberty that will not tremble for its safety if the Federal Government should be dissolved? Can liberty be safe without government?

The Union is essential to our being as a nation. The pillars that prop it are crumbling to powder. The Union is the vital sap that nourishes the tree. If we reject the Constitution, to use the language of the country, we girdle the tree, its leaves will wither, its branches drop off, and the moldering trunk will be torn down by the tempest. What security has this single State against foreign enemies? Could we defend the mast country which the British so much desire? Can we protect our fisheries or secure by treaties a sale for the produce of our lands in foreign markets? Is there no loss, no danger, by delay? In spite of our negligence and perverseness, are we to enjoy at all times the privilege of forming a Constitution which no other nation has enjoyed at all? We approve our own form of government, and seem to think ourselves in safety under its protection. We talk as if there was no danger of deciding wrong. But when the inundation comes, shall we stand on dry land? The State government is a beautiful structure. It is situated, however, on the naked beach. The Union

NATION OR CONFEDERATION?

[DEBATES IN STATE LEGISLATURES ON RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION]

Congress Submits the Constitution to the States for Ratification—Debate in the Massachusetts Convention: Speech of Fisher Ames: "Union, the Dyke of the Nation"—The Virginia Convention: Great Debate on "Consolidation or Confederation?" between Edmund Pendleton, Edmund Randolph, James Madison, George Wythe, John Marshall, et al., Advocating Ratification, and Patrick Henry, George Mason, William Grayson, et al., Opposing It—Debates in the New York Convention.

ON September 20, 1787, the Constitution was taken up by Congress, then sitting in City Hall, New York, and debated for eight days. The chief opposition to the Constitution was that it consolidated too much power in the general Government, thus endangering the independence of the States. Congress finally ordered, on September 23, that the "report (i. e., the Constitution) of the convention lately assembled in Philadelphia" be "transmitted to the several legislatures in order to be submitted to a convention of delegates chosen in each State by the people thereof." In pursuance of this act the State legislatures called such conventions, which met in the course of the next three years.

Ratification was adopted unanimously by Georgia, New Jersey, and Delaware, and by large majorities in Pennsylvania, Connecticut, Maryland, and South Carolina. The State of Rhode Island for some time declined calling a convention, and it was for a while doubtful whether the other States would assent to it without previous amendments. Such, however, was the situation of the United States, without government, without is the dyke to fence out the flood. That dyke is broken and decayed, and if we do not repair it when the next spring tide comes we shall be buried in one common destruction.

The question was taken on the adoption of the Constitution on February 6, 1788, and carried by a small majority.

THE VIRGINIA CONVENTION

The convention of Virginia met on the 2nd of June, and the talented men of that large State were arranged on opposite sides. Patrick Henry, George Mason, William Grayson, James Monroe, and others were in the ranks of opposition, and they were met by Edmund Pendleton, Edmund Randolph, James Madison, John Marshall, Chancellor Wythe, and others. The debates as given to the public, though no doubt imperfect, exhibit a display of eloquence and talents, certainly at that time unequalled in this country.

The debates, though generally courteous, were often animated, sometimes violent.

The radical difference between the parties in Virginia and in other States respecting the new system was that it departed from the principles of a confederacy and constituted a consolidated national government vested with extensive powers operating, not upon the States, but upon individuals, and that the people themselves, on whom it was to operate, were not secured against the improper exercise of those powers by a bill of rights. The loss of sovereignty and of influence was felt by the large States, and led them to a more particular examination of the various powers transferred to the different departments of the new Government.

CONSOLIDATION OR CONFEDERATION?

DEBATE IN THE VIRGINIA CONVENTION

All the talents and eloquence of Patrick Henry were exerted against a system which he deprecated. He commenced by inquiring why the Confederation had been abandoned, and what authority the general convention had to make a consolidated government:

I would make this inquiry of those worthy characters who composed a part of the late federal convention. I am sure they were fully impressed with the necessity of forming a great consolidated government instead of a confederation. That this is a consolidated government is demonstrably clear, and the danger of such a government is to my mind very striking. I have the highest veneration for those gentlemen, but, sir, give me leave to demand what right had they to say we, the people? My political curiosity, exclusive of my anxious solicitude for the public welfare, leads me to ask who authorized them to speak the language of we, the people, instead of we, the States? States are the characteristics and the soul of a confederation. If the States be not the agents of this compact, it must be one great consolidated government of the people of all the States. I have the highest respect for those gentlemen who formed the convention, and were not some of them here, I would express some testimonial of esteem for them. America had, on a former occasion, put the utmost confidence in them—a confidence which was well placed, and I am sure, sir, I could give up any thing to them; I would cheerfully confide in them as my representatives. But, sir! on this great occasion I would demand the cause of their conduct. Even from that illustrious man who saved us by his valor I would have a reason for his conduct—that liberty which he has given us by his valor tells me to ask this reason—and sure I am, were he here, he would give us the information. The people gave them no power to use their name. That they exceeded their power is perfectly clear. It is not mere curiosity that actuates me—I wish to hear the real actual existing danger which should lead us to take these steps so dangerous in my conception. Disorders have arisen in other parts of America, but here, sir, no dangers, no insurrection or tumult has happened—everything has been calm and tranquil. But, notwithstanding this, we are wandering on the great ocean of human affairs. I see no landmark to guide us. We are running we know not whither. Difference of opinion has gone to a degree of inflammatory resentment in some parts of the country which has been occasioned by this perilous innovation. The federal convention ought to have amended the old system—for this purpose they were solely delegated; the object of their mission extended to no other consideration.

To this direct inquiry Governor Randolph replied by saying:

The members of the general convention were particularly deputed to ameliorate the Confederation. On a thorough contemplation of the subject they found it impossible to amend that system; what was to be done? The dangers of America, which will be shown at another time by particular enumeration, suggested the expedient of forming a new plan; the Confederation has done a great deal for us, we will allow, but it was the danger of a powerful enemy, and the spirit of America, sir, and not the energy of that system, that carried us through that perilous war. For what were its best arms? The greatest exertions were made when the danger was most imminent. This system was not signed till March, 1781, Maryland having not acceded to it before, yet the military achievements and other exertions of America previous to that period were as brilliant, as effectual and successful as they could have been under the most energetic government. This clearly shows that our perilous situation was the cement of our Union.

How different the scene when this peril vanished and peace was restored! The demands of Congress were treated with neglect. One State complained that another had not paid its quota as well as itself. Public credit gone! For I believe, were it not for the private credit of individuals, we should have been ruined long before that time. Commerce languishing, produce falling in value, and justice trampled under foot. We became contemptible in the eyes of all foreign nations; they discarded us as little wanton boys who had played for liberty, but who had not sufficient solidity or wisdom to secure it on a permanent basis, and were therefore unworthy of their regard. It was found that Congress could not even enforce the observance of their own treaties. That treaty under which we enjoy our present tranquillity was disregarded. Making no difference between the justice of paying debts due to people here, and that of paying those due to people on the other side of the Atlantic, I wished to see the treaty complied with by the payment of the British debts, but have not been able to know why it has been neglected. What was the reply to the demands and requisitions of Congress? You are too contemptible; we will despise and disregard you. After meeting in convention the deputies from the States communicated their information to one another. On a review of our critical situation, and of the impossibility of introducing any degree of improvement into the old system, what ought they to have done?

To these arguments John Marshall, afterwards to be the Chief-Justice for many years of the Supreme Court, replied, saying that, as the previous consent of both parties was necessary in bringing the case before the court, each would be bound in honor as well as in law to accept the decision of the tribunal. Accordingly the court would be a means of preventing disputes, instead of aggravating them, between the States and foreign nations. He continued:

The exclusion of trial by jury in such a case, says the honorable gentleman (Henry), would prostrate our rights. Does the word court mean only the judges? Does not the determination of a jury necessarily lead to the judgment of the court? Is there anything here which gives the judges exclusive jurisdiction of matters of fact? What is the object of a jury trial? To inform the court of the facts. When a court has cognizance of facts, does it not follow that they can make inquiry by a jury? It is impossible to be otherwise. I hope that in this country, where impartiality is so much admired, the laws will direct facts to be ascertained by a jury. But, says the honorable gentleman, the juries in the ten miles square will be mere tools of parties, with which he would not trust his person or property, which, he says, he would rather leave to the court. Because the Government may have a district ten miles square, will no man stay there but the tools and officers of the Government? Will nobody else be found there? Is it so in any other part of the world where a government has legislative power? Are there none but officers and tools of the government of Virginia in Richmond? Will there not be independent merchants and respectable gentlemen of fortune within the ten miles square? Will there not be worthy farmers and mechanics? Will not a good jury be found there as well as anywhere else? Will the officers of the Government become improper to be on a jury? What is it to the Government, whether this man or that man succeeds? It is all one thing. Does the Constitution say that juries shall consist of officers, or that the Supreme Court shall be held in the ten miles square? It was acknowledged by the honorable member that it was secure in England. What makes it secure there? Is it their constitution? What part of their constitution is there that the Parliament cannot change? As the preservation of this right is in the hands of Parliament, and it has ever been held sacred by them, will the Government of America be less honest than Would it not have been treason to return without proposing some scheme to relieve their distressed country?

Mr. Henry, in renewing the discussion, declared the new system produced "a revolution as radical as that which separated us from Great Britain."

It is fully as radical if in this transition our rights and privileges are endangered and the sovereignty of the States be relinquished; and cannot we plainly see that this is actually the case? The rights of conscience, trial by jury, liberty of the press, all your immunities and franchises, all pretensions to human rights and privileges, so loudly talked of by some and inconsiderately by others, are rendered insecure, if not lost, by this change. Is this tame relinquishment of rights worthy of freemen? Is it worthy of that manly fortitude that ought to characterize republicans? It is said that eight States have adopted this plan. I declare that if twelve States and a half had adopted it, I would with manly firmness and in spite of an erring world reject it.

Should the system go into operation, Mr. Henry asked, "what will the States have to do? Take care of the poor, repair and make highways, erect bridges, and so on and so on. Abolish the State legislatures at once. For what purposes should they be returned?"

Mr. Henry in particular objected to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in controversies between a State and a foreign government. Would the foreign government in such a case, he asked, be bound by the decision? And would not the American State be barred from its claim if the federal judiciary thought it unjust? The exclusion of trial by jury in such cases would be destructive of the rights of the people of the State affected. And, if there is not to be this exclusion, would not juries empaneled in the proposed federal district, a territory only ten miles square, be mere tools of parties, especially since the right of challenging such juries is not secured in the Constitution. For his part, said Mr. Henry, sooner than trust his person or property to the mercy of such creatures, he would rather leave it to the court, unjust to his rights as a citizen of Virginia as this would be.

that of Great Britain? Here a restriction is to be found. The jury is not to be brought out of the State. There is no such restriction in that government, for the laws of Parliament decide everything respecting it. Yet gentlemen tell us that there is safety there, and nothing here but danger. It seems to me that the laws of the United States will generally secure trials by a jury of the vicinage, or in such manner as will be most safe and convenient for the people.

But it seems that the right of challenging the jurors is not secured in this Constitution. Is this done by our own Constitution, or by any provision of the English Government? Is it done by their Magna Charta or Bill of Rights? This privilege is founded on their laws. If so, why should it be objected to the American Constitution that it is not inserted in it? If we are secure in Virginia without mentioning it in our Constitution, why should not this security be found in the federal court?

A majority of the Virginia convention were in favor of very material amendments of the nature of a "Bill of Rights," and the question finally was whether the Constitution should be adopted previously or subsequently to such amendments.

After a debate of about twenty days, Mr. Wythe moved that the Constitution be ratified, with a preamble declaring that the powers granted by it were the gift of the people, and that every power not granted remained with them—that no right, therefore, of any denomination could be canceled, abridged, restrained, or modified by Congress, or any officer of the United States, except in those instances in which power was given by the Constitution for those purposes. Among other essential rights, liberty of conscience and of the press were mentioned, and it was declared that any imperfections which might exist in the Constitution ought rather to be examined in the mode therein prescribed for obtaining amendments than to bring the union in danger by a delay, with a hope of obtaining previous amendments.

On this motion the debate was renewed with increased zeal and animation. Mr. Henry, in opposition to it, observed:

With respect to subsequent amendments proposed by the worthy member, I am distressed when I hear the expression. It is a new one altogether, and such as stands against every idea of fortitude and manliness in the States or any one else. Evils admitted in order to be removed subsequently, and tyranny submitted to in order to be excluded by a subsequent alteration, are things totally new to me. But I am sure he meant nothing but to amuse the committee. I know his candor. His proposal is an idea dreadful to me. I ask: does experience warrant such a thing from the beginning of the world to this day? Do you enter into a compact of government first and afterwards settle the terms of the government? It is admitted by every one that this is a compact. Although the Confederation be lost, it is a compact, constitution, or something of that nature. I confess I never heard of such an idea before. It is most abhorrent to my mind. You endanger the tranquillity of your country, you stab its repose if you accept this government unaltered. . . .

I cannot conclude without saying that I shall have nothing to do with it if subsequent amendments be determined on. Oppressions will be carried on as radically by the majority when adjustments and accommodations will be held up. I say I conceive it my duty, if this government is adopted before it is amended, to go home. I shall act as I think my duty requires. Every other gentleman will do the same. Previous amendments, in my opinion, are necessary to procure peace and tranquillity. I fear, if they be not agreed to, every movement and operation of government will cease, and how long that baneful thing, civil discord, will stay from this country God only knows.

The language of Mr. Henry at the close of this debate and just before the final question was taken was dispassionate and patriotic.

If I shall be in the minority I shall have those painful sensations which arise from a conviction of being overpowered in a good cause. Yet I will be a peaceful citizen! My head, my hand, and my heart shall be at liberty to retrieve the loss of liberty and remove the defects of that system in a constitutional way. I wish not to go to violence, but will wait with hopes that the spirit which predominated in the Revolution is not yet gone, nor the cause of those who are attached to the Revolution lost. I shall therefore patiently wait in expectation of seeing that Government changed so as to be compatible with the safety, liberty, and happiness of the people.

In my opinion the idea of subsequent amendments is preposterous—they are words without meaning. The little States will not agree to an alteration. When they find themselves on an equal footing with the other States in the Senate, and all power vested in them, the executive mixed with the legislative, they will never assent. Why are such extensive powers given to the Senate? Because the little States gained their point. In every light I consider subsequent amendments as unwise and impolitic.

Speaking of the advantages Virginia was to derive from the new system, Mr. Grayson asked:

Has Virginia any gain from her riches and commerce? What does she get in return? I can see what she gives up, which is immense. The little States gain in proportion as we lose. Every disproportion is against us. If the effects of such a contrariety of interests be happy, it must be extraordinary and wonderful. From the very nature of the paper, one part whose interest is different from the other is to govern it. What will be our situation? The Northern States are carrying States. We are considered as productive States. They will constantly carry for us. Are manufacturers favorable to us? If they reciprocate the act of Charles II and say that no produce of America shall be carried in any foreign bottom, what will be the consequence? This—that all the produce of the Southern States will be carried by the Northern States on their own terms, which must be very high.

The reply of Mr. Madison to the first part of this speech produced a powerful effect in favor of Mr. Wythe's motion. He saw that the fate of the system he had been so instrumental in forming depended on the question then to be decided. He was too well acquainted with the difficulties in the general convention to believe that the States could ever unite in the various amendments which would be proposed. He said:

Nothing has excited more admiration in the world than the manner in which free governments have been established in America. For it was the first instance, from the creation of the world to the American Revolution, that free inhabitants have been seen deliberating on a form of government and selecting such of their citizens as possessed their confidence to determine upon and give effect to it. But why has this

The object of some opponents was that the States of Virginia, North Carolina, and New York should reject the system until their amendments were agreed to by the other States. This it was supposed would secure the adoption of such amendments as they required. This, on the other hand, was deemed too hazardous an experiment, and it was urged that it would place the Union itself in the greatest danger. To remarks of this kind Mr. Grayson replied:

The dangers of disunion are painted in strong colors. How is the fact? It is this: that if Virginia thinks proper to insist on previous amendments, joined by New York and North Carolina, she can procure what amendments she pleases. What is the geographical position of those States? New York commands the ocean. Virginia and North Carolina join the Spanish dominions. What would be the situation then of the other States? They would be topographically separated, though politically united with one another. There would be no communication between the center and the component parts. While these States were thus separated, of what advantage would commercial regulations be to them? Yet will gentlemen pretend to say that we must adopt first and then beg amendments? I see no reason in it. We undervalue our own importance. Consider the vast consequence of Virginia and North Carolina. What kind of connection would the rest of the States form? They would be carrying States without anything to carry. They would have no communication with the other Southern States. I therefore insist that if you are not satisfied with the paper as it stands it is as clear to me as that the sun shines that, by joining those two States, you may command such amendments as you think necessary for the happiness of the people. The late convention were not empowered totally to alter the present Confederation. The idea was to amend. If they have laid before us a thing quite different, we are not bound to accept it. There is nothing dictatorial in refusing it. We wish to remove the spirit of party. In all parts of the world there is a reciprocity in contracts and compacts. If one make a proposition to another, is he bound to receive it?

Six or seven States have agreed to it. As it is not their interest to stand by themselves, will they not with open arms receive us? Tobacco will always make our peace with them. I hope then that the gentleman will find on reconsideration that we are not at all in that dangerous situation he represented.

excited so much wonder and applause? Because it is of so much magnitude, and because it is liable to be frustrated by so many accidents. If it has excited so much wonder that the United States have, in the middle of war and confusion, formed free systems of government, how much more astonishment and admiration will be excited should they be able peaceably, freely, and satisfactorily to establish one general government when there is such a diversity of opinions and interests, when not cemented or stimulated by any common danger? How vast must be the difficulty of concentrating in one government the interests, and conciliating the opinions of so many different heterogeneous bodies?

How have the confederacies of ancient and modern times been formed? As far as ancient history describes the former to us, they were brought about by the wisdom of some eminent sage. How was the imperfect union of the Swiss Cantons formed? By danger. How was the confederacy of the United Netherlands formed? By the same. They were surrounded by dangers. By these and one influential character, they were stimulated to unite. How was the Germanic system formed? By danger in some degree, but principally by the overruling influence of individuals. When we consider this Government, we ought to make great allowances. We must calculate the impossibility that every State should be gratified in its wishes, and much less that every individual should receive this gratification. It has never been denied by the friends of the paper on the table that it has its defects. But they do not think that it contains any real danger. They conceive that they will in all probability be removed when experience will show it to be necessary. I beg that gentlemen deliberating on this subject consider the alternative. Either nine States will ratify it or they will not. If nine States adopt it, can it be reasonably presumed or required that nine States, having freely and fully considered the subject and come to an affirmative decision, will, upon the demand of a single State, agree that they acted wrong and could not see its defects—tread back the steps which they have taken and come forward and reduce it to uncertainty whether a general system shall be adopted or not? Virginia has always heretofore spoken the language of respect to the other States, and she has always been attended to. Will it be that language to call on a majority of the States to acknowledge that they have done wrong? Is it the language of confidence to say that we do not believe that amendments for the preservation of the common liberty and general interest of the States will be consented to by them? This is neither the language of confidence nor respect. Virginia, when she speaks respectfully, will be as much attended to as she has hitherto been when speaking this language. It is a most awful thing that depends on our decision—no less than whether the thirteen States shall unite freely, peaceably, and unanimously for the security of their common happiness and liberty, or whether everything is to be put in confusion and disorder! Are we to embark in this dangerous enterprise, uniting various opinions to contrary interests, with the vain hopes of coming to an amicable concurrence?

It is worthy of our consideration that those who prepared the paper on the table found difficulties not to be described in its formation—mutual deference and concession were absolutely necessary. Had they been inflexibly tenacious of their individual opinions they would never have concurred. Under what circumstances was it formed? When no party was formed, or particular proposition made, and men's minds were calm and dispassionate. Yet under these circumstances it was difficult, extremely difficult, to agree to any general system.

Suppose eight States only ratify it, and Virginia proposes certain alterations as the previous condition of her accession. If they should be disposed to accede to her proposition, which is the most favorable conclusion, the difficulty attending it would be immense. Every State which has decided it must take up the subject again. They must not only have the mortification of acknowledging that they have done wrong, but the difficulty of having a reconsideration of it among the people, and appointing new conventions to deliberate upon it. They must attend to all the amendments, which may be dictated by as great a diversity of political opinions as there are local attachments. When brought together in one assembly they must go through and accede to every one of the amendments. The gentlemen who within this House have thought proper to propose previous amendments have brought no less than forty amendments—a bill of rights which contains twenty amendments and twenty other alterations, some of which are improper and inadmissible. Will not every State think herself equally entitled to propose as many amendments? And suppose them to be contradictory. I leave it to this convention, whether it be probable that they can agree to anything but the plan on the table, or whether greater difficulties will not be encountered than were experienced in the progress of the formation of this Constitution.

should neglect, refuse or be disabled by invasion or rebellion to prescribe the same; that the clauses which declare that Congress should not exercise certain powers be not interpreted to extend their powers, but be construed as making exceptions to the specified powers, or inserted merely for greater caution; that the laws ascertaining the compensations of the members be postponed in their operation until after the election of Representatives immediately succeeding the passage of the same; that some tribunal other than the Senate be provided to try impeachment of Senators.

NEW YORK CONVENTION

A majority of the convention of New York, which met on June 19, were strongly opposed to the new system of government. The most important point discussed was the proportion of representation fixed by the Constitution for the popular House. This divided the convention into the two camps of those inclined toward a strong government, and those who feared the centralization of power in the hands of a comparatively few men of ability and political prestige.

As ten States had ratified the Constitution, and it must necessarily go into operation, no alternative was left New York but to unite or secede. By a small majority the system was adopted and amendments recommended. These amendments were more numerous as well as more radical than those of any other State.

The motion of Mr. Wythe prevailed by a majority of ten, 89 to 79. In the form of ratification, after stating that every power not granted remained with the people, the convention added:

With these impressions, with a solemn appeal to the searcher of hearts for the purity of our intentions, and under the conviction that whatsoever imperfections may exist in the Constitution ought rather to be examined in the mode prescribed therein than to bring the Union into danger by a delay with a hope of obtaining amendments previous to the ratification.

The convention at the same time agreed upon a bill of rights, consisting of twenty articles, and the same number of amendments to the body of the Constitution. The most important of the latter were: that Congress should not lay direct taxes until the States had refused them; that members of the Senate and House should be incapable of holding any civil office under the authority of the United States; that no commercial treaty should be ratified without the concurrence of two-thirds of the whole number of the members of the Senate, and that no treaty ceding or suspending the territorial rights or claims of the United States, or any of them, or their rights to fishing in the American seas, or navigating the American rivers, should be but in cases of the most extreme necessity, nor should any such treaty be ratified without the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole number of the members of both Houses; that no navigation law or law regulating commerce should be passed without the consent of two-thirds of the members present in both Houses; that no person be capable of being President of the United States for more than eight years in any term of sixteen years; that the judicial power of the United States should extend to no case where the cause of action originated before the ratification of the Constitution except in disputes between persons claiming lands under grants of different States and suits for debts due to the United States; that Congress should not alter, modify, or interfere in the times, places, or manner of holding elections for Senators or Representatives, or either of them, except when the legislature of any State

CHAPTER XV

DEFENCE OF THE CONSTITUTION

[LETTERS IN THE PRESS]

Letters of "Fabius" (John Dickinson of Pennsylvania)—"The Federalist" Papers, by Alexander Hamilton [N. Y.], James Madison [Va.], and John Jay [N. Y.]: Introduction by Hamilton; Digest of the Arguments; Conclusion, by Hamilton—Adoption of the Constitution.

MANY attacks on the proposed Constitution were made in the newspapers. To these John Dickinson replied in his "Letters of Fabius," and Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, and John Jay in articles over the common signature of Publius, which were collected and published under the title of "The Federalist." Dickinson wrote for the common people, and Hamilton, Madison, and Jay for persons of superior education.

The letters of "Fabius" were published early in 1788, while ratification of the Constitution was in doubt, in order to "simplify the subject so as to facilitate inquiries" regarding it and remove current objections to it. The substance of the papers is here presented in dialogue form, the language of the original being preserved so far as practicable.

THE LETTERS OF FABIUS

JOHN DICKINSON

Objection. The proposed system has such inherent vices as must necessarily produce a bad administration, and at length the oppression of a monarchy and aristocracy in the federal offices.

Reply. The power of the people, pervading the proposed system by frequent elections, together with the strong confederation of the States, forms an adequate security against every danger that has been apprehended.

The proof of the salutary, purifying, and preserving qualities of this popular rule removes all the particular objections to the Constitution as menacing liberty by unnecessary taxation, standing armies, the abolishment of trial by jury in federal judicial procedure, and limitations of freedom of the press and freedom of commerce, etc. The question then is: not what may be done, when the Government shall be turned into a tyranny, but how the Government can be so turned.

Objection. The number of federal officers is too small.

Reply. If this is a fault it will be remedied in the natural course of the country's development by the unavoidable multiplication of offices. The Senate continues the present representation of the sovereignties of the States, and through State jealousy it will never renounce its powers, including representation. The House of Representatives will grow only with the country's growth and corresponding legislative needs.

Objection. The federal officers hold their offices too long.

Reply. This cannot hold against the Representatives who are elected every two years. The Senators, from their smaller numbers, should serve a longer term, to balance, by their greater experience in legislation, the greater power of the Representatives (that of the purse).

Objection. The President will not be independent.

Reply. He is not chosen by the people, who have not the necessary information before them of the qualifications of men proposed for the office, nor by Congress, lest it should disturb the national councils, nor by any standing body whatever, for fear of undue influence, but by a specially appointed body of private citizens whose qualifications for such service are known by the people and who are uninfluenced by any other consideration than the worth of the men considered for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency.

Objection. The President may become a dictator.

Reply. Two-thirds of Congress may pass any law over his veto.

Objection. The Senate may become a dictator.

Reply. The terms of office of the Senators expire at different times, and the political complexion of the State legislatures which elect them will be constantly changing. Machiavel and Cæsar Borgia together could not form a conspiracy in such a Senate destructive to any but themselves and their accomplices.

Objection. The Constitution is not broad enough.

pared with these, what are a bill of rights or any characters drawn upon paper or parchment, those frail remembrances? Do we want to be reminded that the sun enlightens, warms, invigorates, and cheers? or how horrid it would be to have his rays intercepted by our being thrust for life into mines or dungeons? Liberty is the sun of society. Rights are the rays.

Objection. A very extensive territory cannot be ruled by a government of republican form.

Reply. It is true that extensive territory has in general been arbitrarily governed; and it is as true that a number of republics in such territory, loosely connected, must inevitably rot into despotism. But the proposed Constitution presents a government without a precedent, and therefore the historical argument does not apply to it. Where was there ever a confederacy which obliged by its direct authority every individual to contribute, when the public good necessarily required it, a just proportion of aid to the support of the commonwealth protecting him—without disturbing him in the discharge of the duties owing by him to the State of which he is an inhabitant, and at the same time was so amply, so anxiously provided for bringing the interests, and even the wishes of every sovereignty and of every person of the Union under all their various modifications and impressions into their full operation and efficacy in the national councils? The instance never existed. The conclusion ought not to be made.

The assertion has probably been suggested by reflections on the democracies of antiquity without making a proper distinction between them and the democracy of the United States.

In the democracies of antiquity the people assembled together and governed personally. This mode was incompatible with greatness of number and dispersion of habitation.

In the democracy of the United States the people act by their representatives. This improvement collects the will of millions upon points concerning their welfare with more advantage than the will of hundreds could be collected under the ancient form.

Representation which implies purity of election is a gentle remedy for every evil. It is at once a preservative against discontent and rashness on the part of the people and against negligence and usurpation on the part of their magistrates. All the curious contrivances and artful balances devised in ancient or modern times to supply its place have proved deficient. To mention no more, Athens and Rome perished for want of a representative government.

Reply. The people of the United States are trebly represented in it. The whole Government is interested in the safety of every part.

Objection. But the sovereign will of the Government must of consequence destroy the subordinate sovereignties of the several States.

Reply. If so, we must abandon the principle of all society for the subordinate sovereignties, or, in other words, the undelegated rights of the several States in a confederation stand upon the very same foundation with the undelegated rights of individuals in a society, the federated sovereign will being composed of the subordinated sovereign wills of the several confederated States.

Why should we be alarmed when we know that the rights to be delegated by the several States to the Confederation are simple, defined, and so limited to particular objects that they cannot possibly be applied by any construction to other objects without such a distortion of interpretation, and such a violation of propriety, as must offend every sound head and honest heart?

As some persons seem to think a bill of rights is the best security of rights, the sovereignties of the several States have this best security by the proposed Constitution, and more than this best security, for they are not barely declared to be rights, but are taken into it as component parts for their perpetual preservation—by themselves. In short, the government of each State is, and is to be, sovereign and supreme in all matters that relate to each state only. It is to be subordinate barely in those matters that relate to the whole; and it will be their own faults if the several States suffer the federal sovereignty to interfere in things of their respective jurisdictions. An instance of such interference with regard to any single State will be a dangerous precedent as to all, and therefore will be guarded against by all, as the trustees or servants of the several States will not dare, if they retain their senses, so to violate the independent sovereignty of their respective States, that justly darling object of American affections, to which they are responsible, besides being engaged by all the charities of life.

Trial by jury, and the dependence of taxation upon representation, those cornerstones of liberty, were not obtained by a bill of rights or any other records, and have not been and cannot be preserved by them. They and all other rights must be preserved, by soundness of sense and honesty of heart. Com-

There is another improvement equally deserving regard, and that is the varied representation of sovereignties and people in the Constitution now proposed.

It has been said that this representation was a mere compromise.

It was not a mere compromise. The equal representation of each State with equal suffrage in one branch of the legislature was an original substantive proposition made in the convention at Philadelphia in 1787, very soon after the draft offered by Virginia, to which last mentioned State United America is much indebted not only in other respects, but for her merit in the origination and prosecution of this momentous business.

The proposition was expressly made by the delegate who brought it forward upon this principle that a territory of such extent as that of United America could not be safely and advantageously governed, but by a combination of republics, each retaining all the rights of supreme sovereignty, excepting such as ought to be contributed to the Union; that for the securer preservation of these sovereignties they ought to be represented in a body by themselves and with equal suffrage, and that they would be annihilated if both branches of the legislature were to be formed of representatives of the people in proportion to the number of inhabitants in each State.¹

The principle lately mentioned appears to be well founded in reason. Why cannot a very extensive territory be ruled by a government of republican form? It is answered because its power must languish through distance of parts. Granted if it be not a "body by joints and bands having nourishment ministered and knit together." If it be such a body, the objection is removed. Instead of such a perfect body framed upon the principle that commands men to associate and societies to confederate; that which by communicating and extending happiness corresponds with the gracious intentions of our Maker towards us his creatures; what is proposed? Truly, that the natural legs and arms of this body should be cut off because they are too weak and their places supplied by stronger limbs of wood and metal.

America is, and will be, divided into several sovereign States, each possessing every power proper for governing within its own limits for its own purposes and also for acting as a member of the Union.

They will be civil and military stations conveniently planted throughout the empire with lively and regular communications. A stroke, a touch upon any part, will be immediately felt by the whole. Rome, famed for imperial arts, had a glimpse of this great truth, and endeavored, as well as her hard-hearted policy would permit, to realize it in her colonies. They were miniatures of the capital, but wanted the vital principle of sovereignty, and were too small. They were melted down into or overwhelmed by the nations around them. Were they now existing, they might be called curious automata—something like to our living originals. These will bear a remarkable resemblance to the mild features of patriarchal government, in which each son ruled his own household, and in other matters the whole family was directed by the common ancestor.

Can any government be devised that will be more suited to citizens who wish for equal freedom and common prosperity, better calculated for preventing corruption of manners,¹ for advancing the improvements that ennobles or adorn life, or that can be more conformed to the understanding, to the best affections, to the very nature of man? What harvests of happiness may grow from the seeds of liberty that are now sowing? The cultivation will indeed demand continual attention, unceasing diligence, and frequent conflict with difficulties, but to object against the benefits offered to us by our Creator, by excepting to the terms annexed, is a crime to be equaled only by its folly.

Objection. The Constitution is admittedly not perfect. Before it is adopted it should be thoroughly discussed that proper alterations may be made.

Reply. As to alterations a little experience will cast more light upon the subject than a multitude of debates. Whatever qualities are possessed by those who object, they will have the candor to confess that they will be encountered by opponents, not in any respect inferior, and yet differing from them in judgment upon every point they have mentioned.

Such untired industry to serve their country did the delegates to the federal convention exert that they not only labored to form the best plan they could, but provided for making at any time amendments on the authority of the people without shaking the stability of the Government.

Thus by a gradual progress we may from time to time introduce every improvement in our Constitution that shall be found suitable to our situation.

¹ Education is the best institution for preventing corruption of manners; and progress of knowledge the most successful foe to religious and civil despotism. By wise legislators, instruction will be relied on vastly more than punishments. Of these the most effectual regulation will be their certainty, not severity.—J. D.

INTRODUCTION TO THE FEDERALIST

ALEXANDER HAMILTON

After full experience of the insufficiency of the existing Federal Government you are invited to deliberate upon a new Constitution for the United States of America. The subject speaks its own importance, comprehending in its consequences nothing less than the existence of the Union, the safety and welfare of the parts of which it is composed, the fate of an empire, in many respects the most interesting in the world. It has been frequently remarked that it seems to have been reserved to the people of this country to decide by their conduct and example the important question whether societies of men are really capable or not of establishing good government from reflection and choice, or whether they are forever destined to depend for their political constitutions on accident and force. If there be any truth in the remark, the crisis at which we are arrived may, with propriety, be regarded as the period when that decision is to be made, and a wrong election of the part we shall act may, in this view, deserve to be considered as the general misfortune of mankind.

This idea, by adding the inducements of philanthropy to those of patriotism, will heighten the solicitude which all considerate and good men must feel for the event. Happy will it be if our choice should be directed by a judicious estimate of our true interests, uninfluenced by considerations foreign to the public good. But this is more ardently to be wished for than seriously to be expected. The plan offered to our deliberations affects too many particular interests, innovates upon too many local institutions, not to involve in its discussion a variety of objects extraneous to its merits and of views, passions, and prejudices little favorable to the discovery of truth.

Among the most formidable of the obstacles which the new Constitution will have to encounter may readily be distinguished the obvious interest of a certain class of men in every State to resist all changes which may hazard a diminution of the power, emolument, and consequence of the offices they hold under the State establishments . . . and the perverted ambition of another class of men who will either hope to aggrandize themselves by the confusions of their country or will flatter themselves with fairer prospects of elevation from the subdivision of the empire into several partial confederacies than from its union under one government.

It is not, however, my design to dwell upon observations

THE FEDERALIST PAPERS

From October 27, 1787, to April 2, 1788, there appeared in The Independent Journal and other newspapers of New York a series of seventy-seven papers signed "Publius," explaining and justifying the Constitution. They created a great interest throughout the country, and were shortly afterwards collected and published in book form under title of "The Federalist," eight essays being added, making a total of eighty-five. They were written by Alexander Hamilton, James Madison and John Jay, to whose authorship have been assigned by the historians, respectively, 51, 29, and 5 of the essays. Hamilton discussed all phases of the subject, especially finance; Madison treated particularly of the relation between Federal and State powers; Jay dealt almost exclusively with foreign relations. Hamilton is credited with being the originator of the series, it being his intention to convert the State of New York, which was strongly inclined to reject the Constitution, to its adoption. Not only was this accomplished, but the papers had a profound influence in other States as well. In completeness of exposition, force of argument, and in literary style they far surpassed all other publications upon the subject, and remain to-day the most authoritative commentary on the Constitution, being recognized as such by the courts. Many editions of the work have been published, the most fully edited and indexed being that by Paul Leicester Ford (1898). A number of editions have been prepared as text-books on the Constitution, the handiest of these being by Henry Cabot Lodge (1888), the present Senator from Massachusetts. To these editions the reader of GREAT DEBATES who desires to pursue further the study of the Constitution is referred. Space is available here for only the introduction and conclusion by Hamilton, and a digest of the intervening argument.

In the "Introduction" Hamilton lays down the general principles upon which discussion should be conducted, and it therefore should be carefully perused by every one desiring to fit himself for public speaking.

of this nature. I am aware it would be desingenuous to resolve indiscriminately the oppression of any set of men into interested or ambitious views merely because their situations might subject them to suspicion. Candor will oblige us to admit that even such men may be actuated by upright intentions, and it cannot be doubted that much of the opposition which has already shown itself or that may hereafter make its appearance will spring from sources blameless at least, if not respectable . . . the honest errors of minds led astray by preconceived jealousies and fears. So numerous indeed and so powerful are the causes which serve to give a false bias to the judgment that we, upon many occasions, see wise and good men on the wrong as well as on the right side of questions of the first magnitude to society. This circumstance, if duly attended to, would always furnish a lesson of moderation to those who are engaged in any controversy, however well persuaded of being in the right. And a further reason for caution in this respect might be drawn from the reflection that we are not always sure that those who advocate the truth are actuated by purer principles than their antagonists. Ambition, avarice, personal animosity, party opposition, and many other motives not more laudable than these are apt to operate as well upon those who support as upon those who oppose the right side of a question. Were there not even these inducements to moderation, nothing could be more ill-judged than that intolerant spirit which has at all times characterized political parties. For in politics as in religion it is equally absurd to aim at making proselytes by fire and sword. Heresies in either can rarely be cured by persecution.

And yet, just as these sentiments must appear to candid men, we have already sufficient indications that it will happen in this, as in all former cases of great national discussion. A torrent of angry and malignant passions will be let loose. To judge from the conduct of the opposite parties we shall be led to conclude that they will mutually hope to evince the justness of their opinions and to increase the number of their converts by the loudness of their declamations and by the bitterness of their invectives. An enlightened zeal for the energy and efficiency of government will be stigmatized as the offspring of a temper fond of power and hostile to the principles of liberty. An over-scrupulous jealousy of danger to the rights of the people which is more commonly the fault of the head than of the heart will be represented as mere pretence and artifice . . . the stale bait for popularity at the expense of public good. It will be forgotten on the one hand that jealousy is the usual concomitant of violent love and that the noble enthusiasm of liberty is too apt to be infected with a spirit of narrow and illiberal distrust. On the other hand it will be equally forgotten that the vigor of government is essential to the security of liberty; that in the contemplation of a sound and well-informed judgment their interests can never be separated, and that a dangerous ambition more often lurks behind the specious mask of zeal for the rights of the people than under the forbidding appearance of zeal for the firmness and efficiency of government. History will teach us that the former has been found a much more certain road to the introduction of despotism than the latter, and that of those men who have overturned the liberties of republics the greatest number have begun their career by paying an obsequious court to the people, commencing demagogues and ending tyrants.

In the course of the preceding observations it has been my aim, fellow-citizens, to put you upon your guard against all attempts, from whatever quarter, to influence your decision in a matter of the utmost moment to your welfare by any impressions other than those which may result from the evidence of truth. You will no doubt at the same time have collected from the general scope of them that they proceed from a source not unfriendly to the new Constitution. Yes, my countrymen, I own to you that after having given it an attentive consideration I am clearly of opinion it is your interest to adopt it. I am convinced that this is the safest course for your liberty, your dignity, and your happiness. I affect not reserves which I do not feel. I will not amuse you with an appearance of deliberation when I have decided. I frankly acknowledge to you my convictions and I will freely lay before you the reasons on which they are founded. The consciousness of good intentions disdains ambiguity. I shall not however multiply professions on this head. My motives must remain in the depository of my own breast; my arguments will be open to all and may be judged of by all. They shall at least be offered in a spirit which will not disgrace the cause of truth.

I propose in a series of papers to discuss the following interesting particulars: The utility of the Union to your political prosperity. The insufficiency of the present Confederation to preserve that Union. The necessity of a government at least equally energetic with the one proposed to the attainment of this object. The conformity of the proposed Constitution to the true principles of republican government. Its analogy to your own State constitution, and, lastly, The additional security which its adoption will afford to the preservation of that species of government to liberty and to property.

In the progress of this discussion I shall endeavor to give a satisfactory answer to all the objections which shall have made their appearance that may seem to have any claim to attention.

It may perhaps be thought superfluous to offer arguments to prove the utility of the Union, a point, no doubt, deeply engraved on the hearts of the great body of the people in every State, and one which, it may be imagined, has no adversaries. But the fact is that we already hear it whispered in the private circles of those who oppose the new Constitution that the thirteen States are of too great extent for any general system, and that we must of necessity resort to separate confederacies of distinct portions of the whole. This doctrine will, in all probability, be gradually propagated till it has votaries enough to countenance its open avowal. For nothing can be more evident to those who are able to take an enlarged view of the subject than the alternative of an adoption of the Constitution or a dismemberment of the Union. It may, therefore, be essential to examine particularly the advantages of that Union, the certain evils and the probable dangers to which every State will be exposed from its dissolution. This shall accordingly be done.

DIGEST OF THE ARGUMENTS OF THE FEDERALIST

HAMILTON, MADISON, AND JAY

I. The Utility of the Union to the Political Prosperity of the People.

The Union will promote prosperity in political relations with foreign nations by removing the usual just causes of war (which are violations of compacts through trade), and by improving the administration of government through the employment of better men than those employed in State governments, through uniform interpretation of the compacts and treaties, and by avoidance of local temptation to bad faith to which a single State may yield, and the local prejudices to which it may be subject. Nos. 1-5, J.¹

Peace will be secured through the Union's greater ability to settle amicably a war (if it should arise) by reason of absence of local pride and prejudices, the greater strength of the States when united, the Union's removal beyond the influences of unjust causes (such as superior power of neighboring nations and jealousy of foreign powers from successful trade) and by preventing European alliances with our rival nations.

Prosperity will also be promoted by the Union's abolition of interstate hostilities arising from the jealousy and power of commercial competition and individual passions and influences.

Nos. 6-9, H.

These States, if disunited, would be tempted to war by internal disputes (such as those of the Western lands, New Hampshire grants, etc.), by commercial rivalry (such as jealousy against New York and New Jersey), by apportionment of the federal debt among the States, by local laws violating private contracts between citizens of different States, and by alliances between individual States and foreign powers incompatible with the interests of other States.

These interstate hostilities will lead primarily to great destruction of life and property, and ultimately to the establishment of standing armies, extension of the power of the executive, and elevation of the military over the civil power.

The Union will afford a barrier to domestic faction and insurrection (to which republics are liable and upon which the advocates of despotism rely for argument), by causing every citizen to possess the same opinions, passions, and interests.

When the faction is a minority, both a Union and a confederacy can control it by a regular vote, but when it is a majority, only the Union can do so, because of its distinguishing ability to divide the prevailing influences and prevent their concentration. This ability is increased in ratio of territorial extension. No. 10, M.

The Union will increase commerce with foreign nations by securing uniformity of trade relations, by establishing a federal navy to enforce respect of commercial rights, such as in the fisheries, and the navigation of Western lakes and the Mississippi River, and by the development of a merchant marine.

Nos. 11-13, H.

The Union will afford a better system of national revenue by substituting indirect taxation for direct taxation, to which the "genius of the people" is opposed.

The Union will increase national revenue by preventing illicit trade, and interstate rivalry to secure trade by reduction of customs duties, and so will obviate the necessity of real estate taxation, which is oppressive, of excise duties, which are small in the agricultural States and hard to collect, and of personal property, which is difficult to trace.

The Union will also increase national revenue by greater economy in administration: there will be but one civil and one military list in place of several which would result from a number of confederacies.

The Constitution supplies an ideal form of government of extensive territory and additions thereto in its limitation of federal jurisdiction to objects of general interest and its provisions for organizing new States. No. 14, M.

The Union will facilitate interstate transportation.

Since all the States are on the frontier, the Union will equally provide for defence against foreign aggression.

II. The Insufficiency of the Confederation.

The general admission of this, even by the opponents of the Constitution, proves their inconsistency. Nos. 15-16, H.

The legislation of the Confederacy is defective in raising men and money.

The Confederacy lacks that authority over the persons of the citizens which is the essential foundation of a government. It cannot inflict penalties on offenders against federal laws, such as magistrates.

The Confederacy cannot coerce by arms States offending against federal laws. Branches of these laws are certain to arise by reason of the passions and interests of individual members of the States who are in power, and by the impatience of control which arises from the sovereign power of the States. Such offences have already occurred. If coercion is attempted by the Confederation, it would be productive of constant Wars through counter-alliance, either of the offending States or of an offending State or States with a foreign nation or nations, and these wars would ultimately lead to a military despotism and the death of liberty.

The Union being established on the responsibility of individual citizens who elect the national representatives, thus placing them in national matters above individuals in power in the State governments, would be enabled to coerce by arms offenders against national laws, the State governments being powerless to interfere by reason of public opinion against such interference.

The Federal Government under the Constitution would not invade the reserved rights of the States, first, because of lack of inducement, and, secondly, because the federal representatives of the States could frustrate such invasion if it were attempted.

Nos. 17-19, M.

There is greater danger that the delegated rights of the Federal Government will be invaded by the State governments because of their more immediate influence over the people of the diffusive construction of the Federal Government, and of the superior intensity of popular interest in local over national interests.

The Confederacy is defective because of the total want of a sanction to its laws, having no power to exact obedience or punish disobedience, since it has received no express delegation of authority to use force against the States.

No. 21, M.

The Confederacy is defective because there is no mutual guaranty of the States to obey its federal laws, nor has it authority to assist a State in enforcing the State's own laws as in the case of Shay's Rebellion.

The Confederacy is defective because the State contributions to the common treasury are by quotas. This rule is based on a false presumption that there is a common measure of national wealth, and it is therefore inequitable. The national government should raise its revenues by duties on consumption which will be equitably raised from individuals throughout the entire Union, provided that the dutiable articles will be so selected that each citizen can regulate his consumption of them according to his resources. The rates of the duties will not become oppressive, since if they are either too high or too low the total revenue therefrom will be diminished. Indirect taxation of this sort is preferable to direct taxation proportioned either on the value of land or population, because it is an "Herculean task" to obtain a valuation of land, especially in an unsettled and rapidly improving country such as the United States, and because population, while a better and more convenient standard, is still not a true measure of wealth.

The Confederacy is defective because of the want of a power to regulate commerce by the formation of commercial treaties.

Nos. 22-35, H.

The Confederacy is defective because of its raising troops by quotas, which is very expensive, inadequate for defence, and unequal in the burden it imposes on the various States.

Representation in the Confederacy is unjust to the more populous States. A majority of the small States contains a minority of the population of all, and the large States would in time rebel against their domination.

The Confederacy is defective because of want of a judiciary power, to expound and define the true meaning and operation of the laws, to construe foreign treaties, and to secure uniformity in legal decisions.

The Confederacy is defective in that it has never been ratified by the people.

III. The Necessity of a Constitution at Least Equally Energetic to the One Proposed to Preserve the Union.

Such a Constitution must provide for the common defence. The power to do so should be without limitation, because of unforeseen exigencies which may arise.

There is no adequate provision for the common defence in the Confederation, hence its failure.

A standing army is no menace, since it will be controlled by the legislative department elected by the people. The power of Congress to provide for the common defence is expressly limited by the Constitution. The constant danger of the United States from foreign and Indian hostilities and the demand of our growing commerce for protection are justifications of this power.

It would be an inversion of the primary principle of our association to place the common defence in the care of the individual States, since this would be oppressive to some of the States, and dangerous to all, and create jealousies between them. Besides, it would afford a temptation to the States to invade the constitutional authority of the Union.

The militia of the States is inadequate for the common defence, lacking vigor and stability, and being uneconomical.

A standing army in times of external peace is sometimes necessary—witness present disorders in Pennsylvania, and recent ones in Massachusetts. It will not threaten the liberties of the people, since Congress has authority in the matter, and the subject must be reconsidered every two years, thus preventing conspiracy, which requires time to be matured.

The standing army will not as a rule be required to enforce the laws of the Union, since the people will obey the Federal Government voluntarily—more willingly perhaps than the State governments, since the former will be the better administered. This superior administration will arise from the greater latitude in the choice of federal officers, causing the most intelligent men to be sent to the House and Senate, as well as the most patriotic, and therefore the least inclined to faction. The Federal Government having public opinion behind it will be able to suppress sedition in the States without force, employing the ordinary magistracy of each State in the execution of its laws. The mere knowledge that the Federal Government can, if it will, use a force sufficient to execute its laws will prevent the occasion for employing this force.

In any form of federal government force would have to be employed at times. The present form, where this force is controlled by the people through Congress, is the best for the purpose. If Congress betrays the people, there is left the same recourse to self-defence as when a State legislature betrays the people, and, in addition, the assistance of the State against the federal usurpation.

A general power of taxation is necessary in every constitution to obviate official plunder and general atrophy of the government. The want of it in the Confederation has produced disaster. This power should extend to internal taxation, or the national revenues will be insufficient, causing recourse to the vicious system of requisitions upon the States. This system is vicious because (1) it cannot be depended on, (2) it diverts to Federal uses funds that would otherwise be used for needed State purposes, (3) it destroys public credit, (4) it renders loans difficult to be procured, and (5) it tends toward general disaster. On the contrary, internal taxation will (1) develop the resources of the country, (2) and render loans to supply deficiencies easy to procure, because of the increase of national credit by the new power delegated to the national Government.

The power of internal taxation delegated to a Federal Government will not interfere with State levies of money, since the good sense of the people, expressed through their representatives in Congress, will be a barrier to the oppressive use of this power; the hazard of provoking State resentment will be a second barrier, and the recognition by Congress that the Union is founded on the prosperity of its parts a third. Besides, the States would still retain an independent and uncontrollable authority to raise their own revenues. The sovereignty of the Federal Government is limited to grants made in express terms in the Constitution, (1) similar to, but not conflicting with those in the States, (2) expressly prohibitory of like authority in the States, and (3) implicitly contradictory and repugnant to similar authority in the States. The only exclusive power of taxation delegated to the Federal Government is that of imposing taxes on imports, and therefore the States may freely impose all other taxes. This concurrent authority is a necessary result of the division of the sovereign power made by the Constitution.

The incidental powers in connection with taxation possessed by Congress under the Constitution are necessary to any form of national government. Power to levy taxes carries with it the authority to enforce the power. This executive power is expressed in the Constitution, not because it was necessary, but by way of caution. The exercise of the taxing power is in the discretion of Congress, whose constituents are the ultimate judges of it. The constitutionality of any measure, such as of taxation, would be determined by the nature of the power on which it was founded. Thus, if Congress, on the pretence of an interference with national revenues, should undertake to abrogate a land tax imposed by a State, it would be evident that this was an invasion of concurrent jurisdiction of Union and State. Acts of Congress not pursuant to the Constitution are usurpations, and should and would be resisted.

The taxing power of the Union must be supreme to be operative, since all laws must be supreme to those to whom they apply; therefore, concurrent authority concerning all taxation save customs duties was the only device which would be adopted to make the Union effective and at the same time prevent the entire subordination of the States.

This coordinate sovereignty is entirely practicable, as proved by its successful operation in the Roman empire, where the difficulties interfering with its execution were greater than in the United States.

Greater power in raising revenue is needed by the Federal Government than by the States, since it must provide for various purposes and future contingencies such as the public defence and payment of national debts, with which the State governments are not concerned.

The jurisdiction of the national Government in revenue matters should not be restricted to particular objects, since this would oppress particular branches of industry and distribute the burden of taxation unequally. If the jurisdiction is limited to a tariff, duties might be raised too high in the false hope that this would produce greater revenue, thus really decreasing revenue, as well as fostering monopolies in manufacture, diverting industry from its natural channels, and oppressing the merchant by impairing his capital through his inability to shift the tax upon consumers, and so operating against the citizens of importing States and in favor of those of non-importing and manufacturing States.

Representation in the House of Representatives is sufficiently large to represent adequately all classes in the country. Merchants, because of their better education, are the national representatives of the mechanic and manufacturing classes, whose interests are at one with their own. Members of the learned professions have no distinct interests in society, and will be indiscriminately the choice of community, according to their talents. The large landholder and the middling farmer are affected in the same manner by legislation, and, judging by the choice of State legislators, the latter is more apt to be sent to Congress than the former. The merchants and the landholders will represent broadly the industrial and agricultural interests of the country, with the professional men as arbiters between them. The best representative is he who, whatever his profession, has the most extensive information, especially in matters pertaining to political economy, and who has a sympathetic knowledge of the interests and feelings of the people.

It is not necessary that every locality be represented in Congress. Members from each State can obtain the necessary information about its interests and desires.

The Constitution empowers Congress to levy a direct tax upon each State in proportion to its population. This power need not be exercised, and, if it proves inconvenient, the old system of requisitions may be resorted to.

While it is true that the Federal Government may duplicate taxes imposed by the State government, and so increase expense of collection, and excite the indignation of the people, these very results are likely to prevent Congress from attempting anything of the kind, and to cause it to rely for revenue upon its exclusive power to levy customs duties.

A proper Federal Government requires the power of regulating the militia and of commanding its services in times of insurrection and invasion, since uniformity in organization and discipline can be obtained only in this manner. The authority retained by the States to appoint the officers of the militia is a sufficient safeguard against the wrongful employment of the militia against a State.

IV. The Conformity of the Proposed Constitution to the True Principles of Republican Government.

Allowances should be made for the inherent difficulties in framing the Constitution: such as the difficulty of combining the requisite stability and energy in government with a due regard to liberty and the republican form; the difficulty of marking the proper line of partition between the authority of the general Government and that of the State governments; the difficulty arising from the interfering pretensions of the larger and the smaller States; and the difficulty arising from other combinations of the States resulting from a difference of local position and policy. No. 36, H.

On the other hand, the convention was free from party animosities, and all the demands of the various deputations were finally satisfied.

All former national constitutions have been framed by a single individual, to which fact were due their defects, which therefore may be presumed to be absent in the workings of this Constitution.

The errors of the present Constitution will arise because of lack of experience in the innovations introduced in it, rather than because of want of thought in preparing them.

Nos. 37-58, M.

The Constitution is certainly an improvement on the Articles of Confederation; if it is not, let the objectors to it improve on it. Their objections certainly apply with more point against the old Articles than against the Constitution.

The proposed Constitution conforms to the standard of republican government as fixed by the governments of Holland, England, etc., in (1) the tenure of its offices, and (2) its prohibition of titles of nobility.

It will be founded on the ratification by the several States.

The sources of power of the proposed government are: (1) the people of America, as represented in the House of Representatives; (2) the States, as represented in the Senate; and (3) people and States, as represented in the Executive. These are also the sources of authority for the amendments to the Constitution.

The convention acted in framing the Constitution within its authority, which was "to establish in these States a firm national government, adequate to the exigencies of government and the preservation of the Union," "by making alterations and provisions in the articles of confederation," the same to be submitted to Congress and the States for ratification. The proposed system is therefore harmless until so ratified and, even if the convention exceeded its powers, this defect will be cured by such ratification.

The aggregate of the power given by the Constitution to the Federal Government is no less than it should be.

A Federal Government ought to have discretionary powers, in peace as well as in war, to provide against foreign danger, as well as the power of levying and borrowing money. Such powers are given in the Constitution. They are, indeed, copied from the old system, differing only therefrom in being made effective, though with all proper restrictions cast about them.

So, too, such a government should have power to send and receive ambassadors and consuls and to make treaties; to punish piracies and felonies on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations; and to regulate foreign commerce. These powers are given in the Constitution. Owing to objections of certain States, the regulation of the slave trade was deferred until after a not distant year [1808], and before this time it may be regulated, or even abolished, with the concurrence of the objecting States.

Such a government should have power to maintain harmony and proper intercourse between the States. To this end the Constitution regulates trade with the Indians, coins money, and punishes counterfeiters, fixes the standard weights and measures, establishes a uniform rule of naturalization and a uniform law of bankruptcy, establishes a rule for proving the acts of the several States and determining their effect in other States, and establishes post-offices and post-roads.

Such a government should have power to pass patent and copyright laws, to legislate over the federal district, to punish treason, to admit new States, to govern the territories and other public property, to guarantee every State a republican form of government, to protect the States against invasion and domestic violence, to assume and control the payment of the public debt, and to provide for amendments to the Constitution, all of which powers are provided in the Constitution.

The provision that the Constitution shall be adopted upon the ratification of nine States is as just as it is necessary, since the dissenting States are left voluntarily in their present position save that the former contract of the confederation has already been legally dissolved, and may rightly be declared to have been dissolved because of its many infractions by the very dissenting States. The Constitution is silent on what relations shall exist between the Union and the dissenting States. This is for Congress and the dissenting States to decide, and it will undoubtedly, in view of common interest, be arranged with moderation on one side and prudence on the other.

The Constitution, in further enforcement of its sovereign powers, restricts the authority of the several States as to treaty-making, war-making, coinage and currency, the passage of bills of attainder, etc., as well as to the passage of such acts injurious to popular democratic rights as ex post facto laws, laws impairing contracts, and establishment of titles of nobility, and it denies them the power delegated exclusively to Congress of levying customs duties.

A Federal Government should have the authority to make all laws necessary to execute its rightful powers. This the Constitution gives. The people, by their power over their Representatives in Congress, will prevent all usurpation which might result from such authority.

The Constitution rightly requires, in self-defence, that the various officers of the State governments, no less than of the Federal Government, be bound by oath to support it.

The Constitution will not prove fatal to the State governments, because of the tendency in all confederacies to diminish rather than increase the federal powers. Since the State governments possess more influence among the people, the State employees are more numerous than the national, and the State powers are greater than the national.

The proposed changes consist less in the addition of new powers to the Union than in the invigoration of its old ones. The State and the Federal Governments are only different agents for the people, with different powers and for different purposes. If popular favor should rest on the Federal Government, it would be only because it was better administered. There would be no danger of the Federal Government coercing the people, because of the high impossibility of collecting a force for such a purpose, and, if it should be collected, because of the superior power of the militia to overcome it.

In such a government the three parts, the legislative, executive, and judicial, should be separate and distinct, and yet, at the same time, be so far connected and blended as to give to each a constitutional control over the others, without any one possessing the supremacy. Mr. Jefferson proposed to counteract the tendency of the legislature to gain dominance by an appeal to the people, by two-thirds of the members of the other departments. This would be ineffective in opposing a combination of two branches of the Government for control, and unwise in that frequent appeals would impair the confidence of the people in the Government and disturb the public peace, while the legislature, which, as the people's representatives, would have to put their will into effect, would still control the decision. The best way in which to prevent the dominance of one branch over the others is constitutional. Thus the members of each branch should have little to do in the appointment of members of the others or with their emoluments, and the executive, in particular, should have a veto over legislation. This is the plan of the present Constitution.

The House of Representatives is made by the Constitution the popular branch of Congress. In order not to interfere with the suffrage systems of the States, the Constitution fixed the qualifications of electors of Representatives in each State as those of the electors of the most numerous branch of the legislature of that State. Elections to the House were made biennial, frequent elections being considered a necessity for the proper voicing of the will of the people, yet annual elections, being thought too frequent for a body of legislators in whom experience in national legislation is a desirable qualification.

The apportionment of Representatives among the States was made on population in order that it be truly popular.

In this apportionment three-fifths of the slaves were reckoned, slaves partaking partly of the nature of persons and partly of the nature of property, even in the laws of the slave-holding States. Now it is right that property as well as persons should be represented in Congress. There will be no inducement for falsifying the census in the matter of slave population, as the measure for representation is also the measure of taxation.¹

The number of Representatives is not too small for thorough discussion and freedom from combination for improper purposes, nor too large for well-considered and temperate debate. As the country grows the representation will keep pace with its needs.

Since the members of the House will be elected by all classes and conditions of citizens, they will naturally be selected from all classes and conditions, and the desire for reelection will cause them to legislate for all classes and conditions, the more, too, because their private interests will be affected by the legislation in the same manner as the private interests of their constituents.

A bare majority of Representatives properly forms a quorum, and a bare majority of the quorum properly passes measures, since, if a two-thirds majority were required, the principle of democracy might be violated by an obstructing minority.

Power is given Congress to regulate its elections, because of the primary right of self-preservation. Otherwise the existence of the Union would be entirely at the mercy of the State governments. If Congress should attempt to promote the election of some favorite class of men, this design would be frustrated by an immediate revolt of the people, led by their State governments, as well as the Senate. Nos. 59-61, H.

The Senate is made by the Constitution the peculiar represensation of the States in the national legislature, the mixed character of the Federal Government requiring a mixed representation. The recognition of State sovereignty in the Senate furnishes a security against legislation destructive of the equal rights of the States. The Senate is also a check against all hasty and ill-considered legislation. Its membership does not change so often as that in the House of Representatives, thus giving the element of stability in our laws which is demanded, especially by the business interests.

The Senate will add a conservative force in our national councils which will attract the respect of foreign nations and enable us to form advantageous political and commercial relations with them.

The Senate will also defend the people against their own temporary errors and delusions. Nos. 62, 63, M.

History informs us of no long-lived republic which had not a senate. It also proves the objection groundless that the Senate will gradually acquire a dangerous preëminence in the Government and finally transform it into a tyrannical aristocracy. Besides, the House of Representatives will be a sufficient check against such an usurpation.

The important treaty-making power has been given the Senate rather than the House of Representatives from the more intimate acquaintance by the Senate with public affairs, and its farther removal from the influence of the temporary passions of the people. Its proceedings will undoubtedly be secret, and secrecy and despatch are often required in foreign relations.

Treaties are international bargains and are, therefore, made supreme laws, above mere legislative acts, in order not to be subject to repeal at the passing whim of the people. Since all the States are equally represented in the Senate, there is no fear, in treaties or other acts in which it has a deciding vote, that the interests of one State will be unfairly dealt with.

The Senate, rather than the Supreme Court, has been made the court of impeachment. The Supreme Court, with its limited membership, might not possess the fortitude or credit with the people requisite to execute the duties of the trust, and, as impeachment will not end the proceedings, it would be improper to bring the offender twice before the same court. No. 64, J.

The remaining numbers, 65 to 85, are by Hamilton.

The objection that legislative and judicial authority should not be united in the same body is ill-founded—witness the successful working of this union in the constitution of New York State.

In appointments the Senate does not choose, but merely ratifies, and so there is no fear that it will be too lenient a judge of officers.

Because of its joint-agency with the President in treaty-making, in which two-thirds of the Senate must concur, there is little danger of corrupt or perfidious action and of the consequent result that Senators may be called on to impeach themselves for such action. Indeed, there would be no need of impeachment, since they already would be disgraced.

The President is designed by the Constitution to possess the dignity and power due to the head of the nation, without the prerogatives of a monarch. It was desirable that the sense of the people should operate in choosing him; and yet that the choice be made by competent persons, guarded from all chance of cabal, intrigue, and corruption. This was arranged for, both in his case, and that of the Vice-President.

The President is elected for four years and is reëligible as often as the people shall think him worthy of their confidence. Such reëlection of the chief magistrate is common in State governments, where a dangerous influence is far more likely to be formed than in the nation, and it has not been found an evil practice.

As a check upon executive tyranny the President is made liable to impeachment, trial, removal from office, and subsequent imprisonment, unlike the Governors of Maryland and Delaware.

The President has the power to veto an act of Congress, which, nevertheless, Congress may pass over his veto by a two-thirds majority. This is the case with the Governor of Massachusetts in respect to the legislature.

The President is Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy, just as the Governor of New York is of the State militia.

He has power to pardon offenders against the law, except in cases of impeachment. The Governor of New York may pardon in these excepted cases, when they are not treason and murder.

The President may adjourn Congress only in case of disagreement about the time of adjournment. The Governor of New York may prorogue the legislature in any case for a limited time.

The President, as the recognized head of the nation, has the power of making treaties and appointing ministers, but only with the concurrence of the Senate. In this his authority differs in nature from that of a State executive, and necessarily so because of the Union's exclusive sovereignty on the point.

For convenience the President is authorized to receive foreign ministers, Congress not always being in session.

No defender, therefore, of the State constitutions can rightly object to the powers of the national executive.

The Constitution wisely has placed the executive power in the hands of one man, thus concentrating energy of action and responsibility for conduct, as well as reducing expense.

The Constitution has wisely rendered the President independent in his actions, by his reasonably long term of office, and by his coordinate powers with the other two branches of government.

The heads of the various executive departments, being deputies of the President, are rightly appointed by him and responsible to him. When the person of the executive changes, these will probably change. Therefore stability in government will be promoted by continuance of the same man in the office of President.

Eligibility to reelection is also a good feature in that it affords inducements to good behavior.

The emolument of the President is fixed by Congress, thus making him independent of Congress, whose tool he might be if they determined his compensation.

A veto power is given him in order to defend himself from legislative aggressions, and the people from improper legislation, and yet this veto is limited to prevent executive usurpation. The Governor of Massachusetts has a similar power.

The President is assisted by a cabinet composed of heads of the executive departments, from whom he may require opinions.

He has the power of *pardon*ing offenders against the laws of the Union. The criminal code of every country partakes so much of necessary severity that, without an easy access to exceptions in favor of unfortunate guilt, justice would wear a countenance too sanguinary and cruel. Concurrence of the legislature in cases of treason is not required, since a well-timed offer of pardon to insurgents may quell a rebellion, which would have made too much headway before the legislature could be convened.

Since treaty-making is both an executive and legislative function, it is committed to the President and the Senate in combination.

The appointment of certain officers is given to the President in connection with the Senate because it would be impracticable to leave it to the people. The delegation of this to one man will beget a livelier sense of duty and greater regard to reputation on the part of the officers. The necessary concurrence by the Senate will afford a check on the favoritism of the executive, and the prohibition of a Senator to hold office will prevent an improper use of this check. To add to the concurrence of the House of Representatives in appointments would occasion infinite delays and embarrassments.

The President has the necessary executive powers of communicating to Congress information (which he receives through the departments) of the state of the Union, recommending measures which he deems expedient, convening one or both branches of Congress on extraordinary occasions, adjourning Congress in case of a disagreement concerning time of adjournment, receiving ambassadors and other public ministers, executing the laws of the Union, and commissioning all the officers of the United States.

The tenure by which the Federal judges hold their offices is unobjectionable because similar to that of the judiciary in several States. Being the weakest of the three departments of government, the executive holding the sword, and the legislative the purse, it is made completely independent of the other two, both in powers and emolument. Its authority to pronounce legislative acts void because contrary to the Constitution does not indicate superiority to the legislature except in cases where the legislature is violating the will of the people as previously determined upon. The Constitution ought to be preferred to the statute; the intention of the people to the intention of their agents.

The Federal judiciary is designed to be an intermediate body between the people and the legislature, to keep the latter within its assigned limits and protect the rights of individuals from laws.

The court is designed also to intervene, in times of popular passion, between the Constitution and both legislature and people, in order to prevent changes in the fundamental law of the land except by the process laid down in the Constitution, and to protect the rights of individuals guaranteed in it.

In order to prevent corruption among these judges they may be impeached for malconduct by the House of Representatives and tried by the Senate. To impeach them for inability, except in the case of insanity, gives an opportunity for abuse of legislative power and, hence, this was not permitted.

The powers of the judiciary necessarily extend to all cases: (1) which concern the execution of the provisions in the Constitution; (2) in which the United States are a party; (3) which involve the peace of the Union (foreign and interstate relations); (4) which are of maritime jurisdiction; and (5) wherein State tribunals cannot be supposed to be impartial and unbiased (territorial disputes).

The Constitution provides for "one court of supreme and final jurisdiction," and inferior courts, thus securing adjudication of important cases by the greater legal ability.

Congress cannot rectify the effect of these adjudications except in the future, when it can do so by the passage of new laws.

Original jurisdiction in the supreme court is only in diplomatic affairs, and in cases in which a State is a party.

It is inherent in the nature of a sovereignty not to be amenable to the suit of an individual without the sovereign's consent. Hence an assignment of the public securities of one State to the citizens of another would not enable these citizens to sue that State in the Federal courts.

The supreme court has "appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact." This does not necessarily imply a reexamination in common law cases of facts decided by juries in the inferior courts, for such is not the legal custom; in civil law cases, however, reexamination of facts is agreeable to usage. Congress certainly has power to prohibit reexamination of facts in the former cases.

The State courts will retain the jurisdiction they now have, except where it has been expressly delegated to the Federal courts. There is thus concurrent State and Federal jurisdiction as well as legislation.

Congress may commit certain legislation to the jurisdiction of the Federal courts without divesting the State courts of their primitive jurisdiction further than may relate to an appeal, nor of the right to take cognizance of causes which may arise out of such legislation.

An appeal will lie from the State courts to the supreme court of the United States.

The Constitution does not provide for trial by jury in civil cases, because, while trial by jury is essential in criminal cases, it is of relative unimportance in civil cases, as is indicated by the varying usage among the States.

The Constitution could not with propriety adopt the system of one State, and therefore left the question in abeyance, to be settled by Congress.

The Constitution contains no special Bill of Rights, since this is unnecessary, these rights being both expressly and implicitly contained in the body of the instrument, which itself is a bill of rights. Besides, the people will surrender none of these rights in adopting the Constitution, and their future interest in them will be protected by their Representatives in Congress. Indeed, the statement of a bill of rights would be dangerous as implying the grant to the Federal Government of all powers not expressly withheld therefrom.

The Constitution does not provide for debts due to the United States. This is unnecessary, as it is an established rule of national law that "States neither lose any of their rights, nor are discharged from any of their obligations, by a change in the form of their civil government."

The proposed government is economical, the number of State officers being diminished to the extent of the addition of Federal, and the sessions of State legislatures being diminished in number and shortened in duration by the sessions of Congress.

V. Additional Securities to Republican Government

The additional securities to republican government, to liberty, and to property, to be derived from the adoption of the plan under consideration, consist chiefly in the restraints which the preservation of the Union will impose on local factions and insurrections, and on the ambition of powerful individuals in single States, who might acquire credit and influence enough, from leaders and favorites, to become the despots of the people; in the diminution of the opportunities to foreign intrigue, which the dissolution of the Confederacy would invite and facilitate; in the prevention of extensive military establishments, which could not fail to grow out of wars between the States in a disunited situation; in the express guaranty of a republican form of government to each; in the absolute and universal exclusion of titles of nobility; and in the precautions against the repetition of those practices on the part of the State governments which have undermined the foundations of property and credit, have planted mutual distrust in the breasts of all classes of citizens, and have occasioned an almost universal prostration of morals.

VI. Adopt the Constitution and Amend It Afterward.

It is susceptible of absolute demonstration that it will be far more easy to obtain subsequent than previous amendments to the Constitution. The moment an alteration is made in the present plan it becomes, to the purpose of adoption, a new one, and must undergo a new decision of each State. To its complete establishment throughout the Union it will therefore require the concurrence of thirteen States. If, on the contrary, the Constitution proposed should once be ratified by all the States as it stands, alterations in it may at any time be effected by nine States. Here, then, the chances are as thirteen to nine¹ in favor of subsequent amendments, rather than of the original adoption of an entire system.

This is not all. Every Constitution for the United States must inevitably consist of a great variety of particulars, in which thirteen independent States are to be accommodated in their interests or opinions of interest. We may of course expect to see, in any body of men charged with its original formation, very different combinations of the parts upon different points. Many of those who form a majority on one question may become the minority on a second, and an association dissimilar to either may constitute the majority on a third. Hence the necessity of moulding and arranging all the particulars which are to compose the whole, in such a manner as to satisfy all the parties to the compact; and hence, also, an immense multiplication of difficulties and casualties in obtaining the collective assent to a final Act. The degree of that multiplication must evidently be in a ratio to the number of particulars and the number of parties.

But every amendment to the Constitution, if once established, would be a single proposition, and might be brought forward singly. There would then be no necessity for management or compromise, in relation to any other point; no giving, nor taking. The will of the requisite number would at once bring the matter to a decisive issue. And, consequently, whenever nine, or rather ten, States were united in the desire of a particular amendment, that amendment must infallibly take place. There can, therefore, be no comparison between the facility of effecting an amendment and that of establishing in the first instance a complete Constitution.

In opposition to the probability of subsequent amendments, it has been urged that the persons delegated to the administration of the national Government will always be disinclined to yield up any portion of the authority of which they were once possessed. [But] any amendments which may, upon mature consideration, be thought useful will be applicable to the organization of the Government, not to the mass of its powers; and the intrinsic difficulty of governing thirteen States at any rate, independent of calculations upon an ordinary degree of public spirit and integrity, will constantly impose on the national rulers the necessity of a spirit of accommodation to the reasonable expectations of their constituents. But there is yet a further consideration, which proves beyond the possibility of doubt that the observation is futile. It is this, that the national rulers, whenever nine States concur, will have no option upon the subject. By the fifth article of the plan, the Congress will be obliged, "on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States" (which at present amount to nine) "to call a convention for proposing amendments, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, or by conventions in three-fourth thereof." The words of this article are peremptory. The Congress "shall call a convention." Nothing in this particular is left to the discretion of that body. And, of consequence, all the declamation about the disinclination to a change vanishes in air. Now, however difficult it may be supposed to unite two-thirds, or three-fourths, of the State legislatures in amendments which may affect local interests, can there be any room to apprehend any such difficulty in a union on points which are merely relative to the general liberty or security of the people? We may safely rely on the disposition of the State legislatures to erect barriers against the encroachments of the national authority.

VII. Appeal to the People.

It may be in me a defect of political fortitude, but I acknowledge that I cannot entertain an equal tranquillity with those who affect to treat the dangers of a longer continuance in our present situation as imaginary. A nation without a national government is, in my view, an awful spectacle. The establishment of a Constitution, in time of profound peace, by the voluntary consent of a whole people, is a prodigy, to the completion of which I look forward with trembling anxiety. I can reconcile it to no rules of prudence to let go the hold we now have, in so arduous an enterprise, upon seven out of the thirteen States;¹ and after having passed over so considerable a part of the ground to recommence the course. I dread the more the consequences of new attempts, because I know that powerful individuals, in this and in other States, are enemies to a general national government in every possible shape.

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

WE the people of the United States in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

ARTICLE I

SECTION I

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

SECTION II

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined fore Congress on the 2d of July, 1788, and, with the ratifications of the other States, referred to a committee to report an act for carrying the new system into operation. An act for this purpose was reported on the 14th of the same month, but, in consequence of a division as to the place where the first Congress should meet, did not pass until the 13th of September following. By this act the electors of the President were to be appointed on the first Wednesday of January, 1789, and to give in their votes on the first Wednesday of the succeeding February; the first Wednesday of March, being the 4th day of that month, was fixed as the time, and the city of New York as the place, for beginning proceedings under the new Constitution.

THE CONSTITUTION

by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct. The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to choose three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five, and Georgia three.

When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the Executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

The House of Representatives shall choose their speaker and other officers; and shall have the sole power of impeachment.

SECTION III

[The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.¹]

Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided, as equally as may be, into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; [and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments, until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.¹]

No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided.

The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments: when sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside: and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend farther than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law.

SECTION IV

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

SECTION V

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide.

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal.

Neither House, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

effect, shall be approved by him, or, being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

SECTION VIII

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;

To borrow money on the credit of the United States;

To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes;

To establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States;

To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures;

To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States;

To establish post-offices and post roads;

To promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to author. and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries;

To constitute tribunals inferior to the supreme court;

To define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas and offences against the law of nations;

To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water;

To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years;

To provide and maintain a navy;

To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces;

To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions;

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress;

To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over

SECTION VI

The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the treasury of the United States. They shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either House they shall not be questioned in any other place.

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time: and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

SECTION VII

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose, or concur with, amendments, as on other bills.

Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and, if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law. But in all such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the journal of each House respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted), after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law.

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and, before the same shall take such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings;—And

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

SECTION IX

The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year eighteen hundred and eight, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation not exceeding ten dollars for each person.

The privilege of the writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.

No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.

No capitation, or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken.

No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another: nor shall vessels bound to, or from, one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

No money shall be drawn from the treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.

No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any King, prince, or foreign state.

SECTION X

No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money, emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law; or law impairing the obligation of contracts; or grant any title of nobility.

No State shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws: and the net produce of all duties and imposts, laid by any State on imports or exports, shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress.

No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.

ARTICLE II

SECTION I

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice-President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector.

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for two persons, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a list of all the persons voted for, and of the number of votes for each; which list they shall sign and certify and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the president of the Senate. The president of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such majority, and have an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately choose, by ballot, one of them for President; and if no person have a majority, then from the five highest on the list the said House shall, in like manner, choose the President. But in choosing the President the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. In every case, after the choice of the President, the person having the greatest number of votes of the electors shall be the Vice-President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal votes the Senate shall choose from them by ballot the Vice-President.

The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

No person except a natural born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained to the age of thirty-five years, and been fourteen years a resident within the United States.

In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President, and the Congress may, by law, provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected.

The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation, which shall neither be increased or diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.

Before he enter on the execution of his office he shall take the following oath or affirmation: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

SECTION II

The President shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States; he may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the executive departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices; and he shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the supreme court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law: But the Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

SECTION III

He shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and, in case of disagreement between them, with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper; he shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers; he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States.

SECTION IV

The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

ARTICLE III

SECTION I

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior; and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

SECTION II

The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and the treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States—between a State and citizens of another State—between citizens of different States—between citizens of the same State, claiming lands under grants of different States—and between a State or the citizens thereof and foreign states, citizens, or subjects.

In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but, when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed.

SECTION III

Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.

The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attained.

ARTICLE IV

SECTION I

Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may, by general laws, prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof.

SECTION II

The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

No person held to service or labor in one State under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.

SECTION III

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

SECTION IV

The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and, on application of the legislature, or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened), against domestic violence.

ARTICLE V

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress; provided that no amendment which may be made prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight shall, in any manner, affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

ARTICLE VI

All debts contracted and engagements entered into before the adoption of this Constitution shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution as under the Confederation.

This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound, by oath or affirmation, to support this Constitution: but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.

ARTICLE VII

The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION

The subject of amending the Constitution was brought before Congress during its first session by petitions from the States of Virginia and New York, requesting that another convention might be called to take into consideration and report such amendments as they might think proper and best calculated "to promote our common interests, and to secure to ourselves and our latest posterity the great and unalienable rights of mankind." The States of Virginia and New York were both opposed to the Constitution without the amendments proposed in their respective conventions. This opposition was strongly manifested in the legislature of Virginia in the first choice of Senators. Mr. Madison, who had been so instrumental, not only in forming the new system, but in procuring its ratification, though a candidate, lost his election. His opponents, Richard Henry Lee and William Grayson, were chosen. Madison, however, was elected to the House of Representatives. The same legislature requested another general convention.

Congress, however, had no authority to call a convention. Mr. Madison submitted to the House several amendments which, together with those presented by the several States, were referred to a committee consisting of one member from a State with general instructions. Amendments were reported by this committee, and after long debates and various alterations twelve articles were agreed to by both Houses to be submitted to the States, and were so submitted on September 25, 1789.

In the course of the next three years ten of these amendments were ratified by the constitutional majority of the States, an article proposing a fixed ascending scale of Representatives according to population, and an article prohibiting changes in compensation for members of Congress until after an election had intervened, being rejected.

In the course of the discussion in Congress a debate occurred as to whether the amendments should be interwoven into the Constitution or added as a supplement (see "Annals of Congress," August 13, 1789). The supplementary form was decided upon chiefly out of reverence for the Constitution which had already come to be regarded as an "Ark of the Covenant," not to be touched even to steady it.

Article XI, in reference to the judicial power, was passed by Congress in 1794, and declared ratified by three-fourths of the States in 1798.

This amendment arose out of a decision made by the Supreme Court in February 1793. Four of the five judges decided that a State was liable to a suit in favor of an individual. This important and interesting question came before the court in a suit instituted by a citizen of South Carolina (Mr. Chisholm) against the State of Georgia. The State of Georgia did not appear, and the question was argued solely by the Attorney-General of the United States (Edmund Randolph) in favor of the plaintiff.

The decision was grounded on that part of the Constitution establishing the Federal judiciary, which declares that the judicial power should extend among other cases "to controversies between a State and citizens of another State." The court were of opinion that this was not limited to controversies where the State was plaintiff.

In consequence of this decision, in the summer of 1793, a suit was also commenced by an individual against the State of Massachusetts, and suits against other States were no doubt in contemplation. Therefore Congress at the following session passed the Eleventh Amendment.

Article XII, in reference to Presidential and Vice-Presidential elections, was passed by Congress in 1803, and declared ratified in 1804.

Article XIII, in reference to slavery, was passed by Congress and submitted to the States February 1, 1865, and declared ratified on December 18 of that year. For the debate on this amendment see Volume VI, chapter XIV.

Article XIV, in reference to rights of citizenship, was passed by Congress June 16, 1866, and declared ratified on July 28, 1868. For the debate on this amendment, see Volume VII, chapter XII.

Article XV, in reference to equal manhood suffrage, was passed by Congress on February 27, 1869, and declared ratified on March 30, 1870. For the debate on this amendment, see Volume VIII, chapter III.

Article XVI, in reference to the income tax, was passed by Congress on July 12, 1909, and declared ratified on February 25, 1913. For the debate on this amendment, see Volume XII, chapter XVII.

Article XVII, in reference to the popular election of Senators, was passed by Congress on May 15, 1912, and was declared ratified on May 31, 1913. For the debate on this amendment, see Volume IX, chapter XII.

ARTICLE I

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

ARTICLE II

A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

ARTICLE III

No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

ARTICLE IV

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized.

ARTICLE X

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

ARTICLE XI

The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state.

ARTICLE XII

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the president of the Senate. The president of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and, if no person have such majority, then, from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But, in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President shall be the Vice-

ARTICLE V

No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service, in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject, for the same offence, to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb, nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

ARTICLE VI

In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law; and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.

ARTICLE VII

In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.

ARTICLE VIII

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

ARTICLE IX

The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and, if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

ARTICLE XIII

Section 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

Section 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

ARTICLE XIV

Section 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

ARTICLE XV

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

ARTICLE XVI

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

ARTICLE XVII

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution.

INTRODUCTION

INTERNATIONAL RIVALRY IN IDEALS¹

WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN, LL. D.
Secretary of State

WE have reason to look with some degree of pride upon the achievement of the United States; we contemplate the present with satisfaction and look to the future with hope, and yet we may well remember that we are but building upon the foundations that have been laid for us. We did not create the fertile soil that is the basis of our agricultural greatness; the streams that drain and feed our valleys were not channeled by human hands. We did not fashion the climate that gives us the white cotton belt of the South, the yellow wheat belt of the North, and the central corn belt that joins the two and overlaps them both. We do not gather up the moisture and fix the date of the early and later rains; we did not hide away in the mountains the gold and the silver; we did not store in the earth the deposits of copper and of zinc; we did not create the measures of coal and the beds of iron. All these natural resources, which we have but commenced to develop, are the gift of Him before whom we bow in gratitude to-night.

Nor are we indebted to the Heavenly Father alone, for we have received much from those who are separated from us by the Atlantic. If we have great and flourishing industries we must not forget that every nation in the Declaration of Independence. That is a document which we have given to the world, and yet the principles set forth therein were not invented by an American. Thomas Jefferson expressed them in felicitous language and put them into permanent form, but the principles had been known before. The doctrine that all men are created equal, that they are endowed with inalienable rights, that governments were instituted among men to secure these rights, and that they derived their just power from the consent of the governed—this doctrine which stands four square with all the world was not conceived in the United States, it did not spring from the American mind—ay, it did not come so much from any mind as it was an emanation from the heart, and it had been in the hearts of men for ages. Before Columbus turned the prow of his ship toward the west on that eventful voyage, before the Barons wrested Magna Charta from King John—yes, before the Roman legions landed on the shores of this island—ay, before Homer sang—that sentiment had nestled in the heart of man, and nerved him to resist the oppressor. That sentiment was not even of human origin. Our own great Lincoln declared that it was God himself who implanted in every human heart the love of liberty.

Yes, when God created man, He gave him life. He linked to life the love of liberty, and what God hath joined together let no man put asunder. We have received great blessings from God and from all the world, and what is our duty? We cannot make return to those from whom those gifts were received. It is not in our power to make return to the Father above. Nor can we make return to those who have sacrificed so much for our advancement. The child can never make full return to the mother whose life trembled in the balance at its birth, and whose kindness and care guarded it in all the years of infancy. The student cannot make full return to the teacher who awakened the mind and aroused an ambition for a broader intellectual life. The adult cannot make full return to the patriarch whose noble life gave inspiration and incentive. So a generation cannot make return to the generation gone; it must Europe has sent us its trained and skilled artisans. If we have made intellectual progress, we must remember that those who crossed the ocean as pioneers brought with them their intelligence and their desire for learning. Even our religion is not of American origin. We laid the foundations of our church in the Holy Land, and those who came in the Mayflower and in other ships brought a love of religious liberty. Free speech, which has been developed in our country, and which we prize so much, is not of American origin. I have been profoundly impressed with the part that Englishmen have taken in establishing the right of free speech. Passing through the Bank of England my attention was called to a protest that Admiral Cochrane wrote upon the bank note with which he paid the thousand pounds fine that had been assessed against him. I was interested in that protest because it showed a fearlessness that indicates the possibilities of the race. Let me read what he said: "My health having suffered by long and close confinement, and my oppressors having resolved to deprive me of property or life, I submit to robbery to protect myself from murder in the hope that I shall live to bring the delinquents to justice."

That is the spirit that moves the world! There was a man in prison. He must pay his fine in order to gain his liberty. He believed the action of the court unjust. He knew that if he stayed there he would lose his life and lose the chance for vindication, and yet, as he was going forth from the prison doors, he did not go with bowed head or cringing, but flung his protest in the face of his oppressors and told them he submitted to robbery to protect his life in the hope that, having escaped from their hands, he might bring them to justice. I like that in the Englishman, and during my short knowledge of public affairs I have looked across the ocean and admired the moral courage and the manliness of those Englishmen who have dared to stand out against overwhelming odds and assert their opinions before the world.

We sometimes feel that we have a sort of proprietary interest in the principles of government set forth in make its return to the generations to come. Our nation must discharge its debt not to the dead, but to the living. How can our country discharge this great debt? In but one way, and that is by giving to the world something equal in value to that which it has received from the world. And what is the greatest gift that man can bestow upon man? Feed a man and he will hunger again; give him clothing and his clothing will wear out, but give him a noble ideal and that ideal will be with him through every waking hour, lifting him to a higher plane of life, and giving him a broader conception of his relations to his fellows.

I know, therefore, of no greater service that my country can render to the world than to furnish to the world the highest ideal that the world has known. That ideal must be so far above us that it will keep us looking upward all our lives, and so far in advance of us that we shall never overtake it. I know of no better illustration of an ideal life than the living spring, pouring forth constantly of that which refreshes and invigorates—no better illustration of a worthless life than the stagnant pool which receives contribution from all the land around and around and gives forth nothing. Our nation must make a large contribution to the welfare of the world, and it is no reflection upon those who have gone before to say that we ought to do better than they have done. We would not meet the responsibilities of to-day if we did not build still higher the social structure to which they devoted their lives.

I visited the Tower of London and saw upon the wall a strange figure. It was made of swords, ramrods, and bayonets, and was fashioned into the form of a flower. Someone had put a card on it and aptly named it the passion flower—and it has been too often the international flower. But the world has made progress. No longer do ambition and avarice furnish a sufficient excuse for war. The world has made progress, and to-day you cannot justify bloodshed except in defence of a right already ascertained, and then only when all peaceable means have been exhausted. The world has made progress. We have reached a point where we respect not the man who will die to secure some pecuniary advantages, but the man who will die in defence of his rights. We admire the courage of the man who is willing to die in defence of his rights, but there is yet before us a higher ground. Is he great who will die in defence of his rights? There is yet to come the greater man—the man who will die rather than trespass upon the rights of another. Hail to the nation whatever its name may be that leads the world toward the realization of this higher ideal. I am glad that we now recognize that there is something more powerful than physical force. No one has stated this better than Carlyle. He said that thought was stronger than artillery parks, and at last molded the world like soft clay; that behind thought was love, and that there never was a wise head that had not behind it a generous heart.

The world is coming to understand that armies and navies, however numerous and strong, are impotent to stop thought. Thought inspired by love will yet rule the world. I am glad that there is a national product more valuable than gold or silver, more valuable than cotton or wheat or corn or iron—an ideal. That is a merchandise—if I may call it such—that moves freely from country to country. You cannot vex it with an export tax or hinder it with an import tariff. It is greater than legislators, and rises triumphant over the machinery of government. In the rivalry to present the best ideal to the world, love, not hatred, will control; and I am glad that I can return thanks for what my country has received, thanks for the progress that the world has made, and that I can contemplate with joy the coming of that day when rivalry between nations will be, not to see which can injure the other most, but to show which can hold highest the light that guides the footsteps of the human race to higher ground.

of his country dictated a state of neutrality, which, he was convinced, might be maintained without violation of national faith. Aware of the importance and delicacy of the crisis, he assembled his Cabinet in April for their advice. To them he submitted certain questions with respect to the existing and prospective relations with France.

THE PRESIDENT'S QUESTIONS

1. Shall a proclamation issue for the purpose of preventing interference of the citizens of the United States in the war between France and Great Britain, etc.? Shall it contain a declaration of neutrality or not? What shall it contain?
2. Shall a minister from the republic of France be received?
3. If received, shall it be absolutely or with qualifications; and, if with qualifications, of what kind?
4. Are the United States obliged by good faith to consider the treaties heretofore made with France as applying to the present situation of the parties? may they either renounce them or hold them suspended until the government of France shall be established?
5. If they have the right, is it expedient to do either? and which?
6. If they have an option, would it be a breach of neutrality to consider the treaties in operation?
7. If the treaties are to be considered as now in operation, is the guaranty in the treaty of alliance applicable to a defensive war only, or to a war, either offensive or defensive?
8. Does the war in which France is engaged appear to be offensive or defensive on her part? or of a mixed and equivocal character?
9. If of a mixed and equivocal character, does the guaranty in any event apply to such a war?
10. What is the effect of a guaranty, such as that to be found in the treaty of alliance between the United States and France?
11. Does any article in either of the treaties prevent ships of war, other than privateers, of the powers opposed to France, from coming into the ports of the United States to act as convoys to their own merchantmen? or does it lay any other restraints upon them more than would apply to the ships of war of France?
12. Should the future regent of France send a minister to the United States, ought he to be received?

CHAPTER I

THE FRENCH ALLIANCE

Franco-British War—Opposing Views in Washington's Cabinet as to Proper Relations with France—Washington Issues Proclamation of Neutrality: Controversy Between "Pacifists" [Alexander Hamilton] and "Helvidius" [James Madison] as to Whether the President Encroached on the Powers of Congress.

THE essential object of the French-American treaty of 1778 was "to maintain the liberty, sovereignty, and independence of the United States as well in matters of government as of commerce." In the event of conquest Canada and Bermuda were to belong to the United States, and the West Indies to France. Each party was to fulfill its part of the treaty according to its own power and circumstances, and no after-claim of compensation was to be made on either side, whatever be the cost of the war.

As a result of this treaty events occurred in 1793 which inflamed partisanship to a degree hitherto not attained in the politics of America.

War had broken out between the new republic of France and Great Britain and Holland, and the American people in general were eager to support their former ally and present sister republic. Indeed, many individuals were ready to engage in privateering against the commerce of the enemies of France, regardless of consequences to the United States.

President Washington, however, from his high station, was called upon to view these great events as they might affect his own country, and he felt himself bound to consult the dictates of his judgment rather than the impulse of his feelings. He foresaw that the storm which was gathering in Europe must soon reach the United States, and he was satisfied that the best interests

13. Is it necessary or advisable to call together the two Houses of Congress with a view to the present posture of European affairs? if it is, what should be the particular objects of such call?

These questions were of course communicated confidentially, but they afterwards clandestinely found their way to the public.

The answers of the members of the Cabinet to these questions were requested in writing. On some of them the opinions of the members were unanimous; on others a difference prevailed. All were in favor of issuing a proclamation of neutrality, of receiving a minister from the existing French Government, and against convening Congress. Some of the Cabinet, however, were for receiving the minister with some degree of qualification, from a doubt whether the government of France could be considered as finally settled by the deliberate sense of the nation. The President, however, concluded to receive him in an unqualified manner. As to the clause of guaranty in the treaty of 1778 a difference of opinion also existed in the Cabinet. The Secretaries of the Treasury [Alexander Hamilton] and of War [Henry Knox] considered the cause as applicable only to a defensive war, and therefore not binding in a contest commenced by France herself, while the Secretary of State [Thomas Jefferson] and the Attorney-General [Edmund Randolph] thought it unnecessary at that time to decide the question. This divergence of views among the members of the Cabinet served to increase the divisions already existing among the people.

A proclamation was issued by the President on the 22nd of April, declaring it to be the duty and interest of the United States to pursue a conduct friendly and impartial toward the belligerent powers of Europe, and that it was their disposition to observe such conduct, warning the citizens to avoid all acts tending to contravene such a disposition, and declaring that those who might render themselves liable to punishment by committing, aiding, or abetting hostilities against any of the belligerents, or by carrying contraband of war, would not receive the protection of the United States.

"PACIFICUS" (Hamilton) vs. "HELVIDIUS" (Madison)

ON THE PRESIDENT'S PROCLAMATION OF NEUTRALITY

The proclamation created a heated debate in the press of the country. Alexander Hamilton wrote a series of articles in defence of the proclamation signed "Pacificus," which were replied to by James Madison in a series signed "Helvidius."

ARGUMENT OF HAMILTON

I

Hamilton first stated the objections to the proclamation:

1. That the proclamation was without authority.
2. That it was contrary to our treaties with France.
3. That it was contrary to the gratitude which is due from this to that country for the succors afforded to us in our own revolution.
4. That it was out of time and unnecessary.

Preliminary to answering the first objection, Hamilton stated the nature and design of a proclamation of neutrality. This, he said, was to announce to the belligerent powers that the country was at peace with both belligerents and without treaty obligations to become an associate in the war with either party, and therefore that it would remain strictly neutral, and to warn the citizens of the country where the proclamation issued to abstain from acts violating this neutrality under penalty of punishment by the law of the land of which the "law of nations" (jus gentium) is a part. Such a proclamation to the citizens is necessary to relieve the nation from responsibility for these acts (Vattel, Book III, Chapter 7, Section 113).

The first question was: Had the executive department a constitutional right to make this proclamation?

Hamilton affirmed that it had, the Constitution designating it as the treaty-making, and, under the general power of executing all laws, the treaty-executing power. He said that there were two and only two exceptions to connected with him in the making of treaties, and though the consequence of his act of reception is to give operation to those heretofore made with that country. But he is censured for having declared the United States to be in a state of peace and neutrality, with regard to the powers at war; because the right of changing that state, and declaring war, belongs to the legislature.

It deserves to be remarked that, as the participation of the Senate in the making of treaties and the power of the legislature to declare war are exceptions out of the general "executive power" vested in the President, they are to be construed strictly, and ought to be extended no further than is essential to their execution.

While, therefore, the legislature can alone declare war, can alone actually transfer the nation from a state of peace to a state of hostility, it belongs to the "executive power" to do whatever else the law of nations, cooperating with the treaties of the country, enjoins in the intercourse of the United States with foreign powers.

In order to the observance of that conduct which the laws of nations, combined with our treaties, prescribed to this country, in reference to the present war in Europe, it was necessary for the President to judge for himself whether there was anything in our treaties incompatible with an adherence to neutrality. Having decided that there was not, he had a right, and, if in his opinion the interest of the nation required it, it was his duty, as executor of the laws, to proclaim the neutrality of the nation, to exhort all persons to observe it, and to warn them of the penalties which would attend its non-observance.

The proclamation has been represented as enacting some new law. This is a view of it entirely erroneous. It only proclaims a fact, with regard to the existing state of the nation; informs the citizens of what the laws previously established require of them in that state, and notifies them that these laws will be put in execution against the infractors of them.

II

The second and principal objection to the proclamation, namely, that it is inconsistent with the treaties between the United States and France, will now be examined.

Referring to Vattel, Book III, Chapter 6, Section 101, Hamilton said that those treaty obligations with the executive powers of the President as laid down in the Constitution: the Senate must coöperate with the President in treaty-making, and declarations of war and grants of letters of marque and reprisal must be made by Congress. A declaration of neutrality, he argued, did not, however, fall under either of those exceptions. It is the duty of the President to preserve peace until war is declared, and to exercise this duty he must necessarily construe treaty obligations.

Those who object to the proclamation will readily admit that it is the right and duty of the executive to interpret those articles of our treaties which give to France particular privileges, in order to the enforcement of them; but the necessary consequence of this is that the executive must judge what are their proper limits; what rights are given to other nations by our contracts with them; what rights the law of nature and nations gives and our treaties permit, in respect to those countries with which we have none; in fine, what are the reciprocal rights and obligations of the United States, and of all and each of the powers at war.

In the case of France, if there had been a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, between the United States and that country, the unqualified acknowledgment of the new government would have put the United States in a condition to become an associate in the war with France, and would have laid the legislature under an obligation, if required, and there was otherwise no valid excuse, of exercising its power of declaring war.

This serves as an example of the right of the executive, in certain cases, to determine the condition of the nation, though it may, in its consequences, affect the exercise of the power of the legislature to declare war. Nevertheless, the executive cannot thereby control the exercise of that power. The legislature is still free to perform its duties, according to its own sense of them; though the executive, in the exercise of its constitutional powers, may establish an antecedent state of things, which ought to weigh in the legislative decisions.

The division of the executive power in the Constitution creates a concurrent authority in the cases to which it relates.

Hence treaties can be made only by the President and Senate jointly; but their activity may be continued or suspended by the President alone.

No objection has been made to the President's having acknowledged the republic of France by the reception of its minister without having consulted the Senate; though that body is a nation made prior to the existing quarrel between that nation and a third nation could be fulfilled without violating the law of neutrality, even though these were to furnish determinate succors of ships or troops in case of war, but that succors not stipulated in the treaty would be such a violation.

12

He conceded that execution of the clause of guaranty in the eleventh article of our treaty with France would engage us with our whole force as an auxiliary of France in the present war.

It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine whether the United States would have a valid justification for not complying with it in case of their being called upon for that purpose by France.

The alliance between the United States and France is of the defensive kind. The words of that article are as follows: "The essential and direct end of the present defensive alliance is to maintain effectually the liberty, sovereignty, and independence, absolute and unlimited, of the United States, as well in matters of government as of commerce."

The leading character then of our alliance with France being defensive, it will follow that the meaning, obligation, and force of every stipulation in the treaty must be tested by the principles of such an alliance; unless in any instance terms have been used which clearly and unequivocally denoted a different intent.

The principal question consequently is: what is the nature and effect of a defensive alliance? When does the casus fœderis (state of alliance) take place in relation to it?

Reason, the concurring opinions of writers, and the practice of nations will all answer: "When either of the allies is attacked, when war is made upon him, not when he makes war upon another;" in other words, the stipulated assistance is to be given "when our ally is engaged in a defensive, not when he is engaged in an offensive war." This obligation to assist only in a defensive war constitutes the essential difference between an alliance which is merely defensive, and one which is both offensive and defensive. In the latter case there is an obligation to coöperate as well when the war, on the part of our ally, is of the latter as when it is of the former description. To affirm, therefore, that the United States are bound to assist France in the war in which she is at present engaged will be to convert our treaty with her into an alliance offensive and defensive, contrary to the express declaration of the instrument itself.

Now the war in question is an offensive war on the part of France, in that she first declared and began the war.

Upon this point there is apt to be some incorrectness of ideas. Those who have not examined subjects of such a nature are led to imagine that the party which commits the first injury, or gives the first provocations, is on the offensive side, though hostilities are actually begun by the other party.

But the cause or the occasion of the war, and the war itself, are things entirely distinct. It is the commencement of the war itself which decides the question whether it be offensive or defensive. All writers on the laws of nations agree in this doctrine; but it is most accurately laid down in the following extracts from Bulemaqui (Vol. II, Book IV, Chap. III, Secs. 4, 5):

"Neither are we to believe (says he) that he who first injures another begins by that an offensive war, and that the other who demands the satisfaction for the injury received is always on the defensive. There are a great many unjust acts which may kindle a war, and which, however, are not the war itself."

We must therefore affirm, in general, that the first who takes up arms, whether justly or unjustly, commences an offensive war; and he who opposes him, whether with or without reason, begins a defensive war.

France, then, being on the offensive in the present war, and our alliance with her being defensive only, it follows that the casus faderis, or condition of our guaranty, cannot take place; and that the United States are laid to refuse a performance of that guaranty, if demanded.

III

A third objection to the proclamation is that it is inconsistent with the gratitude due to France for the services rendered to us in our revolution.

Those who make this objection disavow, at the same time, all intention to maintain the position that the United States ought to take part in the war. They profess to be friends to our remaining at peace. What, then, do they mean by the objection?

If it be no breach of gratitude to refrain from joining France in the war, how can it be a breach of gratitude to declare that such is our disposition and intention?

Faith and justice between nations are virtues of a nature the most necessary and sacred. They cannot be too strongly inculcated, nor too highly respected. Their obligations are absolute, their utility unquestionable; they relate to objects which, with their prevailing one; and that either to ascribe to them a different principle of action or to deduce, from the supposition of it, arguments for a self-denying and self-sacrificing gratitude on the part of a nation, which may have received from another good offices, is to misrepresent or misconceive what usually are, and ought to be, the springs of national conduct.

Mr. Hamilton then examined the case of France's aid to the United States to see if it was disinterested, and therefore calling for gratitude on our part.

The dismemberment of this country from Great Britain was an obvious and a very important interest of France. It cannot be doubted that it was both the determining motive and an adequate compensation for the assistance afforded to us.

The inference from these facts is not obscure. Aid and co-operation, founded upon a great interest, pursued and obtained by a party rendering them, is not a proper stock upon which to engraft that enthusiastic gratitude which is claimed from us by those who love France more than the United States.

This view of the subject, extorted by the extravagancy of such a claim, is not meant to disparage the just pretensions of France to our good-will and acknowledgment of the favor.

But these sentiments are satisfied on the part of our nation when they produce a cordial disposition to render all good and friendly offices which can be rendered without prejudice to its own solid and permanent interests.

To ask of a nation so situated as we are to make a sacrifice of substantial interest; to expose itself to the jealousy, ill-will, or resentment of the rest of the world; to hazard, in an eminent degree, its own safety, would be to ask more than the nature of the case demands, more than the fundamental maxims of society authorize, more than the dictates of sound reason justify.

A question has arisen with regard to the proper object of that gratitude which is so much insisted upon: whether it be the unfortunate prince by whom the assistance received was given; or the nation of whom he was the chief or the organ? It is extremely interesting to the national justice to form right conceptions on this point.

The arguments which support the latter idea are as follows:

"Louis XVI was but the constitutional agent of the French people. He acted for and on behalf of the nation; it was with their money and their blood he supported our cause. It is to them, therefore, not to him, that our obligations are due.

probity and sincerity, generally admit of being brought within clear and intelligible rules.

But the same cannot be said of gratitude. It is not very often that between nations it can be pronounced with certainty that there exists a solid foundation for the sentiment; and how far it can justifiably be permitted to operate is always a question of still greater difficulty.

The basis of gratitude is a benefit received or intended, which there was no right to claim, originating in a regard to the interest or advantage of the party on whom the benefit is, or is meant to be, conferred. If a service is rendered from views relative to the immediate interest of the party who performs it, and is productive of reciprocal advantages, there seems scarcely in such a case to be an adequate basis for a sentiment like that of gratitude. The effect at least would be wholly disproportioned to the cause if such a service ought to beget more than a disposition to render in turn a correspondent good office, founded on mutual interest and reciprocal advantage. But gratitude would require much more than this; it would exact to a certain extent even a sacrifice of the interest of the party obliged to the service or benefit of the one by whom the obligation had been conferred.

Between individuals acts of gratitude not unfrequently occur. But among nations they perhaps never occur. It may be affirmed, as a general principle, that the predominant motive of good offices from one nation to another is the interest or advantage of the nation which performs them.

Indeed, the rule of morality in this respect is not precisely the same between nations as between individuals. The duty of making its own welfare the guide of its actions is much stronger upon the former than upon the latter; in proportion to the greater magnitude and importance of national compared with individual happiness, and to the greater permanency of the effect of national than of individual conduct. Existing millions, and for the most part future generations, are concerned in the present measures of a government; while the consequences of the private actions of an individual ordinarily terminate with himself or are circumscribed within a narrow compass. Rulers are only trustees for the happiness and interest of their nation, and cannot, consistently with their trust, follow the suggestions of kindness or humanity toward others to the prejudice of their constituents.

It is not here meant to recommend a policy absolutely selfish in nations; but to show that a policy regulated by their own interest, as far as justice and good faith permit, is and ought to be

Louis XVI, in taking our part, was no doubt actuated by state policy. An absolute prince could not love liberty. But the people of France patronized our cause with zeal, from sympathy in its object. The people, therefore, not its monarch, are entitled to our sympathy."

This reasoning may be ingenious; but it is not founded in nature or fact.

Louis XVI, though no more than the constitutional agent of the nation, had at the time the sole power of managing its affairs, the legal right of directing its will and its force. It belonged to him to assist us, or not, without consulting the nation; and he did assist without such consultation. His will alone was active; that of the nation passive. If there was kindness in the decision, demanding a return of good-will, it was the kindness of Louis XVI—his heart was the depository of the sentiment.

But Louis XVI, it is said, acted from reasons of state, without regard to our cause; while the people of France patronized it with zeal and attachment.

With regard to the individual good wishes of the citizens of France, as they did not produce the services rendered to us as a nation, they can be no foundation for national gratitude. They can only call for a reciprocation of individual good wishes. They cannot form the basis of public obligation.

Our cause had also numerous friends in other countries; even in that with which we were at war. Conducted with prudence, moderation, justice, and humanity, it may be said to have been a popular cause among mankind, conciliating the countenance of princes and the affection of nations.

The dispositions of the individual citizens of France can therefore in no sense be urged as constituting a peculiar claim to our gratitude. As far as there is foundation for it it must be referred to the services rendered to us; and, in the first instance, to the unfortunate monarch that rendered them. This is the conclusion of nature and reason.

IV

The remaining objection to the proclamation of neutrality is that it was out of time and unnecessary.

To give color to this objection it is asked, why did not the proclamation appear when the war commenced with Austria and Prussia? Why was it forborne till Great Britain, Holland, and Spain became engaged? Why did not the Government wait till the arrival at Philadelphia of the minister of the French repub-lie? Why did it volunteer a declaration not required of it by any of the belligerent parties?

Austria and Prussia are not maritime powers. Contraventions of neutrality as against them were not likely to take place to any extent, or in a shape that would attract their notice. It would therefore have been useless, if not ridiculous, to have made a formal declaration on the subject while they were the only parties opposed to France.

But the reverse of this is the case with regard to Spain, Holland, and England. These are all commercial and maritime nations. It was to be expected that their attentions would be immediately drawn toward the United States with sensibility, and even with jealousy. It was to be feared that some of our citizens might be tempted by the prospect of gain to go into measures which would injure them and hazard the peace of the country. Attacks by some of these powers upon the possessions of France in America were to be looked for as a matter of course. While the views of the United States, as to that particular, were problematical, they would naturally consider us as a power that might become their enemy. This they would have been the more apt to do on account of those public demonstrations of attachment to the cause of France of which there has been so prodigal a display.

It was therefore of great importance that our own citizens should understand as soon as possible the opinions which the Government entertained of the nature of our relations to the warring parties, and of the propriety or expediency of our taking a side or remaining neuter. The arrangements of our merchants could not but be very differently affected by the one hypothesis or the other; and it would necessarily have been very detrimental and perplexing to them to have been left in uncertainty.

The idea of its having been incumbent on the Government to delay the measure for the arrival of the minister of the French republic is as absurd as it is humiliating. Did the executive stand in need of the logic of a foreign agent to enlighten it as to the duties or interests of the nation? Or was it bound to ask his consent to a step which appeared to itself consistent with the former and conducive to the latter?

The sense of our treaties was to be learned from the instruments themselves. It was not difficult to pronounce beforehand that we had a greater interest in the preservation of peace than in any advantages with which France might tempt our participation in the war.

"friend of the Constitution," a lover of peace, and one who deeply respected the President.

Madison then proceeded to attack the arguments of "Pacifcus."

The basis of his reasoning is the extraordinary doctrine that the powers of making war and treaties are in their nature executive; and therefore comprehended in the general grant of executive power, where not especially and strictly excepted out of the grant.

If there be any countenance to this position it must be found either, first, in the writers of authority on public law; or, 2d, in the quality and operation of the powers to make war and treaties; or, 3d, in the Constitution of the United States.

1. All writers on international law, particularly Wolsius, Bulemaqui, and Vattel, speak of the powers to declare war, to conclude peace, and to form alliances as among the highest acts of the sovereignty, of which the legislative power must at least be an integral and preëminent part.

2. The natural province of the executive magistrate is to execute laws, as that of the legislature is to make laws. All his acts, therefore, properly executive, must presuppose the existence of the laws to be executed. A treaty is not an execution of laws: it does not presuppose the existence of laws. It is, on the contrary, to have itself the force of a law, and to be carried into execution, like all other laws, by the executive magistrate. To say, then, that the power of making treaties, which are confessedly laws, belongs naturally to the department which is to execute laws is to say that the executive department naturally includes a legislative power. In theory this is an absurdity—in practice a tyranny.

The power to declare war is subject to similar reasoning. A declaration that there shall be war is not an execution of laws: it does not suppose preëxisting laws to be executed: it is not, in any respect, an act merely executive. It is, on the contrary, one of the most deliberate acts that can be performed; and when performed has the effect of repealing all the laws operating in a state of peace, so far as they are inconsistent with a state of war; and of enacting, as a rule for the executive, a new code adapted to the relation between the society and its foreign enemy. In like manner, a conclusion of peace annuls all the laws peculiar

There has been an additional criticism, several times repeated, which may deserve a moment's attention. It has been urged that the proclamation ought to have contained some reference to our treaties; and that the generality of the promise to observe a conduct friendly and impartial toward the belligerent powers ought to have been qualified with expressions equivalent to these, "as far as may consist with the treaties of the United States."

The insertion of such a clause would have entirely defeated the object of a proclamation by rendering the intention of the Government equivocal. That object was to assure the powers at war and our own citizens that, in the opinion of the executive, it was consistent with the duty and interest of the nation to observe neutrality, and that it was intended to pursue a conduct corresponding with that opinion. Words equivalent to those contended for would have rendered the other part of the declaration nugatory, by leaving it uncertain whether the executive did or did not believe a state of neutrality to be consistent with our treaties. Neither foreign powers nor our own citizens would have been able to have drawn any conclusion from the proclamation; and both would have had a right to consider it as a mere equivocation.

By not inserting any such ambiguous expressions, the proclamation was susceptible of an intelligible and proper construction. While it denoted on the other hand that, in the judgment of the executive, there was nothing in our treaties obliging us to become a party in the war; it left it to be expected, on the other, that all stipulations compatible with neutrality, according to the laws and usages of nations, would be enforced. It follows that the proclamation was, in this particular, exactly what it ought to have been.

ARGUMENT OF MADISON

Madison began his reply by justifying his entrance into a controversy with one who was "despised by the steady friends" of "our republican Government and the French Revolution" on the ground that it was necessary to expose "Pacifcus's" insidious presentation of "principles which strike at the vitals of the Constitution" under color of "vindicating an important public act of a chief magistrate who enjoys the confidence and love of his country."

For himself "Helvidius" declared that he was a to a state of war, and revives the general laws incident to a state of peace.

These remarks will be strengthened by adding that treaties, particularly treaties of peace, have sometimes the effect of changing not only the external laws of the society, but operate also on the internal code, which is purely municipal, and to which the legislative authority of the country is of itself competent and complete.

From this view of the subject it must be evident that, although the executive may be a convenient organ of preliminary communications with foreign governments on the subjects of treaty or war: and the proper agent for carrying into execution the final determinations of the competent authority; yet it can have no pretensions, from the nature of the powers in question compared with the nature of the executive trust, to that essential agency which gives validity to such determinations.

It must be further evident that, if these powers be not in their nature purely legislative, they partake so much more of that than of any other quality that, under a constitution leaving them to result to their most natural department, the legislature would be without a rival in its claim.

Another important inference to be noted is that, the powers of making war and treaty being substantially of a legislative, not an executive, nature, the rule of interpreting exceptions strictly must narrow, instead of enlarging, executive pretensions on those subjects.

3. The Constitution does not explicitly give the President power to make war and peace. On the contrary this power is expressly lodged in Congress, and, since the Constitution was framed with the specific purpose of separating the three branches of government, the spirit of that instrument, as well as the letter, is against the use of such power by the executive.

The power of treaties is vested jointly in the President and in the Senate, which is a branch of the legislature. From this arrangement merely, there can be no inference that would necessarily exclude the power from the executive class, since the Senate is joined with the President in another power, that of appointing to offices, which, as far as relates to executive offices at least, is considered as of an executive nature. Yet, on the other hand, there are sufficient indications that the power of treaties is regarded by the Constitution as materially different from mere executive power, and as having more affinity to the legislative than to the executive character.

One circumstance indicating this is the constitutional regulation under which the Senate give their consent in the case of treaties. In all other cases the consent of the body is expressed by a majority of voices. In this particular case a concurrence of two-thirds at least is made necessary as a substitute or compensation for the other branch of the national legislature, which, on certain occasions, could not be conveniently a party to the transaction.

But the conclusive circumstance is that treaties, when formed according to the constitutional mode, are confessedly to have the force and operation of laws, and are to be a rule for the courts in controversies between man and man as much as any other laws. They are even emphatically declared by the Constitution to be "the supreme law of the land."

So far the argument from the Constitution is precisely in opposition to the doctrine. As little will be gained in its favor from a comparison of the two powers with those particularly vested in the President alone.

The President shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia when called into the actual service of the United States.

There can be no relation worth examining between this power and the general power of making treaties. And instead of being analogous to the power of declaring war it affords a striking illustration of the incompatibility of the two powers in the same hands. Those who are to conduct a war cannot, in the nature of things, be proper or safe judges, whether a war ought to be commenced, continued or concluded. They are barred from the latter functions by a great principle in free government, analogous to that which separates the sword from the purse, or the power of executing from the power of enacting laws.

"He shall take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed, and shall commission all officers of the United States." To see the laws faithfully executed constitutes the essence of the executive authority. But what relation has it to the power of making treaties and war, that is, of determining what the laws shall be with regard to other nations? No other certainly than what subsists between the powers of executing and enacting laws, no other consequently than what forbids a coalition of the powers in the same department.

Thus it appears that by whatever standard we try this doctrine it must be condemned as no less vicious in theory than it would be dangerous in practice. It is countenanced neither by the writers on law, nor by the nature of the powers themselves, includes the right to judge whether the United States be obliged to declare war or not. Can the inference be avoided that the executive, instead of having a similar right to judge, is as much excluded from the right to judge as from the right to declare?

Whatever difficulties may arise in defining the executive authority in particular cases there can be none in deciding on an authority clearly placed by the Constitution in another department. In this case the Constitution has decided what shall not be deemed an executive authority; though it may not have clearly decided in every case what shall be so deemed. The declaring of war is expressly made a legislative function. The judging of the obligations to make war is admitted to be included as a legislative function. Whenever, then, a question occurs whether war shall be declared or whether public stipulations require it, the question necessarily belongs to the department to which those functions belong—and no other department can be in the execution of its proper functions if it should undertake to decide such a question.

There can be no refuge against this conclusion, but in the pretext of a concurrent right in both departments to judge of the obligations to declare war; and this must be intended by the writer when he says, "It will not follow that the executive is excluded in any case from a similar right of judging," etc.

As this is the ground on which the ultimate defence is to be made, and which must either be maintained or the works erected on it demolished, it will be proper to give its strength a fair trial.

It has been seen that the idea of a concurrent right is at variance with other ideas advanced or admitted by the writer. Laying aside, for the present, that consideration, it seems impossible to avoid concluding that, if the executive, as such, has a concurrent right with the legislature to judge of obligations to declare war, and the right to judge be essentially included in the right to declare, it must have the same concurrent right to declare as it has to judge; and, by another analogy, the same right to judge of other causes of war as of the particular cause found in a public stipulation. So that, whenever the executive, in the course of its functions, shall meet with these cases, it must either infer an equal authority in all or acknowledge its want of authority in any.

A concurrent authority in two independent departments, to perform the same function with respect to the same thing, would be as awkward in practice as it is unnatural in theory.

If the legislature and executive have both a right to judge of nor by any general arrangement or particular expressions or plausible analogies to be found in the Constitution.

Whence then can the writer have borrowed it?

There is but one answer to the question.

The power of making treaties and the power of declaring war are royal prerogatives in the British Government, and are accordingly treated as executive prerogatives by British commentators.

Madison then shrewdly quoted a passage from one of Hamilton's letters in "The Federalist" (No. 75) as contradictory of the position taken by "Pacifcus." It was a "secret of Punch" who "Pacifcus" was, but Madison, using an opportunity which is unique in the annals of debate, assumed that "Pacifcus" and Hamilton are different persons, and confuted the one by the other.

This number of "The Federalist" (see Vol. I, page 401), expressly refuted the general idea that treaty-making was an executive power, and showed that it was a distinct department of government, the legislature having part in it because of the operation of treaties as laws, and the executive, because these treaties were to be enforced.

"However true it may be" (says "Pacifcus") "that the right of the legislature to declare war includes the right of judging whether the legislature be under obligations to make war or not, it will not follow that the executive is in any case excluded from a similar right of judging in the execution of its own functions."

A material error of the writer in this application of his doctrine lies in his shrinking from its regular consequences. Had he stuck to his principle in its full extent, and reasoned from it without restraint, he would only have had to defend himself against his opponents. By yielding the great point that the right to declare war, though to be taken strictly, includes the right to judge whether the nation be under obligations to make war or not, he is compelled to defend his argument not only against others, but against himself also. Observe how he struggles in his own toils.

He had before admitted that the right to declare war is vested in the legislature. He here admits that the right to declare war the obligations to make war or not, it must sometimes happen, though not at present, that they will judge differently. The executive may proceed to consider the question to-day; may determine that the United States are not bound to take part in a war, and in the execution of its functions proclaim that determination to all the world. To-morrow the legislature may follow in the consideration of the same subject; may determine that the obligations impose war on the United States, and, in the execution of its functions, enter into a constitutional declaration, expressly contradicting the constitutional proclamation.

In what light does this present the Constitution to the people who established it? In what light would it present to the world a nation thus speaking, through two different organs, equally constitutional and authentic, two opposite languages, on the same subject, and under the same existing circumstances?

But it is not with the legislative rights alone that this doctrine interferes. The rights of the judiciary may be equally invaded. For it is clear that if a right declared by the Constitution to be legislative, and actually vested by it in the legislature, leaves, notwithstanding, a similar right in the executive, whenever a case for exercising it occurs, in the course of its functions; a right declared to be judiciary and vested in that department may, on the same principles, be assumed and exercised by the executive in the course of its functions; and it is evident that occasions and pretexts for the latter interference may be as frequent as for the former. So again the judiciary department may find equal occasions in the execution of its functions for usurping the authorities of the executive; and the legislature for stepping into the jurisdiction of both. And thus all the powers of government, of which a partition is so carefully made among the several branches, would be thrown into absolute hatchpot, and exposed to a general scramble.

It is certain that a faithful execution of the laws of neutrality may tend as much in some cases to incur war from one quarter as in others to avoid war from other quarters. The executive must nevertheless execute the laws of neutrality while in force, and leave it to the legislature to decide whether they ought to be altered or not. The executive has no other discretion than to convene and give information to the legislature on occasions that may demand it; and while this discretion is duly exercised the trust of the executive is satisfied, and that department is not responsible for the consequences. It could not be made responsible for them without vesting it with the legislative as well as with the executive trust.

In reply to the position of "Pacifus" that the right of the President to receive foreign ministers implies the right of recognizing, in the case of a revolution, the new government, "Helvidius" again quoted the "great constitutional authority," Hamilton, to the contrary. No. 69 of "The Federalist," written by Hamilton, says that this right is "more a matter of dignity than authority."

It is a circumstance, that will be without consequence in the administration of the Government, and it is far more convenient that it should be arranged in this manner than that there should be a necessity for convening the legislature or one of its branches upon every arrival of a foreign minister, though it were merely to take the place of a departed predecessor.

"Helvidius" comments on this as follows:

Had it been foretold in the year 1788, when this work was published, that, before the end of the year 1793, a writer, assuming the merit of being a friend to the Constitution, would appear and gravely maintain that this function, which was to be without consequence in the administration of the Government, might have the consequence of deciding on the validity of revolutions in favor of liberty, "of putting the United States in a condition to become an associate in war" . . . nay, "of laying the legislature under an obligation of declaring war," what would have been thought and said of so visionary a prophet?

Against "Pacifus's" inference that the executive has a right to give or refuse operation to preëxisting treaties, because of a change in the government of the foreign party, he quotes Burlamaqui, part IV, c. IX, § 16, ¶ 6, to show that a nation, by exercising the right of changing the organ of its will, even so far as from a monarchy to a republic, or vice versa, can neither disengage itself from the obligations, nor forfeit the benefits of its treaties.

"Helvidius" thus concludes the constitutional portion of his argument:

In no part of the Constitution is more wisdom to be found than in the clause which confides the question of war or peace to the legislature, and not to the executive department. Beside the ward itself required to be alleviated by all the circumspection and delicacy that could be applied to the occasion.

Notwithstanding Madison's arguments the proclamation of neutrality was approved by the American people as a whole, chiefly out of respect for Washington, and thus it became a strong precedent for similar action in similar cases by subsequent Presidents.

objection to such a mixture of heterogeneous powers, the trust and the temptation would be too great for any one man; not such as nature may offer as the prodigy of many centuries, but such as may be expected in the ordinary successions of magistracy. War is in fact the true nurse of executive aggrandizement. In war a physical force is to be created; and it is the executive will which is to direct it. In war the public treasures are to be unlocked; and it is the executive hand which is to disburse them. In war the honors and emoluments of office are to be multiplied; and it is the executive patronage under which they are to be enjoyed. It is in war, finally, that laurels are to be gathered; and it is the executive brow they are to encircle. The strongest passions and most dangerous weaknesses of the human breast: ambition, avarice, vanity, the honorable or venial love of fame are all in conspiracy against the desire and duty of peace.

Hence it has grown into an axiom that the executive is the department of power most distinguished by its propensity to war: hence it is the practice of all states, in proportion as they are free, to disarm this propensity of its influence.

Upon the specific instance of the executive's encroachment upon legislative and judicial powers in his proclamation of neutrality "Helvidius" observes that the President must have been ill-advised by some one inimical to France, and regardless of the benefits which were accruing to our young republic from the friendship of that country, and were on the point of vastly increasing.

A greater error could not have been committed than in a step that might have turned the present disposition of France to open her commerce to us as far as a liberal calculation of her interest would permit, and her friendship toward us, and confidence in our friendship toward her, could prompt, into a disposition to shut it as closely against us as the united motives of interest, of distrust, and of ill will could urge her.

On the supposition that France might intend to claim the guaranty, a hasty and harsh refusal before we were asked, on a ground that accused her of being the aggressor in the war against every power in the catalogue of her enemies, and in a crisis when all her sensibility must be alive toward the United States, would have given every possible irritation to a disappointment which every motive that one nation could feel toward another and to-

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN (JAY'S TREATY)

John Jay's Treaty with Great Britain—Popular Opposition—Washington's Reply—His Letter to Secretary Edmund Randolph—Objections of the French Minister—Randolph's Reply—Resolution of Edward Livingston [N. Y.] Calling on the President for the Correspondence Relating to the Treaty—Debate: in Favor, James Madison [Va.] and Albert Gallatin [Pa.]—Washington Refuses to Submit Correspondence—Resolution of Theodore Sedgwick [Mass.] Calling for Action by the House to Carry into Effect the Treaty—Debate: in Favor, William V. Murray, [Md.] Fisher Ames [Mass.]; Opposed, William B. Giles [Va.]—Letters of "Camillus" [Alexander Hamilton, Rufus King, and John Jay]—Treaty Is Passed.

BEFORE the outbreak of the French Revolution negotiations for a commercial treaty had been proceeding between the United States and Great Britain.

The British Government had promised to send a representative to America, but made evasive answers as to the treaty, intimating that the British people were offended by the Americans giving preference to their own ships in tonnage dues, etc.

The war with France, which soon after arose, compelled an abandonment of these negotiations. Great Britain and Holland, in order to compel the French to submit to their terms, in June, 1793, went to the extreme and extraordinary measure of ordering warships and privateers to stop vessels bearing corn, flour, or meal to French ports, and to sell the cargoes in British or friendly ports. Notwithstanding remonstrances on the part of the United States, the orders were rigidly enforced, and English ports were soon filled with American vessels, originally bound to France.

JAY'S MISSION TO GREAT BRITAIN

On April 16, during a discussion of non-intercourse with Great Britain, the President nominated John Jay as minister extraordinary to the British court. Jay's nomination was approved in the Senate.

The two great and primary objects of this mission were the cessation of the vexations and spoliations committed on American commerce under British orders and the adjustment of all differences concerning the treaty of peace. Should these points "be so accommodated as to promise the continuance of tranquility between the United States and Great Britain," "the subject of a commercial treaty," according to Mr. Jay's instructions, "might then be listened to, or even broken to the British Ministry."

Aware that the British Government might wish to detach the United States from France, and even make some overtures of that kind, Mr. Jay was specially instructed to say "that the Government of the United States would not derogate from their treaties and engagements with France."

On the 19th of November, 1794, Mr. Jay concluded and signed with Lord Grenville "a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation between His Britannic Majesty and the United States." It was received by the President on the 7th of March, 1795, and on the 8th of June was submitted to the Senate, and on the 24th of the same month that body advised its ratification, with the exception of the 12th article, relating to the West India trade. This interesting subject occasioned violent debates in the Senate, and the treaty itself was finally sanctioned in that body (excluding the article relating to the West India trade) by a bare constitutional majority, twenty against ten.

TERMS OF THE TREATY

The western military posts were to be surrendered to the United States on or before the first of June, 1796, but no compensation was made for negroes carried away

West India Islands in American vessels not above the burden of seventy tons, and in goods or merchandise of the growth, manufacture, or produce of the States, and in the productions of the islands, but the United States were restrained from carrying molasses, sugar, coffee, cocoa, or cotton either from the islands or from the United States to any part of the world.

As a considerable quantity of cotton at that time was produced in the Southern States, and had then begun to be exported, and the quantity would probably increase, the twelfth article was excluded. The American negotiator, it was said, was then ignorant that cotton of the growth of the United States had or would become an article of export.¹

A reciprocal liberty of commerce and navigation between the United States and the British dominions in Europe was established, neither to be subject to higher duties than other nations, the British Government reserving the right of countervailing the American foreign duties. And American vessels were freely admitted into the ports of the British territories in the East Indies, but not to carry on the coasting trade.

Timber for shipbuilding and material such as tar, sails, copper, etc., for the equipment of vessels were included in the list of contraband. With respect to provisions and other articles, not generally contraband, on "account of the difficulty of agreeing on the precise cases in which they should be regarded as such," and for the purpose of providing against the inconveniences and misunderstandings which might thence arise, it was declared that whenever such articles should become contraband, according to the existing law of nations, the same should not be confiscated, but the owners be completely indemnified by the captors or the Government.

by the British commander after the peace of 1783. The United States were to compensate British creditors for losses occasioned by legal impediments to the collection of debts, contracted before the Revolutionary War, to be settled and adjusted by commissioners, and Great Britain was to make compensation to American merchants for illegal captures of their property, to be adjusted also in the same mode. Provision was also made for ascertaining more accurately the boundaries between the United States and the British North American possessions.

British subjects holding lands in the territories of the United States and American citizens holding lands in the British dominions were to continue to hold them, according to the nature and tenure of their respective estates and titles therein, with power to sell, grant, or devise the same, and by the tenth article it was expressly provided that neither the debts due from individuals of the one nation to individuals of the other, nor shares or moneys in the public funds, or in the public or private banks, should in any event of war or national differences be sequestered or confiscated, "it being unjust and impolitic," as asserted in this article, "that debts and engagements contracted and made by individuals having confidence in each other and in their respective governments should ever be destroyed or impaired by national authority on account of national differences and discontents."

Both parties had liberty to trade with the Indians in their respective territories in America (with the exception of the country within the limits of the Hudson Bay Company), and the river Mississippi was to be also open to both nations.

The ten first articles principally embracing these important subjects were made permanent.

The other eighteen articles related to the future intercourse between the two countries, and in their duration were limited to twelve years, or two years after the termination of the war in which the British nation was then engaged. By the twelfth article a direct trade was permitted between the United States and the British

GREAT AMERICAN DEBATES

Prizes made by ships of war and privateers of either party might enter and depart from the ports of each other without examination, and no shelter or refuge was allowed to such vessels as had made a prize upon the subjects or citizens of the parties. Nothing, however, in the treaty was to operate contrary to former and existing treaties with other nations.

Mr. Jay was unable to obtain a stipulation that free ships should make free goods. It was hardly to be expected that Great Britain in time of war would consent to any relaxation of the rigid rule of law on this subject.

These are the principal features of a treaty which gave such high offence to the rulers of France and created such divisions in the United States as to put in jeopardy the Government itself.

Unfortunately it left the important question with respect to provisions being contraband as it found it, resting on the existing law of nations, but Mr. Jay, to whom had been assigned a most difficult as well as most delicate task, in a private letter to the President on the subject of the treaty, said, "to do more was impossible." He also added, "I ought not to conceal from you that the confidence reposed in your personal character was visible and useful throughout the negotiations."

The treaty was approved by Thomas Pinckney, the resident Minister at the court of London. In his letter to the Secretary of State he observed, "although some points might have been arranged more beneficially for us, if the treaty had been dictated entirely by the United States, yet when it is considered as a composition of differences where mutual complaints had rendered mutual concessions necessary to establish a good understanding, I think it may fairly be said that as little has been conceded by Mr. Jay, and as much obtained for the United States as, under all circumstances considered, could be expected."

This treaty was the first with any foreign power under the new Government. Treaties had only been formed with the Indian tribes, and in these instances, as well as in the instance of an attempt to obtain the release of American prisoners by a treaty with the regency of Algiers, the President had in person attended the Senate and requested their advice as to the terms he was about to propose. In this mode of proceeding serious difficulties had arisen, and on reconsideration it had been deemed most consistent with the Constitution not to consult the Senate in a formal manner until a treaty had actually been made. The Senate, therefore, in this instance were not previously consulted by the President as to the terms of a treaty with Great Britain. This has ever since been considered the true construction of the Constitution, and the course then adopted has been invariably pursued.

POPULAR OPPOSITION TO TREATY

Although secrecy was enjoined, yet one member of the Senate, soon after that body had advised its ratification, caused the treaty to be published in one of the public newspapers in Philadelphia, and it immediately became a subject of discussion.

Many of the opponents of the administration were prepared to pronounce the treaty's condemnation. Meetings of the citizens were held on the subject, and such was the state of public feeling against Great Britain that the passions, rather than the understandings, of the people were addressed, and resolutions were passed and presented to the President condemning the treaty in the most unqualified manner, and requesting him to withhold his assent.

WASHINGTON'S REPLY

Washington's answer disclosed the course he intended to pursue—a course alike firm and dignified. After stating that in every act of his administration he had sought the happiness of his fellow citizens, and that to obtain this object, overlooking all local, partial, or personal considerations, he had contemplated the United States as one great whole, and trusting that sudden impressions, when erroneous, would yield to candid reflection, he had consulted only the substantial and permanent interests of his country, he said:

JAY'S TREATY

partizans of France (or rather of war and confusion) will excite them to hostile measures; or, at least, to unfriendly sentiments. If it is not, there is no foreseeing all the consequences that may follow, as it respects Great Britain. It is not to be inferred from this that I am, or shall be, disposed to quit the ground I have taken; unless circumstances, more imperious than have yet come to my knowledge, shall compel it; for there is but one straight course in these things, and that is to seek truth and pursue it steadily."

OBJECTIONS OF THE FRENCH MINISTER

The treaty was ratified on August 14 on the terms proposed by the Senate.

In the negotiations with Great Britain perfect good faith was observed toward France. The French Minister, M. Adet, had been informed that Mr. Jay had instructions not to weaken the engagements with his nation. A copy of the treaty was also submitted to M. Adet by direction of the President with a request that he would state his objections. On the 30th of June he, in a note to the Secretary of the State, referred to such parts as appeared to him to destroy the effect of the treaty with France. The stipulations referred to were those which made contraband of war of naval stores excluded from that list in the French treaty, which subjected to seizure enemy's property in neutral bottoms, and admitted prizes in American ports. To the first and second the American secretary immediately answered that naval stores were contraband by the law of nations, that by the same law enemy's property in neutral bottoms was good prize, and that on these points Great Britain could not be prevailed upon to relax, and with respect to the admission of prizes into American ports this privilege did not extend to those made from the French during the present or any future war because contrary to the existing treaty with France.

PETITIONS AGAINST THE TREATY

On the first of March the President informed Congress by message that the treaty with Great Britain had "Without a predilection for my own judgment I have weighed with attention every argument which has, at any time, been brought into view. But the Constitution is the guide which I never can abandon. It has assigned to the President the power of making treaties, with the advice and consent of the Senate. It was doubtless supposed that these two branches of government would combine without passion, and with the best means of information, those facts and principles upon which the success of our foreign relations will always depend; that they ought not to substitute for their own conviction the opinions of others; or to seek truth through any channel but that of a temperate and well-informed investigation. Under this persuasion I have resolved on the manner of executing the duty before me. To the high responsibility attached to it I freely submit; and you, gentlemen, are at liberty to make these sentiments known as the ground of my procedure. While I feel the most lively gratitude for the many instances of approbation from my country, I cannot otherwise deserve it than by obeying the dictates of my conscience."

In a letter to Edmund Randolph, who had succeeded Thomas Jefferson as Secretary of State in 1794, Washington observes:

"To be wise and temperate, as well as firm, the crisis most eminently calls for; for there is too much reason to believe, from the pains which have been taken before, at, and since the advice of the Senate respecting the treaty, that the prejudices against it are more extensive than is generally imagined. This, from men who are of no party, but well disposed to the Government, I have lately learned is the case. How should it be otherwise? when no stone has been left unturned that would impress the people's minds with the most arrant misrepresentations of facts—that their rights have not only been neglected, but absolutely sold—that there are no reciprocal advantages in the treaty; that the benefits are all on the side of Great Britain; and, what seems to have more weight than all the rest, and has been most pressed, is, that this treaty is made with a design to oppress the French, in open violation of a treaty with that nation, and contrary, too, to every principle of gratitude and sound policy. In time when passion shall have yielded to sober reason the current may possibly turn; but, in the meanwhile, this Government, in relation to France and England, may be compared to a ship between the rocks of Scylla and Charybdis. If the treaty is ratified the

36

been duly ratified, that he had directed it to be promulgated, and had transmitted a copy thereof for their information. This important subject in various ways occupied the attention of the House for a great part of the remainder of the session. Soon after its ratification by the President was known, petitions against it were circulated throughout the United States for signatures. These petitions, all couched in the same language, were addressed to the House of Representatives. The petitioners after stating that certain stipulations in the treaty tended to involve their country in the political intrigues of European nations, to infract the treaty of alliance with France, and to produce the sad spectacle of war between that magnanimous republic and the republic of the United States proceeded to declare that many of its stipulations were manifest encroachments on the constitutional powers of Congress. They presented the following instances of such encroachments:

1. The regulation of commerce with foreign nations.
2. The regulation of trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes.
3. Regulating the territory of the United States and of individual States.
4. Establishing duties and imposts.
5. Establishing a rule of naturalization.
6. Constituting a tribunal of appeal, paramount to the supreme judicial court of the United States.
7. Changing the terms of, and establishing a rule to hold, real estate.
8. Defining piracies committed on the high seas, and declaring the punishment thereof.
9. Depriving free citizens of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, in the case of piracy, as defined and punished by the said treaty; and,
10. Attempting, in various other instances, to restrain and limit the legislative authority of Congress.

The petitioners in conclusion said:

"Wherefore solemnly protesting against the exercise of power by the President and Senate, in any of the foregoing cases, without the concurrence of Congress, as manifestly tending to absorb all the powers of government in that department alone; to establish, as the sole rule of legislation over all the great foreign and domestic concerns of the United States, the mere will and absolute discretion of the President and Senate, in conjunction with a foreign power; and finally to overturn and effect a total change in the present happy Constitution of the United States—We most earnestly pray that the representatives of the people, in Congress assembled, will, in their wisdom, adopt such measures, touching the said treaty, as shall most effectually secure from encroachment the constitutional delegated powers of Congress, and the rights of the people, and preserve to our country an uninterrupted continuance of the blessings of peace.”

Many of these petitions were presented in the winter of 1796 from different parts of the Union, and laid the foundation of the proceedings of the House in relation to the treaty.

LIVINGSTON'S RESOLUTION

Before the merits of the treaty itself became a subject of debate an important preliminary question arose upon a resolution calling on the President for the instructions of Mr. Jay and the correspondence and documents relating to it. This resolution was offered by Edward Livingston (New York) on the 2nd of March, and was debated until the 24th of that month, when it passed, 62 to 37.

The principal question on this resolution was as to the constitutional power of the House in relation to treaties. Never since the adoption of the Constitution had so much talent been displayed or so much warmth manifested as in the debates on this preliminary question and on the merits of the treaty itself.

The speakers on both sides were numerous and a very wide range was taken in debate. Every article and every word in the Constitution having the least bearing on the question was critically examined and applied.

A sketch of the principal arguments is here presented.

occurred would make a law for themselves not affecting the general rule.

The House of Representatives were not making a Constitution, but expounding one already made, and, while they should watch with a jealous eye every encroachment on their rights by another branch of the Government, they should be cautious not to usurp power constitutionally vested in others. That the treaties referred to in the Constitution included all those usually made—treaties of peace, alliance, and commerce, and that no precise limits to this power were fixed, and from the nature of the case could not be. The people of the United States who adopted the Constitution considered their interest and rights sufficiently secured by placing this necessary and important power in the hands of the President and one branch of the legislature, and that this necessarily excluded the other legislative branch. It was well known, it was also urged, that most of the treaties usually made must necessarily include regulations concerning many objects intrusted likewise by the Constitution to legislative regulations, and, if the treaty power could not operate on these, the power itself would be reduced to very narrow limits, and no treaty with a foreign nation could be made embracing these objects, as Congress, to whom all legislative power was given, had no authority to make treaties. It was necessary, also, it was said, to consider that the legislative power and treaty power operated differently and for different purposes. The former was limited to its own jurisdiction, and could not extend to a foreign jurisdiction and government. A legislature could indeed grant privileges to foreigners within its jurisdictional limits, but could not secure reciprocal privileges in a foreign country; this could only be done with the assent of a foreign government, and this assent was not usually given except by treaty.

Treaties, being the supreme law of the land, must also, it was said, be paramount to the laws of the United States as well as the Constitution and laws of the individual States. That Congress, under the Confederation, was invested with the power of “entering into

POWER OF HOUSE OVER TREATIES

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 2-24, 1796

In opposition to the call it was said that the Constitution in plain and explicit terms had declared that the President should have power by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to make treaties, and that all treaties made, or which should be made, under the authority of the United States should be the supreme law of the land. That the power of making treaties was an important act of sovereignty in every government, and in most countries was very properly intrusted with the executive branch. That the American Constitution had vested this power with the President in concurrence with two-thirds of the Senate. That a treaty fairly made and embracing those things which are the proper objects of compact between nations when thus assented to and duly ratified became a solemn compact binding on the United States was the supreme law of the land and ought to be carried into execution. That legislative aid or assent was not necessary to give it validity or binding force, though sometimes required agreeably to the form of our Government to carry it into complete effect. Where laws or appropriations of money were requisite for this purpose it was in all ordinary cases the duty of the legislative branch of the Government to pass such laws and make such appropriations, and that a failure so to do would be a breach of national faith, as much so as to refuse to make appropriations for the payment of a debt legally contracted.

Extraordinary cases, it was said, might occur in which the legislature might be justified in refusing its aid to carry a treaty into effect. The conduct of a nation with which the compact was made might be such after the completion of the treaty, or the stipulations in it might be so ruinous to the State, as to render it proper and even make it a duty for the legislative branch to withhold its aid. These cases, however, it was said, were not to be governed by ordinary rules, but when they treaties and alliances” on condition “that no treaty of commerce should be made, whereby the legislative power of the respective States should be restrained from imposing such imposts and duties on foreigners as their own people were subjected to, or from prohibiting the exportation of any species of goods or commodities whatsoever.” With these exceptions the power was general, and treaties made in pursuance of it had been considered paramount to State laws without the assent of the States themselves. When some of the State laws were supposed to contravene the treaty of peace with Great Britain, Congress, in their address to the States on the subject, declared that “when a treaty was constitutionally made, ratified, and published it immediately became binding on the whole nation and superadded to the laws of the land without the intervention of State legislatures. That treaties derived their obligations from being compacts between the sovereigns of this and of another nation, whereas laws or statutes derived their force from being the acts of the legislature competent to the passing them.” They therefore unanimously “resolved that the legislatures of the several States cannot of right pass any act or acts for interpreting, explaining, or construing a national treaty, or any part or clause of it, nor for restraining, limiting, or in any manner impeding, retarding, or countervailing the operation or execution of the same, for that, on being constitutionally made, ratified, and published they become in virtue of the Confederation part of the laws of the land and are not only independent of the will and power of such legislatures, but also binding and obligatory on them.” To remove all ground of complaint, however, on the part of Great Britain, Congress recommended to the States to pass general acts repealing all laws repugnant to that treaty. That afterwards in a discussion with the British minister on this subject, Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, speaking of the repealing acts of the States, said, “indeed all this was supererogation. It resulted from the instrument of confederation among the States that treaties made by Congress according to the Confederation were superior to the laws of the States.”

The opponents of the resolution also contended that the Constitution was so understood not only in the general convention, but in the State conventions which ratified that instrument, and in some of the latter this was made a strong ground of objection, particularly those of Virginia and North Carolina. One of the amendments proposed by the Virginia convention was "that no commercial treaty should be ratified without the concurrence of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and no treaty ceding, restraining, or suspending the territorial rights or claims of the United States, or any of their rights or claims to fishing in the American seas or navigating the American rivers, shall be, but in case of the most urgent and extreme necessity, nor shall any such treaty be ratified without the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole number of the members of both Houses respectively." The convention of North Carolina proposed an amendment "that no treaties which shall be directly opposed to the existing laws of the United States in Congress assembled shall be valid until such laws shall be repealed or made conformable to such treaty, nor shall any treaty be valid which is contradictory to the Constitution of the United States."

The same construction, it was said, had uniformly been given to this part of the Constitution by the House of Representatives; that various treaties had been made with the Indian tribes embracing a surrender of lands, settlement of boundaries, grants of money, etc., and when made and ratified by the President and Senate had been considered as laws of the land without the sanction of the House, and money, when necessary, had been appropriated as a matter of course; that the Constitution made no distinction between treaties with foreign nations and with Indian tribes, the same clause applying to both. And that the House, in June, 1790, declared by a resolution "that all treaties made, or which should be made and promulgated under the authority of the United States, should from time to time be published and annexed to the code of laws by the Secretary of State." That the secretaries had accordingly always annexed treaties to the laws as soon as treaty is unconstitutional; but he would say that it was not the supreme law of the land until it received the sanction of the legislature. That the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof, and treaties made under the authority of the United States, are declared to be the supreme law of the land. The words are, 'under the authority of the United States,' not 'signed and ratified by the President'; so that a treaty clashing in any of its provisions with the express powers of Congress, until it has so far obtained the sanction of Congress, is not a treaty under the authority of the United States."

He also added that treaties were the supreme law of the land only when they came in competition with the Constitutions and laws of the individual States, but were not supreme or paramount to the laws of the United States, because it is declared, in the same clause of the Constitution, "and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution and laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

"It would have been childish if the Constitution had confined itself to expressing the first part of the clause, because no doubt could arise whether the Constitution, laws, and treaties were the supreme law of the land; but, as the general Government sprung out of a confederation of States, it was necessary, in order to give that Government sufficient authority to provide for the general welfare, that the laws of the Union should supersede the laws of the particular States. But the clause does not compare a treaty with the law of the United States, or either of them with the Constitution; it only compares all the acts of the Federal Government with the acts of the individual States, and declares that either of the first, whether under the name of Constitution, law, or treaty, shall be paramount to, and supersede, the Constitution and laws of the individual States."

The views of Mr. Madison on this important question were generally in accordance with those expressed by Mr. Gallatin.

MR. MADISON.—I regret that on a question of such magnitude there should be any apparent inconsistency or inexplicitness in the Constitution that could leave room for different constructions.

As the case, however, has happened, all that can be done is to examine the different constructions with accuracy and fairness, according to the rules established therefor, and to adhere to that which should be found most rational, consistent, and satisfactory.

ratified by the President and Senate and promulgated by the former.

The resolution was not only supported by the mover and others, but had the aid of all the ingenuity and talents of James Madison (Virginia) and Albert Gallatin (Pennsylvania).

MR. GALLATIN, alluding to the great constitutional question made by the opponents of the resolution, said he had hoped in that stage of the business this would have been avoided; but, as gentlemen in opposition "had come forward on that ground, he had no objection to follow them in it, and rest the decision of the constitutional powers of Congress on the fate of the present question. He would, therefore," he said, "state his opinion that the House had a right to ask for the papers proposed to be called for, because their cooperation and sanction were necessary to carry the treaty into effect, to render it a binding instrument, and to make it, properly speaking, a law of the land; because they had a full discretion to refuse that cooperation, because they must be guided in the exercise of that discretion by the merits and expediency of the treaty itself, and therefore had a right to ask for every information which could assist them in deciding that question.

"The general power of making treaties, undefined as it is, by the clause which grants it, may either be expressly limited by some other positive clauses of the Constitution; or it may be checked by some powers vested in other branches of the Government, which, although not diminishing, may control the treaty-making power. That the specific legislative powers delegated to Congress were limitations of the undefined power of making treaties vested in the President and Senate; and that the general power of granting money, also vested in Congress, would at all events be used, if necessary, as a check upon, and as controlling, the exercise of the powers claimed by the President and Senate."

After stating that a treaty could not repeal a law of the United States, Mr. Gallatin asked, "to what would a contrary doctrine lead? If the power of making treaties is to reside in the President and Senate unlimitedly—in other words, if in the exercise of this power the President and Senate are to be restrained by no other branch of the Government—the President and Senate may absorb all legislative power; the Executive has nothing to do but to substitute a foreign nation for the House of Representatives, and they may legislate to any extent." Mr. Gallatin further remarked that "he should not say that the

Mr. Madison confined his remarks principally to two different constructions: one—and that supported, as he said, by the opponents of the resolution—that the treaty power was "both unlimited in its objects and completely paramount in its authority"; the other, that the congressional power was cooperative with the treaty power on the legislative subjects submitted to Congress by the Constitution.

As to the first, it is important, and appears to me to be a decisive view of the subject, that, if the treaty power alone can perform any one act for which the authority of Congress is required by the Constitution, it may perform any act for which the authority of that part of the Government is required. Congress have power to regulate trade, to declare war, to raise armies, to levy, borrow, and appropriate money, etc. If by treaty, therefore, as paramount to the legislative power, the President and Senate can regulate trade, they can also declare war, they can raise armies to carry on war, and they can procure money to support armies. I am unable to draw a line between any of the enumerated powers of Congress; and did not see but the President and Senate might, by a treaty of alliance with a nation at war, make the United States a party in that war. They might stipulate subsidies, and even borrow money to pay them: they might furnish troops to be carried to Europe, Asia, or Africa—they might even attempt to keep up a standing army in time of peace for the purpose of cooperating on given contingencies with an ally, for mutual safety, or other common objects.

The force of this reasoning is not obviated by saying that the President and Senate could only pledge the public faith, and that the agency of Congress would be necessary to carry it into operation: For, what difference does this make if the obligation imposed be, as is alleged, a Constitutional one; if Congress have no will but to obey, and if to disobey be treason and rebellion against the constituted authorities? Under a Constitutional obligation, with such sanctions to it, Congress, in case the President and Senate should enter into an alliance for war, would be nothing more than the mere heralds for proclaiming it.

He considered that construction the most consistent, most in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution, and freest from difficulties "which left with the President and Senate the power of making treaties, but required at the same time the legislative sanction and coöperation in those cases where the Constitution had given express and specified powers to the legislature.

It is to be presumed that in all such cases the legislature would exercise its authority with discretion, allowing due weight to the reasons which led to the treaty. Still, however, this House, in its legislative capacity, must exercise its reason; it must deliberate; for deliberation is implied in legislation. If it must carry all treaties into effect it would no longer exercise a legislative power; it would be the mere instrument of the will of another department, and would have no will of its own. When the Constitution contains a specific and peremptory injunction on Congress to do a particular act, Congress must, of course, do the act, because the Constitution, which is paramount over all the departments, has expressly taken away the legislative discretion of Congress. The case is essentially different when the act of one department of government interferes with a power expressly vested in another and nowhere expressly taken away: Here the latter power must be exercised according to its nature; and if it be a legislative power it must be exercised with that deliberation and discretion which are essential to legislative power.

The general doctrine of the advocates of the resolution was that the power to make treaties was limited to such objects as were not comprehended and included in the specified powers given to Congress, or that a treaty embracing such objects was not valid, that is, was not the supreme law of the land unless sanctioned by the House.

The advocates of the resolution also said that this was the first time this question had come before the House for their determination, and that, whatever opinions might heretofore have been expressed by individuals or by public bodies, these could have little weight.

The Constitution having fixed no precise limits to the treaty powers, the constructive limitations contended for by the advocates of the resolution were deemed totally inadmissible by its opponents. If this extensive power was liable to abuse in the hands of the President and Senate, they remarked the same might be said of all the general powers given to Congress. In answer to the limited construction given to the words "under enjoined upon the President as a duty to give, or which could be required of him by either House or Congress as a right; and with truth I affirm that it has been, as it will continue to be, while I have the honor to preside in the Government, my constant endeavor to harmonize with the other branches thereof, so far as the trust delegated to me by the people of the United States, and my sense of the obligation it imposes "to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution," will permit.

The nature of foreign negotiations requires caution; and their success must often depend on secrecy; and, even when brought to a conclusion, a full disclosure of all the measures, demands, or eventual concessions which may have been proposed or contemplated would be extremely impolitic; for this might have a pernicious influence on future negotiations, or produce immediate inconveniences, perhaps danger and mischief, in relation to other powers. The necessity of such caution and security was one cogent reason for vesting the power of making treaties with the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate; the principle on which that body was formed confining it to a small number of members.

To admit, then, a right in the House of Representatives to demand, and to have, as a matter of course, all the papers respecting a negotiation with a foreign power would be to establish a dangerous precedent.

It does not occur that the inspection of the papers asked for can be relative to any purpose under the cognizance of the House of Representatives except an impeachment, which the resolution has not expressed. I repeat that I have no disposition to withhold any information which the duty of my station will permit, or the public good shall require, to be disclosed; and, in fact, all the papers affecting the negotiation with Great Britain were laid before the Senate when the treaty itself was communicated for their consideration and advice.

The course which the debate has taken on the resolution of the House leads to some observations on the mode of making treaties under the Constitution of the United States. Having been a member of the general convention, and knowing the principles on which the Constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject; and, from the first establishment of the Government to this moment, my conduct has exemplified that opinion that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senate present concur; and that every treaty so made and promulgated thence-the authority of the United States," confining their operation to the constitutions and laws of the individual States it was said that they referred to treaties already made under the Confederation, as well as those to be made under the new Government. With respect to the coöperative powers of Congress or of the House in giving validity to treaties it was asked in what way this power was to be exercised? Congress could act only in their legislative capacity, and their sanction must be given by a law. This law might be passed by a bare majority of both houses, and if not approved by the President might still be re-passed by two-thirds and become a law without the assent of the President.

According to this doctrine it was also said a treaty might be sanctioned without the consent of two-thirds of the Senate, as a law might be passed by a bare majority of the Senate and House and be approved by the President.

WASHINGTON'S REPLY

This call for executive papers with its avowed object placed the President in a delicate situation. Satisfied after mature reflection with regard to his constitutional duty he did not hesitate as to the course to be pursued. In answer therefore on the 30th of March he sent to the House the following message, assigning his reasons for not complying with their request.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

With the utmost attention I have considered your resolution of the 24th instant, requesting me to lay before your House a copy of the instructions to the minister who negotiated the treaty with the King of Great Britain, together with the correspondence and other documents relative to that treaty, excepting such of the said papers as any existing negotiation may render improper to be disclosed.

In deliberating upon this subject it was impossible to lose sight of the principle which some have avowed in its discussion, or to avoid extending my views to the consequences which must follow from the admission of that principle.

I trust that no part of my conduct has ever indicated a disposition to withhold any information which the Constitution has forward becomes the law of the land. It is thus that the treaty-making power has been understood by foreign nations; and in all treaties made with them we have declared, and they have believed, that when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, they become obligatory.

In this construction of the Constitution every House of Representatives has heretofore acquiesced; and, until the present time, not a doubt or suspicion has appeared, to my knowledge, that this construction of the Constitution was not the true one. Nay, they have more than acquiesced; for till now, without controverting the obligation of such treaties, they have made all the requisite provisions for carrying them into effect.

There is, also, reason to believe that this construction agrees with the opinions entertained by the State conventions when they were deliberating on the Constitution; especially by those who objected to it, because there was not required in commercial treaties the consent of two-thirds of the whole number of the members of the Senate, instead of two-thirds of the Senators present; and because, in treaties respecting territorial and certain other rights and claims, the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole number of the members of both Houses respectively was not made necessary. It is a fact declared by the general convention, and universally understood, that the Constitution of the United States was the result of a spirit of amity and mutual concession. And it is well known that, under this influence, the smaller States were admitted to an equal representation in the Senate with the larger States; and that this branch of the Government was invested with great powers; for on the equal participation of these powers the sovereignty and political safety of the smaller States were deemed essentially to depend. If other proofs than these and the plain letter of the Constitution itself be necessary to ascertain the point under consideration, they may be found in the journals of the general convention, which I have deposited in the office of the Department of State.

In these journals it will appear that a proposition was made "that no treaty should be binding on the United States which was not ratified by a law," and that the proposition was explicitly rejected.

As, therefore, it is perfectly clear to my understanding that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty, as the treaty with Great Britain exhibits in itself all the objects requiring legislative provision, and on these the papers called for can throw no light; and as it is essential to the due administration of the Government that the boundaries fixed by the Constitution between the different departments should be preserved—a just regard to the Constitution and to the duty of my office under all the circumstances of this case forbids a compliance with your request.

THE HOUSE MAINTAINS ITS POSITION

The opinion of the President on this important constitutional question, however satisfactory it may now be to those who examine it without any particular bias, was by no means in accordance with that of the House. A resolution was submitted declaring the constitutional power of that body in relation to treaties, and on the 7th of April was adopted, 57 to 35, and entered on the journals. After referring to the section of the Constitution concerning treaties it declared:

That the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties; but that, when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations on a law or laws to be passed by Congress; and it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives, in all such cases, to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon, as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good.

A second resolution was added, asserting that it was not necessary to the propriety of any application from the House to the executive for information desired by them, and which might relate to any constitutional functions of the House, that the purposes for which such information might be wanted, or to which it might be applied, should be stated in the application.

The opinion expressed in this resolution relative to the power of the House regarding treaties was somewhat equivocal and seemed to be confined to the expediency merely of making the requisite provision for carrying them into effect whenever legislative aid was necessary for that purpose.¹

¹The question regarding the constitutional powers of Congress or of the House, in relation to treaties, came again before Congress, when the

ing about a discontinuance of the violations committed on our neutral rights, in regard to vessels and seamen, therefore," etc.

After striking out the words "highly objectionable, and may prove injurious to the United States," the preamble was negative, 50 to 49, and the resolution as reported to the House passed, 51 to 48, and bills ordered to be prepared accordingly.

AGREEMENT OF THE HOUSE TO THE TREATY

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 15-29, 1796

Those in favor of the treaty seemed not disposed to enter into a discussion of its merits, alleging that every member had made up his mind on the subject, and that dispatch was necessary in case the treaty was carried into effect. The posts were to be delivered up on the first of June, and this required previous arrangements on the part of the American Government.

WILLIAM V. MURRAY [Md.] said "that the subject was completely understood, both by the House and country, and the time was so extremely pressing that the execution of the treaty was more valuable than any explanation which members could give. The country requires of us at this crisis acts, not speeches."

WILLIAM B. GILES [Va.], in opposition, said:

"I had hoped that a question which had already produced so much agitation would be taken up and decided upon in a manner suitable to its importance." He thought it would not be treating the public mind with a sufficient degree of respect to take a hasty vote upon the subject. He did not think that gentlemen in favor of the treaty would have wished to have got rid of it in this way. He avowed he could not discover those merits in the treaty which other gentlemen cried up; but he pledged himself that, if they would convince him the treaty was a good one, he would vote for it. He was desirous of knowing in what latent corner its good features lay, as he had not been able to find them. He thought he should be able to show features in it which were not calculated for the good, but for the mischief, of the country. He hoped, therefore, the committee would rise and suffer a proper discussion.

The President during this session had submitted to the House copies of the treaties with Spain, with the Dey and Regency of Algiers, and with the Indians north-west of the Ohio. On the 13th of April a resolution was submitted by Theodore Sedgwick [Mass.] declaring that provision ought to be made by law for carrying into effect these treaties as well as that with Great Britain.

After much altercation on the subject of thus joining all these treaties together, a division was made and the question taken on each. The resolution was amended by a majority of eighteen, so as to read "that it is expedient to pass the laws necessary for carrying into effect," etc.

THE HOUSE AGREES TO THE TREATY

The subject of the British treaty was taken up on the 15th of April and debated in committee of the whole until the 29th of the same month, when the question was decided in the affirmative by the casting vote of the chairman, F. A. C. Muhlenberg [Pa.], who declared he was not satisfied with the resolution as it then stood, but should vote for it that it might go to the House and be there modified so as to meet his approbation.

The next day an amendment was proposed by Henry Dearborn (Massachusetts) by way of preamble.

"Whereas, in the opinion of this House, the treaty is highly objectionable, and may prove injurious to the United States; yet considering all circumstances relating thereto, and, particularly, that the last eighteen articles are to continue in force only during the present war, and two years thereafter; and confiding, also, in the efficiency of measures which may be taken for bring-commercial treaty or convention with Great Britain of July, 1815, was laid before that body by the President. The House at first differed with the Senate as to the form of a law for carrying into effect that part of the convention which stipulated an equality of duties in certain cases. The House at first passed a bill equalizing the duties without referring to the convention.

The Senate negatived this, and passed a declaratory bill, to which, after a conference, the House agreed 100 to 35. This bill merely "enacted and declared that so much of any act as imposes a higher duty of tonnage or of import on vessels and articles imported in vessels of the United States, contrary to the provisions of the convention, should be deemed and taken to be of no force and effect."

MR. MURRAY, in reply, "would vote for the committee to rise, as he despaired of taking a vote or hearing a word said to-day on the merits of the resolution offered. Gentlemen will, of course, come prepared, and he trusted that however terrible the treaty may have struck them in the dark, a little discussion might diminish their horrors. He could not, however, suppress his surprise that none of those, and in particular the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Giles], who had entertained opinions so hostile to this treaty so long should be at a loss to enter on its discussion with an eagerness proportioned to their zeal and conviction of its mighty faults. But the gentleman, it seems, has left his paints and brushes at home, and cannot now attempt, though the canvas is before him, to give us those features of the treaty which had been so caricatured out of doors. He would agree that the committee should rise, hoping that the delay was owing to an aversion to do mischief, and relying on the effects of a night's reflection; the pillow is the friend of conscience."

With a temper and with feelings thus indicated the House entered upon the discussion of this interesting and important subject.

In this debate not only the constitutional powers of the House in relation to treaties were again discussed, but every article and every clause in the treaty examined and its merits and demerits developed. The arguments on both sides were pushed to an extreme and partook not a little of personal as well as political feelings.

The objections of those opposed to carrying the treaty into effect were generally that it wanted reciprocity—that it gave up all claim of compensation for negroes carried away contrary to the treaty of peace and for the detention of the Western posts; that it contravened the French treaty and sacrificed the interest of an ally to that of Great Britain; that it gave up in several important instances the law of nations, particularly in relation to free ships making free goods, cases of blockade, and contraband of war; that it improperly interfered with the legislative powers of Congress, especially by prohibiting the sequestration of debts, and that the commercial part gave few if any advantages to the United States.

On the other hand it was urged that the treaty had been constitutionally made and promulgated, that a regard to public faith and the best interests of the country under all circumstances required it should be carried into effect, although not in all respects perfectly satisfactory; that it settled disputes between the two governments of a long standing, of a very interesting nature, and which it was particularly important for the United States to bring to a close; that provision also was made for a settlement of those of more recent date, not less affecting the sensibility as well as honor of the country, and in which the commercial part of the community had a deep interest; that in no case had the law of nations been given up; that the question as to provisions being contraband, although not settled, was left as before the treaty; that the conventional rights of France were saved by an express clause, and as to the sequestration of private debts it was said this was contrary to every principle of morality and good faith, and ought never to take place; that the commercial part would probably be mutually beneficial was a matter of experiment, and was to continue only two years after the close of the war in Europe. That in fine on the part of the United States the only choice left was treaty or war.

No question in Congress had ever elicited more talents or created greater solicitude than this. The loss of national character from a breach of plighted faith was strongly urged by those who believed the House bound to carry the treaty into effect. Should the treaty be rejected, war, it was also said, could not be avoided consistently with the character and honor of the American nation. The Western posts would be retained, the Indians again placed under the control of the British, millions unjustly taken from the merchants would be lost, and perhaps as many millions more added by future spoliations; redress for past, and security against future, injuries must, it was said, be obtained either by treaty or by war. It was impossible that the American people could sit down quietly without an effort to right themselves.

On these topics all the talents and all the eloquence of the advocates of the treaty were exerted and dis-removed by the treaty, but are not forgotten. Then they deemed war nearly inevitable, and would not this adjustment have been considered at that day as a happy escape from the calamity?

The great interest and general desire of our people were to enjoy the advantage of neutrality. This instrument, however misrepresented, affords America that inestimable security. The causes of our disputes are either cut up by the roots or referred to a new negotiation after the end of the European war. This was gaining everything, because it confirmed our neutrality, by which our citizens are gaining everything. This alone would justify the engagements of the Government. For when the fiery vapors of the war lowered in the skirts of our horizon all our wishes were concentrated in this one, that we might escape the desolation of this storm. This treaty, like a rainbow on the edge of the cloud, marked to our eyes the space where it was raging, and afforded at the same time the sure prognostic of fair weather. If we reject it the vivid colors will grow pale, it will be a baleful meteor, portending tempest and war.

The speech of Mr. Ames, though delivered at nearly the close of this debate, was listened to by the House and by a crowded audience with a most silent and untired attention. Its eloquence was admired by all, though its effects were dreaded by some.

In deference to this dread, the question was postponed until the following day.

The delay occasioned by these debates had been favorable to the treaty. It gave time for reflection among those opposed, and also afforded an opportunity for an expression of their sentiments by others who had hitherto been silent, willing to leave the decision with the constituted authorities. Alexander Hamilton, Rufus King, and John Jay wrote a series of letters, thirty-five in number, signed "Camillus," in defence of the treaty, which operated powerfully to influence the public mind in its favor. Madison was eager to enter into the lists against these letters, of which it was clearly evident that Hamilton was, if not the sole author, at least the dominating spirit. Jefferson, however, dissuaded him from the attempt, saying that any reply to the defence of the treaty by the Federalist "colossus" would in the end redound to the acceptance of his arguments. The great played. Mr. Ames in particular exceeded all his previous forensic efforts. From the peroration which dealt with the horrors of Indian warfare which might be expected if the treaty were rejected, his address received the name of the "Tomahawk Speech."

RAINBOW OF PEACE OR METEOR OF WAR?

SPEECH OF FISHER AMES, M. C., ON RATIFICATION OR REJECTION OF JAY'S TREATY

By rejecting the posts we light the savage fires, we bind the victims. This day we undertake to render account to the widows and orphans whom our decision will make, to the wretches that will be roasted at the stake, to our country, and, I do not deem it too serious to say, to conscience and to God. We are answerable, and if duty be anything more than a word of imposture, if conscience be not a bugbear, we are preparing to make ourselves as wretched as our country. There is no mistake in this case, there can be none. Experience has already been the prophet of events, and the cries of our future victims have already reached us. The voice of humanity issues from the shade of their wilderness. It exclaims that while one hand is held up to reject the treaty the other grasps a tomahawk. It summons our imagination to the scenes that will open. It is no great effort of the imagination to conceive that events so near are already begun. I fancy that I listen to the yells of savage vengeance, and the shrieks of torture. Already they seem to sigh in the western wind—already they mingle with every echo from the mountains.

After adverting to other probable and almost certain consequences of a rejection of the treaty—dissensions between the different branches of the Government—war abroad and anarchy at home—the orator reverses the picture:

Let me cheer the mind, weary, no doubt, and ready to despond, on this prospect, by presenting another which it is yet in our power to realize. Is it possible for a real American to look at the prosperity of this country without some desire for its continuance, without some respect for the measures which many will say produced, and, all will confess, have preserved it? Will he not feel some dread that a change of system will reverse the scene? The well-grounded fears of our citizens in 1794 were mass of the people began seriously to reflect on the consequences of the treaty's rejection, nor could they be induced to believe that the President, who had once saved his country from the tyranny of Great Britain, had now sacrificed its best interests to the same power. During the discussion therefore numerous petitions were presented to the House from different parts of the Union, praying that the treaty might be carried into effect. This changed the votes if not the opinions of some of the members, and when the question was finally put it was decided in favor of the treaty. This action probably saved the United States from being involved in the war which then and so long afterwards desolated Europe.

THE BREACH WITH FRANCE

France's Displeasure over Jay's Treaty—French Directory Orders Minister Charles Cotesworth Pinckney to Leave the Country—Washington's Farewell Address: "No Entangling Foreign Alliances"—President John Adams Proposes Arming of Merchant Vessels—Richard Sprigg, Jr. [Md.] Introduces Peace Resolutions in the House—Debate: in Favor, Abraham Baldwin [Ga.], William B. Giles [Ga.], John Nicholas [Va.], Albert Gallatin [Pa.], Edward Livingston [N. Y.]; Opposed, Samuel Sitgreaves [Pa.], Harrison Gray Otis [Mass.], Jonathan Dayton [N. J.], Robert G. Harper [S. C.], John Rutledge, Jr. [S. C.], Samuel Sewall [Mass.], Samuel W. Dana [Ct.], Nathaniel Smith [Ct.], John Williams [N. Y.], Thomas Pinckney [S. C.], John Allen [Ct.], James A. Bayard, Sr. [Del.]—Another Embassy Is Sent to France—A Treaty Is Signed and Ratified.

IN February, 1796, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs informed the American minister to that country, James Monroe, that the Directory considered the alliance between France and the United States at an end from the moment that the treaty with Great Britain was ratified, and intimated that a special envoy would be sent to announce this to the American Government. On the 2nd of July the Directory issued their celebrated decree, that "all neutral or allied powers shall, without delay, be notified that the flag of the French Republic will treat neutral vessels, either as to confiscation, as to searches, or capture, in the same manner as they shall suffer the English to treat them."

Secret orders to capture American vessels had probably been sent to the West Indies previous to this, as in June preceding a valuable ship called the Mount Vernon was captured off the capes of Delaware by a privateer from St. Domingo, commissioned by the French Republic.

The nations in Europe under the influence of France were required about the same time to pursue a similar conduct toward the Americans.

GREAT AMERICAN DEBATES

France and Spain, on the 19th of August, 1796, concluded a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive. This treaty contained a mutual guaranty of all the states, territories, islands, and places which they respectively possessed, or should possess. France at this time was also contemplating obtaining from Spain Louisiana and the Floridas.

Washington was dissatisfied with the conduct of the American minister in France, particularly in delaying to present to the French Government an explanation of the Administration's views in concluding a treaty with Great Britain. So he recalled Monroe, and appointed Charles Cotesworth Pinckney of South Carolina to succeed him. But when Mr. Pinckney's credentials were laid before the Directory he was informed through Mr. Monroe that the French Government would "no longer recognize a minister plenipotentiary from the United States until after a reparation of the grievances demanded of the American Government, and which the French Republic has a right to expect." Mr. Pinckney was permitted to reside at Paris until about the first of February, 1797, when the Directory gave him written orders to quit the territories of the Republic.

In September, 1796, President Washington, in declining another election, had for the last time addressed his fellow citizens on subjects which he deemed highly important and intimately connected with their future political welfare.¹

"NO ENTANGLING FOREIGN ALLIANCES"

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

The unity of government which constitutes you one people is also now dear to you. It is justly so, for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence, the support of your tranquility at home, your peace abroad, of your safety, of your prosperity, of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed, it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity, watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

¹ James Madison stated that President Washington, four years before this, had submitted to him certain sentiments which he wished Madison to incorporate in a "farewell address," Washington at that time contemplating refusal to serve a second term as President. Accordingly Madison surmised that the President had called some one to render him a similar service in 1796—and opined that this was Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens, by birth or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess are the work of joint councils and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings, and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest. Here every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The North, in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds, in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry. The South, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the agency of the North, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the North, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength to which itself is unequally adapted. The East, in like intercourse with the West, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications, by land and water, will more and more find, a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad or manufactures at home. The West derives from the East supplies requisite to its growth and comfort, and, what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure, by which the West can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength, or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While, then, every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find, in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves which so frequently afflict neighboring countries, not tied together by the same government, which their own rivalships alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues would stimulate and embitter. Hence, likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments which, under any form of government, are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is that your Union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endeavor to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the Union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? Let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation, in such a case, were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. 'Tis well worth a fair and full experiment.

liberation and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of a party, often a small, but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill-concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans, digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitions, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterward the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Toward the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you speedily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretexts. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the Constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments as of other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country; that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change, from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion. And remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests, in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction; to confine each member of society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the State, with particular reference to the founding of them on geo-

With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its bands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs, as a matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations—Northern and Southern, Atlantic and Western—whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart-burnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection.

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts, can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay by the adoption of a Constitution of government better calculated than your former for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter the constitutions of government. But the Constitution, which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish a government presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations, under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular de-graphical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you, in the most solemn manner, against the baneful effects of the spirit of party, generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes, in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed. But in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge, natural to party dissensions, which, in different ages and countries, has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads, at length, to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries, which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purposes of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind (which, nevertheless, ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foment occasionally riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the government itself, through the channels of party passion. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties, in free countries, are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This, within certain limits, is probably true; and, in governments of a monarchical cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And, there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest, instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking, in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding, in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power, and proneness to abuse it, which predominate in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositaries, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasion by the other, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern: some of them in our country, and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be, in any particular, wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance, in permanent evil, any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the destinies of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connection with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principles.

It is substantially true that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who, that is a sincere friend to it, can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible; avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions in time of peace to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should coöperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty it is essential that you should practically bear in mind that toward the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper objects (which is always the choice of difficulties) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice toward all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all; religion and morality enjoin this conduct; and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt that, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages that might be lost by a steady adherence to it? Can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations, and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that in place of them just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable, when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur.

Hence frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, and sometimes, perhaps, the liberty, of nations has been the victim.

So, likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducement or justification. It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions; by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained; and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens (who devote themselves to the favorite nation) facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding, with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence, in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions; to practice the arts of seduction; to mislead public opinion; to influence or awe the public councils! Such an attachment of a small or weak nation toward a great and powerful one dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me, fellow-citizens) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial; else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defence against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation, and excessive dislike of another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side; and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote, relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships and enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own, to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice?

'Tis our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than to private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But, in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise, to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves, by suitable establishments, in a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying, by gentle means, the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing, with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be, from time to time, abandoned or varied, as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay, with a portion of its independence, for whatever it may accept under that character; that, by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion, which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without anything more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity toward other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflection and experience. With me a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

expedient to resort to war against the French Republic, that the arming of merchant vessels should be restricted, and that adequate measures of defence should be adopted."

The resolutions accomplished their object by clearly dividing the House into supporters and opponents of the conduct and policy of the President. In the long and animated debate upon them they were gradually lost sight of, a more specific issue arising in the proposition to ask the President for all the papers dealing with the French relations. This proposition was carried.

The chief supporters of the Administration were Samuel Sitgreaves [Pa.], Harrison Gray Otis [Mass.], Jonathan Dayton [N. J.], Robert G. Harper [S. C.], John Rutledge, Jr. [S. C.], Samuel Sewall [Mass.], Samuel W. Dana [Ct.], Nathaniel Smith [Ct.], John Williams [N. Y.], Thomas Pinckney [S. C.], John Allen [Ct.], and James A. Bayard, Sr. [Del.].

The chief opponents of the Administration were Abraham Baldwin [Ga.], William B. Giles [Va.], John Nicholas [Va.], Albert Gallatin [Pa.], and Edward Livingston [N. Y.].

ON THE PEACE RESOLUTIONS

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 27-APRIL 2, 1798

MR. SITGREAVES was opposed to the resolutions of Mr. Sprigg. He said:

It is contrary to the usual and ordinary course of legislative proceeding to pass mere negative resolutions. The power of declaring war being vested in the Congress, so long as the Congress shall forbear to declare war it is a sufficient expression of their sentiment that such a declaration would be inexpedient: it is the only proper expression of such a sentiment; and it can be no more right to resolve that we will not resort to war, than it would be to pass an act to declare it would be inexpedient to make a law for the regulation of bankruptcy or any other municipal concern.

MR. BALDWIN did not believe it was intended that this House should merely be the instrument to give the sound of war; the subject seemed to be placed wholly in the hands of the legisla-

President John Adams in his inaugural address spoke only in general terms of the strained relations with France, expressing the hope that friendship might continue between the two nations. He called, however, a special session of Congress in which he delivered an address bearing fully and plainly upon the situation. As a measure of national protection, he proposed a naval establishment and asked Congress to pass such regulations as would "enable our seafaring citizens to defend themselves against violations of the law of nations," and also advised that the regular artillery and cavalry be increased and arrangements be made for forming a provisional army, and that the militia laws be revised for greater effectiveness.

The reply of the Senate heartily endorsed the President's policy. The answer of the House was in similar vein, although the opposition (Republicans) had proposed a number of amendments to the draft of the appointed committee which would cause the reply to endorse the proposals of the new administration without approving the acts of the old, and which, by going as far as possible in excusing her acts, would prevent it from irritating France.

In furtherance of a promise to Congress to reopen negotiations with France, President Adams appointed Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, John Marshall, and Elbridge Gerry envoys extraordinary to that country.

On March 19, 1798, the President informed Congress that the envoys to France had been unable to secure terms "compatible with the safety, the honor, or the essential interests of the nation," and he recommended that preparations for war be made. He also announced that he intended no longer to restrain merchant vessels from arming themselves.

This was the first time that Congress under the Constitution had been called upon to prepare for war, and a number of interesting constitutional arguments were brought forward in the discussion which ensued. The main debate was upon resolutions introduced on March 27, for the purpose of clarifying the situation, by Richard Sprigg, Jr., of Maryland. These were that it was "not ture. This was the understanding of the country when there was no government in existence, and he believed this was the meaning of the Constitution. The country is now everywhere agitating this question of peace or war, and he trusted they would not be left to grope their way in the dark on this important question. The President had informed the House that all hopes of a negotiation were at an end. He was willing to take the information as it was given, without going into the cabinet of the executive, and to take measures accordingly. But, when some persons declare that the present state of things is already a state of war; that the country is going on in it; that the die is cast; and that we have nothing to do but to go on with it as well as we can, if the House does not believe this to be a true position, this resolution ought to be agreed to, which went to say that the House does not consider the present a state of war, but a state of peace.

MR. OTIS proposed to strike out the words "resort to" and insert "declare" as he was of opinion with the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Sitgreaves) that the only subjects fit for discussion were active measures, and that it was not regular to declare when they would not do a thing.

MR. DAYTON (the Speaker) moved to strike out the words "against the French republic" and declared that, although he deemed the whole resolution unnecessary, and considered it as not naturally growing out of the President's message, which did not call upon us to declare or make war, yet, as it must be the intention of the mover, or of some other member, to follow it up with like declarations in relation to all other nations with whom the United States had any intercourse, provided they acted consistently, he thought it better to make the resolution a general one, even if it should be afterward negated.

MR. HARPER seconded the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey. He was not himself disposed for war, but for peace, while peace could be preserved. But he never said, and would not say, that war was the worst thing which could happen to this country; he thought submission to the aggressions of a foreign power infinitely worse. If gentlemen meant, by agreeing to this resolution, to prevent the country from being put into a state of defence; if they meant by it to effect an entering wedge to submission, he trusted they would find themselves mistaken; for, though he believed the true interest of the country lay in peace, yet he was not disposed to recede from any measures which he thought proper through fear of war.

MR. GILES believed this the proper time to declare whether the country should remain in peace or go to war. He thought the resolution proper as it stood, because founded on the message of the President, in which the French republic only is named. There was a part of that message, he said, which, in his opinion, amounted to a declaration of war. The President tells the House "that the situation of things is materially changed since he issued his order to prevent the arming of merchant vessels." As far as he understood the situation of the United States at that time, it was a state of neutrality. If that state is changed, and the present is not a state of neutrality, he wished to know what is. He knew only of two states: a state of neutrality and a state of war; he knew of no mongrel state between them. Therefore, if the President of the United States could declare war, we are now in war. Believing, however, that Congress had alone the power to declare war, he thought it time to declare what the state of the nation is. He did not know whether the object might not be answered by the resolution being general, as he was and always had been (notwithstanding insinuations to the contrary) against war with any nation upon the earth. He looked upon war as the greatest calamity which could befall any nation; and, whatever may be the phantoms raised in perspective of national honor and glory in such a state, they will, in the end, all prove fallacious. He believed no nation ought to go to war except when attacked; and this kind of war he should be as ready to meet as any one. He believed we were in a state which required the utmost vigor; but he thought every measure should be avoided which might involve the country in war. For, if we were to go to war with the French at present, he knew not what ever could take place which could produce peace; it must be a war of extermination.

MR. NICHOLAS considered this amendment as defeating the resolution. Was there nothing, he asked, which called for a declaration of the kind proposed? Was it not clear to every one that the country was going fast into a state of war, and was it not to be expected? Ought not the legislature, then (who alone have the power of declaring war), to determine the state of the country, and say whether they mean to go immediately to war or not? He thought the necessity of the resolution was sufficiently evident, by the motion which had been made to change the words from "resort to war," to declare war; in the one case the mischief was met, while the other meant nothing. And, if gentlemen were ready to say we were not prepared to declare war, and, at the same time, were not ready to say it is not expedient to resort to war, it proved that they thought war might be made without being declared. He asked whether gentlemen did not believe the executive had taken measures which would lead to war? And that, if he were at liberty to act upon a change of circumstances between this country and others, Congress were not brought into a situation in which they had no choice? Many discussions had heretofore taken place on the Constitution, but he had never heard it doubted that Congress had the power over the progress of what led to war, as well as the power of declaring war; but, if the President could take the measures which he had taken with respect to arming merchant vessels, he, and not Congress, had the power of making war. He was of opinion that the step taken by the President with respect to merchant vessels went to declare that we rested our cause on arms, which was not calculated to produce any good effect in our favor.

MR. RUTLEDGE said: Gentlemen asked whether war is not approaching? And whether the Executive is not hastening it? To the first question he could not answer, as it depended on France, and so versatile and uncertain is everything in that country that no dependence can be had upon it. The second question he answered in the negative. War would be a loss to this country; and to no individual more than the Executive, who is no warrior—consequently war has no laurels in store for him.

Referring to the inaction of Congress at the previous session, he thought our frigates ought not to have remained at the wharves; that our extensive seacoast, on which is much wealth, should not be unprotected: he thought our seaports, the principal depots of our revenue, ought to have been fortified. He had joined his friends in their attempts to have carried these measures, and, when they failed, he could not help thinking his country was in a degraded state and that she had lost the spirit which animated her in the year 1775. He hoped, however, that now, when France had gone to the lengths which she has gone to, there would be only one sentiment as to the propriety of the measures formerly proposed.

MR. SEWALL quoted a part of the President's message as to the decree which was proposed respecting the taking of English goods on board of neutral vessels and the carrying of which was declared to make neutral vessels good prizes. This last regulation, Mr. S. said, was a direct violation of the law of nations, and amounted to a declaration of war on the part of France against this country. But, instead of making any defence, gentlemen call upon the committee to declare we are not disposed to resort to war against the French republic; so that, after we have been injured and abused, and the common rights of humanity have been denied us, we are not to complain, but make a declaration that we will not go to war. Was, then, he asked, a question of war a card of politeness? Did a nation ever make a declaration that it was not at war? It could not say so, except it were in so degraded a state that it had no rights capable of injury. To say we are not at war to say no more than it is light when the sun shines; but to call upon the committee to say so at this time was to degrade the nation from its independence and below its character. The present state of things, Mr. S. said, ought to be considered as a state of war, not declared by us, but against us, by the French republic; and if we want spirit to defend ourselves let us not say so. We may refrain from acting, but let us not say we receive injuries with thankfulness. But this proposition goes still further. In a moment of public danger it goes to divide and separate this House from the President of the United States. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Giles] had well explained this resolution when he said it was intended to interrupt the views of the President of the United States. That gentleman considered the message of the President as a declaration of war, and this resolution was to be in contradiction to it. If this was the sense in which it was to be understood, it was false in point of fact; for the President had neither declared war nor called upon Congress to declare war; no such sentiment could be found in the message. To agree to the proposition as it stands would be to give countenance to the assertion of the French Government that we are a people divided from our Government; but, taking it with the amendment, he looked upon it as a harmless thing. Mr. S. concluded by saying that he considered the conduct of France in the light of war. How far we would resent it was the question; whether offensively or defensively. He was in favor of defensive measures, as we are not equal to offensive measures (he wished to God we were). It was our weakness and the division which had appeared in our councils that had invited these attacks. He trusted they should now unite and repel them.

MR. GALLATIN said the intention of the amendment was evidently to render the resolution as unmeaning as possible.

Every gentleman who had spoken on this subject had agreed that war is not a desirable object for the United States. He gave them credit for the assertion. But this was not the question; but whether we are prepared to resort to war under existing circumstances. It is a question of fact.

The people of the United States are informed by France that negotiations are at an end, and that we cannot obtain redress for wrongs, but may expect a continuation of captures in consequence of the decree, which it was supposed was passed, for seizing all neutral vessels with British property, manufactures, or produce on board. Mr. G. said he differed in opinion from the gentleman last up that this was a declaration of war. He allowed it would be justifiable ground of war for this country and that, on this account, it was necessary to agree to, or reject, the present proposition in order to determine the ground intended to be taken. For, though there may be justifiable cause for war, if it is not our interest to go to war the resolution will be agreed to.

There was another reason why this resolution ought to be now decided which arose from the conduct of our executive. He has declared that a change of circumstances has taken place which has occasioned him to withdraw his order forbidding merchant vessels to arm; which amounts to this: that he now permits vessels of the United States to use means of defence against any attack which may be made upon them. Mr. G. thought it necessary, therefore, to declare whether we were to pursue measures of war or peace.

MR. DANA said the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and two gentlemen from Virginia, had said that the message of the President amounted to a declaration that we were now in war. This idea he thought was stated very incorrectly. They did not seem to have understood the meaning of the language of the President. The state of things which existed at the time orders were issued to prevent the arming of merchant vessels was essentially different from the present; then there was an evident disposition in the owners of vessels to cruise against a foreign belligerent nation and the order was issued to prevent attack and plunder; but the desire to arm at present is for the purpose of defence merely, and not to cruise or plunder. There is a law forbidding vessels to arm for the purpose of cruising; but none forbidding merchants to arm in their own defence. This was the fair construction, he believed, of the meaning of the President.

MR. OTIS considered the message in a different view from many gentlemen. But admitting, for the sake of argument, that the President had declared an opinion upon the facts stated by him, that war was inevitable; gentlemen must consider the fact to be true; if they doubted it, they ought to demand information.

MR. SMITH looked upon the present resolution as very unimportant. It simply afforded a text from which it was intended to alarm the people with respect to war, and he wished not to indulge gentlemen in their design. He wished the question to be taken for another reason. It was suggested by the gentleman from Virginia that the message of the President was considered by the people as a declaration of war, and that reports were in circulation that a treaty, offensive and defensive, was concluded with Great Britain. After this he would call the attention of the committee to the resolution, which was, in effect, to say, we must interfere or war will be brought upon the country. Did not this go to sanction a report which was as false and malignant as even Jacobinism could invent? It did; and he hoped they would not so far sanction the report as to let the motion lie before them undecided.

MR. GILES said the question was a question of peace or war, and yet gentlemen call it trifling. He did not mean to alarm the people of the United States, but he wished them to understand their situation. He acknowledged he was himself much alarmed. Gentlemen were willing to engage in defensive, but not in offensive, war; but, when war was once begun, it would not be in the power of the United States to keep it within the character of defensive war. Indeed, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Sewall], when he spoke of defensive war, confessed our inability for offensive war, and uttered a prayer to the Supreme Being that we were able to engage offensively; and where, he asked, with such sentiments, is the difference between offensive and defensive war? He could see none; he deprecated war of every kind.

MR. WILLIAMS was persuaded that this negative mode of proceeding was calculated to draw on a debate to set the people against the executive. He had himself seen gentlemen write upon the late message of the President for the purpose of sending to their constituents: "A war message against France."

MR. PINCKNEY said from the first period of a misunderstanding with France declarations have been made deprecating war in general terms, but particularly with that nation. A minister plenipotentiary had been sent to explain the views of this Government, and to remove any jealousies which might exist, and to make such specific propositions as were thought necessary; but our minister was rejected without a hearing. The next measure was to send special commissioners in order to settle our differences and avert the calamity of war. We have, therefore, made sufficient declarations of our pacific intentions. Indeed, he thought too much had been rested on these declarations, as nothing had been done for our defence. When we looked at our seaports and saw their defenceless condition he thought it evident sufficient attention had not been paid to them, knowing that war might at least be a possible event.

He should not have been surprised if some one, fired with the injuries we have received, had brought forward a proposition for war. But instead of this, smarting as we are under injuries, our commerce bleeding at every pore, and our country deeply humiliated, we are called upon to say: You have done everything to injure, insult, and degrade us but we have deserved it; we will do nothing to oppose you. Though God and nature have given us power we will not go to war with you, neither on the present occasion nor on any other, whatever injury you may commit upon us.

MR. GILES said that we ought not to resort to war beyond the limits of the United States. Within our own limits we are capable of making something like exertion, and there, he believed, exertions might be made to advantage. Indeed, one of the propositions which is connected with the present goes to this purpose, and therefore with what propriety could the gentleman say he, and those who were of his opinion, were not for preparing for defence till the enemy is at the door? Nor could he see anything like humiliation in this. Nay, he was convinced if we carried our preparations for defence beyond our own limits, instead of gaining glory or honor, we shall meet with nothing but disgrace, as we are not prepared to make a defence at sea. Indeed, the moment we get beyond our jurisdictional line, defence will become offence, because there will be no evidence by which it can be ascertained by whom the attack commenced. It would, therefore, be unwise to permit ourselves to be placed in this situation.

At present, said Mr. G., there is a pretty general opinion in the country (and he thought there was much ground for the opinion) that there is a disposition in a part of this House, and in part of the Government, for war; and he thought it was proper to come to a declaration upon the subject. This would not only have a good effect upon our own citizens, but it would convince European powers that, though we were preparing for defence, we were not preparing for war.

MR. HARPER said gentlemen preached about peace. They cry, "peace! peace!" as if we, holding the scale of the world, had the power to preserve it. Do not gentlemen know that peace or war is not in our power? They do know it, and that all in our power is to resist, or submit. Was not the clamor which was heard about peace in so many words saying: you must submit, not only to what injuries you have received, but to what you may hereafter receive? If peace was all that gentlemen wanted they would take the resolution in general terms, as proposed to be amended; but their opposing it shows that they have no objection to hostility, if it be not against those whom they dread. And this was the spirit of peace which they wished to preserve—a spirit which he deemed vile submission—a spirit which was afraid to complain and which met every new insult without murmur.

The committee were now told it would be time enough to prepare for war when an invasion of our country was attempted. And why were they told this? Because such an event is not likely to take place. Gentlemen know that all the hostility which France wished to commit against this country may be done by destroying our commerce.

MR. H. said he would bring his proofs to show that those gentlemen who are now so loud in their calls for peace were heretofore the supporters of a war system. For this purpose he adduced Mr. Monroe's view of the conduct of the Executive of the United States, which, he said, was a publication which had met with the most unbounded and enthusiastic applauses from all the party; and he read from it an extract of a letter from Mr. Monroe to our Secretary of State dated Paris, September 10, 1796, in which he states it to be his opinion "that if a suitable attempt be made to engage the aid of the French Government in support of our claims upon England it may be accomplished; and that to secure success it will be necessary to take the posts and invade Canada."

Yet these are the gentlemen who now are willing to say to France: "We will not fight you; we give you license to do us all the injury you please. You may fit out half a dozen frigates which will be able to block up our ports; and we give you this notice that you may effect your purpose with little expense and not prepare a large fleet for the purpose."

MR. GILES said the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Harper] had said "that it had been the object of himself and his associates, but particularly of himself, since the year 1794 to go to war with Great Britain, if possible, and to enter into a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, with France."

From the year 1794 to the present period he had uniformly declared it to be his opinion "that war is justifiable only in case of self-defence."

Though he thought France had just ground of complaint against this country, he did not mean to justify her conduct toward us. He thought she ought to have received our ministers; and, if they had not agreed, to have taken such measures as they thought proper. But this is supposing our ministers clothed with sufficient powers; if they were not there would be some ground of justification for their conduct. The President of the United States is in the possession of information which would satisfy the Congress and the people in this respect, but he has thought proper to withhold it, and therefore he alone is responsible. The President informed the House that he had received certain papers and says: "I have considered these papers; I have deliberated upon them; I have not sent them to you but require you to act upon them; I call upon you to take energetic measures and request you will provide sufficient revenue." The House has been thus obliged to take up the subject in the dark. Is this, said he, a desirable state for the legislature to be placed in? Is it not rather a degraded state? He thought when party rage shall subside this conduct would be deemed extraordinary. In these circumstances, said he, are the people of the United States to be led on from step to step until they are irrevocably involved in war? And are the people to be told that this is a trifling question?

MR. HARPER replied to Mr. Giles's assertion that he (Mr. G.) never proposed war against Great Britain. He knew it. The gentleman always spoke of peace, but pursued measures which led to war. He did not speak of war when he recommended sequestrations, confiscations, etc., because he loved peace. He did not talk of war; but, while he and his friends opposed measures of defence, they were in favor of every measure which led to war. While they were irritating a nation to war they opposed the building of frigates. He thought it seemed as if gentlemen believed it would be well to get to war and then rely upon their favorite nation for support.

MR. GILES renewed the assertion that he and his friends always had been willing to put the nation in a state of defence. As to the frigates, he gloried in his vote against them; but with respect to the use of them the gentleman was mistaken. They were intended to be sent against the Algerines only.

MR. ALLEN said it had been observed, and not in the most candid and proper manner, that the papers received from our commissioners ought to have been laid before the House, and the President had been charged with withholding them.

Though he was himself satisfied with the information he had at present, he believed there were many gentlemen in the House who wished for more, because there is a paper printed in this city which is continually insinuating that there is something in these dispatches which, if they were made known, would show that the conduct of the Executive has been improper. He therefore proposed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House the dispatches from the envoys extraordinary of the United States to the French republic, mentioned in his message of the 19th instant, or such parts thereof as considerations of public safety and interest in his opinion may permit."

MR. GILES said that no part of the correspondence ought to be kept from Congress. He was not himself satisfied as to the sincerity of the proceedings of the Executive of the United States toward France; he wished, therefore, not only to have the correspondence of our Ministers, but the instructions which were given to them.

MR. LIVINGSTON moved to amend the resolution by striking out all the words after the 19th instant, and insert after the words "this House" "the instructions to and."

The latter part of the resolution proposed to transfer a right to the President which it ought itself to exercise, as to judging of what it was proper to publish in consideration of the public safety and interest. If this power was given to the President he might withhold such parts of the papers as might prevent a correct judgment being formed upon them. He was not himself disposed to cede to the President the right which he was sent there to exercise for his constituents, of judging of so important a question as a question of peace or war. He could not basely surrender this right. If the papers were called for at all he hoped the whole would be called for, in order that the House might form that sound and temperate judgment for which the present crisis so loudly calls and for which the people of the United States so anxiously look. Indeed, to pass the resolution unamended would, in his opinion, be a shameful dereliction of their rights.

MR. BAYARD thought the propriety of this call upon the President was extremely doubtful and, as it regarded the instructions given to our ministers, wholly improper. With respect to the communication of the dispatches, it was wholly a matter of executive discretion to judge whether it would be proper to communicate them or not. He was one of those who had so much confidence in the Executive as to trust to his candor, understanding, and integrity to determine upon the propriety of what he should send to, or withhold from, this House. At a time when it is not known that our negotiation with France is closed it would be extremely imprudent to have the instructions of our ministers laid before this House, as what was sent here, notwithstanding any vote of secrecy, would not long be kept secret. It would soon be in Europe and might do us essential injury by disclosing our ultimatum to France and by showing it also to the world. It was in vain, Mr. B. said, to suppose that one hundred men could keep a secret for any length of time, however important it might be. To elucidate that assertion he referred to the divulging the secret of the British treaty by a Senator.

But the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Giles] has no confidence in the Government of this country with respect to its negotiation with France and, in order to try the sincerity of the Executive, he wishes for the papers. Does the gentleman by this mean to give the lie to the Executive? Because in his message he has told the House that he has given power to our ministers to settle our disputes with the French republic, and to "make all reasonable concessions." What more does the gentleman wish? Does he wish unreasonable concessions to be made? Surely he does not. Did anything appear in the conduct of the French Directory to show that our Ministers were not possessed of ample powers? No; the Directory never knew anything about their powers, at least so far as any official communications had been received on the subject. There could not, therefore, be any ground upon which the gentleman could rest his suspicions. He hoped, therefore, the amendment would be negatived.

Mr. Livingston's amendment was adopted. Mr. Allen's resolution was then adopted as amended by a vote of 65 to 27.

The President replied to the request of Congress by sending it every scrap of the communication he had received from the envoys in Paris. Whether he and his supporters in the House had planned the entire affair for the discomfiture of the opposition, or it had risen naturally out of the suspicions of the Republicans, its success was complete and even overwhelming. There was nothing at all revealed which excused France for her action. Indeed, the President's former communication had been singularly reserved in its statement of the ill treatment to which the American envoys had been subjected. Congress now learned that they had been kept six months without official recognition, during which they had been approached unofficially by three agents of Talleyrand, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, with the suggestion that bribes to the governments of France and Holland, under the guise of "loans," might gain their object. The agents made their proposals under the signatures of X, Y, and Z, and from this the whole affair became popularly known as the "X Y Z Mission."

The envoys spurned the suggestion of the agents, saying "we will not give you a sixpence"—a reply which was later developed by the American people, proud of their envoys' action, into the swelling epigram: "Millions for defence, but not one cent for tribute."

Finding the envoys inflexible, on April 3, 1798, Talleyrand ordered Pinckney and Marshall to quit the country, but expressed a desire that Gerry, who he thought, as a Republican would be more amenable to his plans, would remain. This desire was expressed so strongly and significantly that Gerry, fearing to precipitate war by not acceding to it, stayed on until August, when he received imperative instructions from the American Government to return home.

On Gerry's assigning his reasons for leaving, Talleyrand brazenly denied, with great show of indignation, all knowledge of the X Y Z proposals. Yet he could not deny that he himself had resorted to the old policy of the French Government in American affairs of appealing to the American people over the heads of their Government. In this appeal he greatly deceived himself. The whole country flamed with warlike defiance. Mass meetings were held everywhere and addresses in support of the President were adopted; volunteers offered themselves for war, and subscriptions of money and war vessels were made. The revolutionary badge of the time, the black cockade, became a popular adornment of hats, and patriotic songs, such as "Hail Columbia" and "Adams and Liberty" were written and sung.

The Republicans, on whom Talleyrand had leaned for support, were especially eager to avow their patriotism. The French, said Jefferson, "had so far mistaken the party as to suppose their first passion to be attachment to France and hatred of the Federal party, and not love of their country."

Nevertheless the Republicans were put on the defensive and became greatly unpopular. In the House of Representatives, in which they had been of equal strength with the Federalists, all the doubtful members and many of the former adherents of the party joined with the forces of the administration and ratified the bills of the Federalist Senate for increasing the army and navy, purchasing foundries, etc. On April 30 the navy, which had heretofore been a part of the war department, was placed in a new department under Secretary Benjamin Stoddert. War vessels were authorized to capture armed French vessels committing depredations on American commerce; merchant vessels were armed to prevent capture, and privateers were commissioned. A direct tax was imposed, and loans upon the credit ordered, as well as a general loan of $5,000,000. On June 13 commercial intercourse with France was suspended, and on July 9 all treaties with that country were declared no longer binding, as having been broken by France.

"THE CONTRAST"

From Lossing's "Field Book of the War of 1812"

The only one of the measures to which the Republicans offered determined opposition was that of the increase of the army by provisional troops. It was claimed that these were needed because of a threatened invasion of the Southern States from the West Indies by a soldier of fortune, Victor Hugues, leading a force of negroes with the avowed intention of rousing a slave insurrection. Since the provisional troops would be officered by appointees of the Federalist administration, the Republicans declared that advantage was being taken of the "war scare" to provide salaries for Federalist politicians, and that the army might be used in party warfare, although they had the good sense not to make these charges in the course of the debate in Congress, very properly confining their objections to questions of constitutionality and military expediency.

The bill for the increase of the army was passed on May 18 by a vote of 51 to 40.

In his address at the opening of the next session of Congress (December, 1798) President Adams: (1) promised a future communication on relations with France, and for the present (2) discredited her professions of conciliatory intentions, and (3) noted that her recent decree intended ostensibly to restrain the depredations of French cruisers on American commerce was a mockery, in that the laws which were the sources of the depredations were not repealed. Therefore he recommended (4) that our vigilance be unrelaxed. He himself, he said, had refused the request of Talleyrand to reopen negotiations and send another minister, which would be an act of national humiliation. (5) Accordingly he recommended the prosecution of measures of national defence, especially the increase of the navy.

With these recommendations both the Senate and House concurred. A more stringent act to suspend commercial intercourse with France was passed, and approved on February 9, 1799; a sum not exceeding one million dollars to increase the navy, and a sum not exceeding $35,000 to increase its equipment, were appropriated on February 22; and a system for the government of the navy was enacted, and approved on March 2. A thorough reorganization of the army was made in an act approved March 3.

On February 15, 1799, the special message on relations with France, which had been promised by the President in his opening address, was laid before Congress. It called attention to the fact that that article of the French Directory still remained in force by which, "explicitly and exclusively, American seamen were to be treated as pirates if found on board ships of the enemies of France."

In the debates on French relations during this session the Republicans continued to insist on giving the French Government the benefit of the doubt. They were, however, outvoted.

PEACE WITH FRANCE

During this session of Congress the enmity of the President toward Hamilton caused him to repudiate his firm determination not to send another minister to France. In the threat of war with France, Washington had accepted the position of lieutenant-general of the army. He appointed Alexander Hamilton, C. C. Pinckney, and Henry Knox, in respective order, as next to him in command, thus placing the three in the reverse order of their rank in the Revolution. Indeed, Washington, Hamilton, and Pinckney attended the opening of Congress in their new capacities. Now Knox, the absentee, was President Adams's choice for the position next to Washington, and the President yielded to the wish of Washington only upon the latter's express statement that he would resign unless his wishes in the matter were respected. It could not be expected that the aging dictator of the revolution would now be active in the field, and so Hamilton would practically occupy the place of commander-in-chief. As he was already the foremost minister in the cabinet, and regarded by many Federalists as the chief authority in the party, if not also in the administration, Adams clearly realized that, in event of war with France, Hamilton would in all probability become a popular hero and at the next election would be chosen President instead of himself. Therefore he determined to do all in his power to prevent the war. In the exercise of this determination he hastened the downfall of his party.

Talleyrand had signified to Adams that William Vans Murray, minister to Holland, would be acceptable to him as minister to France. Without having given any previous intimation of his intention, on February 18, 1799, the President nominated Murray as minister to France, and a few days thereafter added Oliver Ellsworth and (Patrick Henry declining) William R. Davie, Governor of North Carolina, to the commission. The friends of Hamilton in the cabinet and Senate did everything they could to defeat the appointments, but the Democratic Republicans, to whose prejudices the President appealed by stigmatizing the opposing Federalists as "the British faction," joined with the Adams Federalists and were finally able to confirm the nominations. The Federalist party, whose whole strength had been built up on the prospect of war with France, was thus left without a reason for existence.

Fortunately for the President's new policy the envoys found a new government upon their arrival in France during the autumn. Napoleon had returned from Egypt, and he became first consul. With visions of the conquest of Europe and Asia in his brain he was very glad to come to terms with America, which he did in the course of the following year. The convention, signed September 30, 1800, guaranteed the safety of American commerce for the future at the price of the abandonment by the United States of claims for damages in the past. The treaty was ratified by both parties on December 21, 1801; it abrogated all former treaties.

CHAPTER IV

THE LOUISIANA PURCHASE

Treaty with Spain for Free Navigation of the Mississippi—Retraction of Louisiana to France by Spain—President Jefferson's Letter to Robert R. Livingston, Minister to France, on the Subject—He Determines to Purchase New Orleans—Debate in the Senate on the Forcible Seizure of New Orleans: in Favor, James Ross [Pa.], Samuel White [Del.], Gouverneur Morris [N. Y.]; Opposed, John Breckinridge [Ky.], De Witt Clinton [N. Y.], Stevens T. Mason [Va.], James Jackson [Ga.]—Purchase of Louisiana Negotiated—Constitutionality of the Act: Letter of Jefferson on the Subject; Debate in the Senate: Speakers in Favor of Constitutionality, Senator Jackson, Robert Wright [Md.], John Taylor [Va.], Wilson C. Nicholas [Va.], Senator Breckinridge, John Quincy Adams [Mass.]; Opposed, William H. Wells [Del.], Timothy Pickens [Mass.], Uriah Tracy [Ct.]—Ratification of the Treaty.

BY a striking anomaly President Jefferson, the chief advocate of the limitation of Federal powers to those expressly granted in the Constitution, was compelled by circumstances to make a greater extension of those powers than had ever before been attempted. This action was the purchase of Louisiana, the territory owned by France about the mouth of the Mississippi, and west of that river to the Pacific ocean.

From the days of the Confederation it was the unanimous opinion of the fathers of the country that free navigation of the Mississippi was absolutely essential to the existence of the nation, and therefore they were unalterably determined to secure it. France had ceded Louisiana to Spain in 1762, who held it until 1800, when it was retroceded, in exchange for European territory, to France. During the possession by Spain that country excluded other nations from the navigation of the Mississippi. This exclusion was resisted by the United States, which was finally compelled to be satisfied with a suspension of free navigation for twenty-five years, this being secured by John Jay, as special envoy to Spain, in 1786. Owing to the pressure brought upon the Federal Government by the growing population of the western States (Kentucky and Tennessee) through proposed expeditions against New Orleans in violation of international law, President Washington, in the summer of 1795, sent Thomas Pinckney, then minister to Great Britain, as an envoy extraordinary to Madrid to negotiate a treaty which should secure free navigation for the United States at once. He arrived at a favorable time, Spain, the ally of Great Britain in the war with France, having been compelled by the success of French arms to make a treaty with France. After long negotiations a treaty between Spain and America was concluded in October, by which the Louisiana boundary was fixed in the middle of the Mississippi, southward to the thirty-first degree of latitude, and navigation of the river from source to mouth was made free to both countries, but to no others. New Orleans was made a free port to Americans for three years, at the expiration of which term the privilege was to be renewed or another port given them nearby. It was provided that free ships should make free goods, and privateering should be punished as piracy.

The terms of the treaty were executed in 1798, to the measurable satisfaction of the western population, who, however, still cherished the hope of more thoroughly securing the right to navigate the river by annexing all the contiguous territory.

The news of the retrocession of Louisiana to France in 1800 was accompanied by the alarming rumor that Napoleon Bonaparte intended to reestablish there a strong imperial government which would effectually block the western development of the American republic. Late in 1801 the rumor was confirmed by the report that Bonaparte had sent a great fleet and army ostensibly against San Domingo, which was then in insurrection, but really to take over from Spain possession of New Orleans after they had subdued the rebellion of the "Black Republic." This created a most uneasy feeling in the West, which, however, was allayed by the general confidence of that Republican region in President Jefferson. This confidence was thoroughly justified.

On April 18, 1802, the President wrote to Robert R. Livingston, minister to France, inquiring into the nature of the cession. In it he said:

"The cession of Louisiana and the Floridas by Spain to France works most sorely on the United States. It completely reverses all the political relations of the United States, and will form a new epoch in our political course. There is on the globe one single spot the possessor of which is our natural and habitual enemy. It is New Orleans, through which the produce of three-eighths of our territory must pass to market. France, placing herself in that door, assumes to us the attitude of defiance, . . . [and] seals the union of two nations who, in conjunction, can maintain exclusive possession of the ocean. From that moment we must marry ourselves to the British fleet and nation, and make the first cannon which shall be fired in Europe the signal for tearing up any settlement she [France] may have made."

According to the treaty with Spain a place of deposit for merchandise was assigned the citizens of the United States in the port of New Orleans. On October 2, 1802, this concession was abrogated by the Spanish intendant, to the great indignation of the Western merchants.

The President determined to solve the difficulty by purchasing New Orleans from its new owners. At his instigation the House of Representatives appropriated $2,000,000 for this purpose, and on January 11, 1803, the Senate confirmed his appointment of James Monroe as special envoy to negotiate, in collaboration with Minister Livingston, with Bonaparte, and, in collaboration with Charles Pinckney, minister to Spain, to get the necessary renunciation of the territory by his Catholic Majesty, Charles IV.

Either the ardent spirits of some of the Federalists could not wait upon the slow processes of diplomacy, or they grasped the opportunity to regain favor with the populace and at the same time discredit the Administration. They endeavored in the Senate to compel the President to seize at once the territory and so to nullify all his peaceful negotiations. Unfortunately for the attempt the movers were Eastern and Northern Federalists who were forced to make obviously insincere pleas in behalf of the Western and Southern people, since the representatives of these were unanimous in support of the President's policy and presented proofs that their constituents were entirely satisfied to let matters take a peaceful course.

On February 16, 1803, James Ross [Pa.] introduced resolutions in the Senate to the effect that the infraction of the treaty rights in regard to Louisiana was "an aggression hostile to the honor and interest" of the United States, that it did "not consist with the dignity or safety of this Union" to hold rights "so important by a tenure so uncertain," and therefore "that the President be authorized to take possession" of a place of deposit and adopt measures necessary to secure it to the United States; and that he be authorized to call into service not over 50,000 militia, and that $5,000,000 be appropriated in order to carry out these measures.

John Breckinridge [Ky.] proposed substitute resolutions, which authorized the President only to prepare for such action as he might "deem necessary for the security of the territory of the United States."

Ross and Breckinridge defended their respective resolutions. Other speakers were Samuel White [Del.] and Gouverneur Morris [N. Y.], who supported Senator Ross's resolutions; and De Witt Clinton [N. Y.], Stevens T. Mason [Va.], and James Jackson [Ga.], who supported Senator Breckinridge's resolutions. The Breckinridge resolutions were adopted.

CONQUEST OR PURCHASE?

SENATE, FEBRUARY 16-25, 1903

SENATOR ROSS.—Sir, whom does this infraction of the treaty and the natural rights of this country most intimately affect? If the wound inflicted on national honor be not sensibly felt by the whole nation, is there not a large portion of your citizens exposed to immediate ruin by a continuance of this state of things? The calamity lights upon all those who live upon the western waters. More than half a million of your citizens are by this cut off from a market. What would be the language, what would be the feelings of gentlemen in this House, were such an indignity offered on the Atlantic coast? What would they say if the Chesapeake, the Delaware, or the Bay of New York were shut up and all egress prohibited by a foreign power? And yet none of these waters embrace the interests of so many as the Mississippi. The numbers and the property affected by shutting this river are greater than anything that could follow by the blockade of a river on the Atlantic coast. Every part of the Union is equally entitled to protection, and no good reason can be offered why one part should be less attended to than another.

Fortunately for this country there can be no doubt in the present case, our national right has been acknowledged and solemnly secured by treaty. The treaty has been long in a state of execution. It was violated and denied without provocation or apology. The treaty then is no security. This evident right is one the security of which ought not to be precarious: it is indispensable that the enjoyment of it shall be placed beyond all doubt. So important a right will never be secured while the mouth of the Mississippi is exclusively in the hands of the Spaniards. Caprice and enmity occasion constant interruption. From the very position of our country, from its geographical shape, from motives of complete independence, the command of the navigation of the river ought to be in our hands.

Why submit to a tardy, uncertain negotiation as the only means of regaining what you have lost: a negotiation with those who have wronged you; with those who declare they have no right at the moment they deprive you of yours? When in possession you will negotiate with more advantage. You will then be in the condition to keep others out. You will be in the actual exercise of jurisdiction over all your claims; your people will have the benefits of a lawful commerce. When your determination is known, you will make an easy and an honorable accommodation with any other claimant. The present possessors have no pretence to complain, for they have no right to the country by their own confession. The western people will discover that you are making every effort they could desire for their protection. They will ardently support you in the contest, if a contest becomes necessary. Their all will be at stake, and neither their zeal nor their courage need be doubted.

Suppose that this course be not now pursued. Let me warn gentlemen how they trifle with the feelings, the hopes, and the fears of such a body of men as those who inhabit the western waters. These men have arms in their hands; the same arms with which they proved victorious over their savage neighbors. They have a daring spirit; they have ample means of subsistence; and they have men disposed to lead them on to revenge their wrongs. Are you certain that they will wait the end of negotiations? When they hear that nothing has been done for their immediate relief, they will probably take their resolution and act. Indeed, from all we have heard, there is great reason to believe that they will or that they may have already taken that resolution.

They know the nature of the obstruction, they know the weakness of the country; they are sure of present success, and they have a bold river to bear them forward to the place of action. They want only a leader to conduct them, and it would be strange if, with such means and such a spirit, a leader should not soon present himself.

Senator Ross prophesied that such an expedition would probably result in the establishment of a new nation under French domination, and hence inimical to the United States. He feared, indeed, that it would lead to the disruption of the Union.

I say, let us go and redress ourselves; you will have the whole nation with you. On no question since the Declaration of Independence has the nation been so unanimous as upon this. It is true we have a lamentable division of political opinion among us which has produced much mischief and may produce much greater than any we have yet felt. But on this question party spirit ought to sink and disappear.

SENATOR WHITE.—We can never have permanent peace on our western waters till we possess ourselves of New Orleans and such other positions as may be necessary to give us the complete and absolute command of the navigation of the Mississippi. We have now such an opportunity of accomplishing this important object as may not be presented again in centuries, and every justification that could be wished for availing ourselves of the opportunity. Spain has dared us to the trial and now bids us defiance; she is yet in possession of that country; it is at this moment within your reach and within your power; it offers a sure and easy conquest: we should have to encounter there now only a weak, inactive, and unenterprising people; but how may a few months vary this scene and darken our prospects! Though not officially informed, we know that the Spanish provinces on the Mississippi have been ceded to the French, and that they will as soon as possible take possession of them. What may they then expect? When in the last extremity we shall be driven to arms in defence of our indisputable rights where now slumbers on his post with folded arms the sluggish Spaniard, we shall be hailed by the vigilant and alert French grenadier, and in the defenceless garrison that would now surrender at our approach we shall see unfurled the standards that have waved triumphant in Italy, surrounded by impregnable ramparts and defended by the disciplined veterans of Egypt.

But, Mr. President, what is more than all to be dreaded in such hands, it may be made the means of access and corruption to your national councils and a key to your treasury. Should Bonaparte approach the western people, not in the menacing attitude of an enemy, but under the specious garb of a protector and a friend; should he invite them to the free navigation of the river, and give them privileges in trade not heretofore enjoyed; should he send emissaries into their country to court and intrigue with them, he may seduce their affections and thus accomplish by address and cunning what even his force might not be equal to. In this way, having operated upon their passions, having enlisted in his service their hopes and their fears, he may gain an undue ascendancy over them. Should these things be effected, which God forbid—but Bonaparte in a few years has done much more—what, let me ask honorable gentlemen, will be the consequences? I fear even to look them in the face. The degraded countries of Europe that have been enslaved by the divisions and distractions of their councils, produced by similar means, afford us melancholy examples. Foreign influence will gain admittance to your national councils; the First Consul, or his interests, will be represented in the Congress of the United States; this floor may become the theater of sedition and intrigue. You will have a French faction in the Government, and that faction will increase with the rapidly increasing population of the western world. Whenever this period shall arrive it will be the crisis of American glory, and must result either in the political subjugation of the Atlantic States or in their separation from the western country; and I am sure there is no American who does not view as one of the greatest evils that could befall us the dismemberment of this Union. Honorable gentlemen may wrap themselves up in their present imaginary security and say that these things are afar off, or that they can never happen; but let me beseech of them to look well to the measures they are now pursuing, for, on the wisdom, the promptness, and energy of those measures will depend whether they shall happen or not. And let me tell them, sir, that the want of firmness or judgment in the Cabinet will be no apology for the disgrace and ruin of the nation.

SENATOR BRECKINRIDGE.—Early in the session the House of Representatives was informed by a communication from the President that the Governor of New Orleans had strongly opposed the conduct of the Intendant, declaring that he was acting without authority in refusing the deposit.

The Spanish Minister, who resides here and who stands deservedly high in the confidence of his government, was clearly of opinion that the Intendant was acting without authority, and that redress would be given so soon as the competent authority could interpose. From this state of things what is the course any civilized nation who respects her character or rights would pursue? There is but one course, which is admitted by writers on the laws of nations as the proper one, and is thus described by Vattel in his book, Secs. 336, 338:

"A sovereign ought to show, in all his quarrels, a sincere desire of rendering justice and preserving peace. He is obliged before he takes up arms, and after having taken them up also, to offer equitable conditions, and then alone his arms become just against an obstinate enemy, who refuses to listen to justice or to equity. His own advantage, and that of human society, oblige him to attempt, before he takes up arms, all the pacific methods of obtaining either the reparation of the injury, or a just satisfaction. This moderation, this circumspection, is so much the more proper, and commonly even indispensable, as the action we take for an injury does not always proceed from a design to offend us, and is sometimes a mistake rather than an act of malice: frequently it even happens that the injury is done by inferior persons, without their sovereign having any share in it; and on these occasions it is not natural to presume that he would refuse us a just satisfaction."

This is the course which the President has taken and in which the House of Representatives have expressed, by their resolution, their confidence.

But the gentleman is afraid that if we do not immediately seize the country we shall lose the golden opportunity of doing it. Would your national honor be free from imputation by a conduct of such inconsistency and duplicity? A minister is sent to the offending nation with an olive-branch for the purpose of an amicable discussion and settlement of differences and, before he has scarcely turned his back, we invade the territories of that nation with an army of fifty thousand men! Would such conduct comport with the genius and principles of our Republic, whose true interest is peace and who has hitherto professed to cultivate it with all nations? Would not such a procedure subject us to the just censure of the world, and to the strongest jealousy of those who have possessions near to us? Would such a procedure meet the approbation of even our own citizens, whose lives and fortunes would be risked in the conflict? And would it not be policy inexcusably rash to plunge this country into war to effect that which the President not only thinks can be effected but is now actually in a train of negotiation? If, on the other hand, negotiation should fail, how different will be the ground on which we stand! We stand acquitted by the world, and, what is of more consequence, by our own citizens and our own consciences. But one sentiment will then animate and pervade the whole, and from thenceforth we will take counsel only from our courage.

SENATOR CLINTON.—If I were called upon to prescribe a course of policy most important for this country to pursue, it would be to avoid European connections and wars. It is our interest and our duty to cultivate peace with sincerity and good faith. As a young nation, pursuing industry in every channel and adventuring commerce in every sea, it is highly important that we should not only have a pacific character but that we should really deserve it. If we manifest an unwarrantable ambition and a rage for conquest, we unite all the great powers of Europe against us. The security of all the European possessions in our vicinity will eternally depend, not upon their strength, but upon our moderation and justice. Look at the Canadas—at the Spanish territories to the south—at the British, Spanish, French, Danish, and Dutch West India islands—at the vast countries to the west, as far as where the Pacific rolls its waves; consider well the eventful consequences that would result if we were possessed by a spirit of conquest; consider well the impression which a manifestation of that spirit will make upon those who would be affected by it. If we are to rush at once into the territory of a neighboring nation with fire and sword for the misconduct of a subordinate officer, will not our national character be greatly injured? Will we not be classed with the robbers and destroyers of mankind? Will not the nations of Europe perceive in this conduct the germ of a lofty spirit and an enterprising ambition which will level them to the earth when age has matured our strength and expanded our powers of annoyance, unless they combine and cripple us in our infancy? May, not the consequences be that we must look out for a naval force to protect our commerce; that a close alliance will result; that we will be thrown at once into the ocean of European politics, where every wave that rolls and every wind that blows will agitate our bark? Is this a desirable state of things? Will the people of this country be seduced into it by all the colorings of rhetoric and all the arts of sophistry—by vehement appeals to their pride and artful addresses to their cupidity? No, sir. Three-fourths of the American people (I assert it boldly and without fear of contradiction) are opposed to this measure. And would you take up arms with a millstone hanging around your neck? How would you bear up, not only against the force of the enemy, but against the irresistible current of public opinion? The thing, sir, is impossible, the measure is worse than madness; it is wicked beyond the powers of description.

It is in vain for the mover to oppose these weighty considerations by menacing us with an insurrection of the western States, that may eventuate in their seizure of New Orleans without the authority of Government; their throwing themselves into the arms of a foreign power; or in a dissolution of the Union. Such threats are doubly improper—improper as they respect the persons to whom they are addressed, because we are not to be deterred from the performance of our duty by menaces of any kind, from whatever quarter they may proceed; and it is no less improper to represent our western brethren as a lawless, unprincipled banditti who would at once release themselves from the wholesome restraints of law and order, forego the sweets of liberty, and either renounce the blessings of self-government or, like the Goths and Vandals, pour down with the irresistible force of a torrent, upon the countries below and carry havoc and desolation in their train. A separation by a mountain and a different outlet into the Atlantic cannot create any natural collision between the Atlantic and western States; on the contrary, they are bound together by a community of interests and a similarity of language and manners—by the ties of consanguinity and friendship and a sameness of principles. There is no reflecting and well-principled man in this country who can view the severance of the States without horror and who does not consider it as a Pandora's box which will overwhelm us with every calamity; and it has struck me with not a little astonishment that, on the agitation of almost every great political question, we should be menaced with this evil. Last session, when a bill repealing a judiciary act was under consideration, we were told that the eastern States would withdraw themselves from the Union if it should obtain; and we are now informed that, if we do not accede to the proposition before us, the western States will hoist the standard of revolt and dismember the empire. Sir, these threats are calculated to produce the evil they predict and they may possibly approximate the spirit they pretend to warn us against. They are at all times unnecessary, at all times improper, at all times mischievous, and ought never to be mentioned within these walls.

SENATOR JACKSON.—Peace is the interest of all republics, and war their destruction; it loads and fetters them with debt and entangles not only the present race but posterity. Peace, sir, has been the ruling policy of the United States throughout all her career. If we show the citizens that we are not willing to go to war and load them with taxes, they will all be with us when a necessity for war arrives. What, sir, was the policy of America from the commencement of the Revolution? At that day did we hastily go to war? No; we tried every peaceable means to avoid it, and those means induced a unanimity in the people.

At the present moment, sir, the people are averse to war; they are satisfied with the steps of the executive; they wish negotiation. If you adopt these resolutions they will be still divided; if you negotiate and fail in that negotiation—if you cannot obtain a redress of the injury which they feel as well as you, they will go all lengths with you and be prepared for any event; you will have this advantage: you will be unanimous, and America united is a match for the world. In such a case, sir, every man will be anxious to march, he would go himself if called on, and whether the sluggish Spaniard or the French grenadier commands New Orleans it must fall; they will not be able to resist the brave and numerous hosts of our western brethren, who are so much interested in the injury complained of. New Orleans must belong to the United States; it must come to us in the course of human events, it will naturally fall into our hands by gradual but inevitable causes, as sure and certain as manufactures arise from increased population and the plentiful products of agriculture and commerce. But let it be noticed that, if New Orleans by a refusal of justice falls into our hands by force, the Floridas, as sure as fate, fall with it. Good faith forbids encroachment on a pacific ally; but if hostility shows itself against us, interest demands it; Georgia in such case could not do without it. God and nature have destined New Orleans and the Floridas to belong to this great and rising empire. As natural bounds to the south are the Atlantic, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Mississippi, and the world at some future day cannot hold them from us.

SENATOR MORRIS.—In my opinion, there is nothing worth fighting for but national honor; for in the national honor is involved the national independence. I know that a State may find itself in such unpropitious circumstances that prudence may force a wise Government to conceal the sense of indignity. But the insult should be engraved on tablets of brass with a pencil of steel. And, when that time and chance which happen to all shall bring forward the favorable moment, then let the avenging arm strike him. It is by avowing and maintaining this stern principle of honor that peace can be preserved.

What is the state of things? There has been a cession of the island of New Orleans and of Louisiana to France. Whether the Floridas have also been ceded is not yet certain. Now, sir, had Spain a right to make this cession without our consent? Gentlemen have taken it for granted that she had. But I deny the position. No nation has a right to give another a dangerous neighbor without her consent. He who renders me insecure, he who hazards my peace and exposes me to imminent danger, commits an act of hostility against me and gives me the rights consequent on that act. It is among the first limitations to the exercise of the rights of property that we must so use our own as not to injure another; and it is under the immediate sense of this restriction that nations are bound to act toward each other.

But it is not this transfer alone. There are circumstances both in the time and in the manner of it which deserve attention. I ask, was this a public treaty? No. Was official notice of it given to the Government of this country? Was it announced to the President of the United States in the usual forms of civility between nations who duly respect each other? It was not. Had this transaction been intended fairly it would have been told frankly. But it was secret because it was hostile. The First Consul, in the moment of terminating his differences with you, sought the means of future influence and control. He found and secured a pivot for that immense lever by which, with potent arm, he means to subvert your civil and political institutions. Has the King of Spain, has the First Consul of France, no means of making such communication to the President of the United States? Yes, sir, we have a minister in Spain; we have a minister in France. Nothing was easier, and yet nothing has been done. Our first magistrate has been treated with contempt; and through him our country has been insulted.

With that meek and peaceful spirit now so strongly recommended we submitted to this insult and what followed? That which might have been expected—a violation of our treaty. An open and direct violation by a public officer of the Spanish Government. Furthermore, the Intendant, as if determined to try the extent of your meekness, forbids to your citizens all communication with those who inhabit the shores of the Mississippi. Though they should be starving the Spaniard is made criminal who should give them food. Fortunately the waters of the river are potable, or else we should be precluded from the common benefits of nature, the common bounty of heaven. What then, I ask, is the amount of this savage conduct? Sir, it is war. Open and direct war. And yet gentlemen recommend peace and forbid us to take up the gauntlet of defiance.

Sir, I repeat to you that I wish for peace—real, lasting, honorable peace. To obtain and secure this blessing let us by a bold and decisive conduct convince the powers of Europe that we are determined to defend our rights; that we will not submit to insult; that we will not bear degradation. This is the conduct which becomes a generous people. This conduct will command the respect of the world. Nay, sir, it may rouse all Europe to a proper sense of their situation. They see that the balance of power on which their liberties depend is, if not destroyed, in extreme danger. They know that the dominion of France has been extended by the sword over millions who groan in the servitude of their new masters. These unwilling subjects are ripe for revolt. The empire of the Gauls is not like that of Rome, secured by political institutions. It may yet be broken. But, whatever may be the conduct of others, let us act as becomes ourselves. I cannot believe, with my honorable colleague, that three-fourths of America are opposed to vigorous measures. I cannot believe that they will meanly refuse to pay the sums needful to vindicate their honor and support their independence. Sir, this is a libel on the people of America. They will disdain submission to the proudest sovereign on earth. They have not lost the spirit of seventy-six. But, sir, if they are so base as to barter their rights for gold; if they are so vile that they will not defend their honor; they are unworthy of the rank they enjoy, and it is no matter how soon they are parceled out among better masters.

SENATOR MASON.—The resolutions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Ross] go at once to the point of war. Indeed, he told us that it is not war—it was only going and taking peaceable possession of New Orleans! How did the gentleman mean to go, and how take peaceable possession? Would he march at the head of the posse comitatus? No! he would march at the head of fifty thousand militia, and he would send forth the whole naval and regular force, armed and provided with military stores. He would enter their island, set fire to their warehouses and bombard their city, desolate their farms and plantations, and, having swept all their habitations away, after wading through streams of blood, he would tell those who had escaped destruction: we do not come here to make war on you—we are a very moderate, tender-hearted kind of neighbors and are come here barely to take peaceable possession of your territory! Why, sir, this is too naked not to be an insult to the understanding of a child!

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. Morris] did not trifle with the Senate in such a style; he threw off the mask at once, and, in a downright manly way, fairly told us that he liked war—that it was his favorite mode of negotiating between nations; that war gave dignity to the species—that it drew forth the most noble energies of humanity! That gentleman scorned to tell us that he wished to take peaceable possession. No! He could not snivel; his vast genius spurned huckstering; his mighty soul would not bear to be locked up in a petty warehouse at New Orleans; he was for war—terrible, glorious havoc! He tells you plainly that you are not only to recover your rights, but you must remove your neighbors from their possessions and repel those to whom they may transfer the soil; that Bonaparte's ambition is insatiable; that he will throw in colonies of Frenchmen, who will settle on your frontier for thousands of miles round about (when he comes there); and he does not forget to tell you of the imminent dangers which threaten our good old friends, the English. He tells you that New Orleans is the lock and you must seize upon the key, and shut the door against this terrible Bonaparte or he will come with his legions, and, as Gulliver served the Lilliputians, wash you off the map. Not content, in his great care for your honor and glory, as a statesman and a warrior he turns prophet to oblige you—your safety in the present year or the next does not satisfy him—his vast mind, untrammelled by the ordinary progressions of chronology, looks over ages to come with a faculty bordering on omniscience, and conjures us to come forward and regulate the decrees of Providence at ten thousand years' distance.

We have been told that Spain had no right to cede Louisiana to France; that she had ceded to us the privilege of deposit, and had, therefore, no right to cede her territory without our consent! Are gentlemen disposed to wage war in support of this principle? Because she has given us a little privilege—a mere indulgence on her territory—is she thereby constrained from doing anything for ever with her immense possessions? No doubt if the gentleman [Mr. Morris] were to be the negotiator on this occasion he would say: "You mean to cede New Orleans; no, gentlemen, I beg your pardon, you cannot cede that, for we want it ourselves; and, as to the Floridas, it would be very indiscreet to cede that, as, in all human probability, we shall want that also in less than five hundred years from this day; and then, as to Louisiana, you surely could not think of that, for in something less than a thousand years, in the natural order of things, our population will progress toward that place also."

We are also told that the power of the Chief Consul is so great that he puts up and pulls down all the nations of the old world at discretion, and that he can do so with us. Yet we are told by the wonderful statesman who gives us this awful information that we must go to war with this maker and destroyer of governments. If, after the unceasing pursuit of empire and conquest, which is thus presented to us, we take possession of his territory, from the gentleman's own declarations, what are we to expect, only that this wonderful man—who never abandons an object; who thinks his own and the nation's honor pledged to go through whatever he undertakes—will next attack us? Does the gentleman think that this terrible picture, which his warm imagination has drawn, is a conclusive argument for proceeding to that war which he recommends?

On April 11, 1803, the day before Monroe's arrival at Paris, Bonaparte, who was greatly in need of money to prosecute his designs of European conquest, invited Minister Livingston to make an offer for the whole of the vast territory known as Louisiana. Monroe and Livingston offered $10,000,000. The price was finally fixed at $15,000,000, a sum which included $3,750,000 in claims of American citizens against France for depredations on commerce.¹ The treaty was signed on April 30, 1803.

It is probable that Bonaparte, in making the treaty, broke his faith with Spain, there having been a secret understanding on the retrocession of the territory from Spain to France that the territory would not be alienated. Spain at once protested against the sale to America, for she saw that Florida, now surrounded by an American territory, would on the first occasion fall into the hands of the United States, and that her possession of Mexico was also greatly endangered by contiguity with the expanding American republic. Indeed, Spain did not consent to the transfer of Louisiana for a number of years, during which she preserved a hostile attitude toward the United States that, in the opinion of a number of American statesmen, justified our going to war against her. The Federalist opponents of the treaty in the Senate seized upon her protest as an argument against ratification, saying that Bonaparte was selling what he had no right to dispose of, and therefore that we were not acquiring a clear title, and that the cloud upon it might assume the proportions of a storm of war sweeping over the sea from the tricked and justly indignant Spain. The force of this argument, however, was weakened by the one they had previously made in urging the forcible seizure of New Orleans while it was yet in possession of the "sluggish Spaniard slumbering on his post," and before it was occupied by "the vigilant French grenadier."

The Democrats were exultant over the treaty, hailing it as the greatest achievement yet accomplished by the nation—one that assured for ages to come the growth and development as well as the integrity of the Union. Jefferson in private acknowledged that the act was not warranted by the national charter, asserting, however, that it could be cured of all constitutional defects by the ratification of Congress. In a letter to the Administration leader in the Senate, John Breckinridge, Jefferson wrote, on August 12, 1803:

"The Constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign territory, still less for incorporating foreign nations into our Union. The executive, in seizing the fugitive occurrence which so much advances the good of their country, have done an act beyond the Constitution. The legislature, in casting behind them metaphysical subtleties and risking themselves like faithful servants, must ratify and pay for it and throw themselves on their country for doing for them, unauthorized, what we know they would have done for themselves had they been in a situation to do it. It is the case of a guardian investing the money of his ward in purchasing an important adjacent territory and saying to him when of age, 'I did this for your good; I pretend to no right to bind you; you may disavow me and I must get out of the scrape as I can; I thought it my duty to risk myself for you.'"

The policy suggested by the President was followed by the Democratic Senators with great tactical adroitness. Fortunately for them the first Federalist speaker who opposed the treaty did so, not on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the actions of its American negotiators, but because of the cloud on the title of the purchased territory. This objection was readily answered, and the Opposition was thereby placed on the defensive, while the Administration was shown to be, on this point, exercising its constitutional right. This gave the appearance that its main action was constitutional, and therefore the Democrats generously admitted that, in the apparently minor points (though really major), there was room for debate as to whether or not the letter of the Constitution had been followed, and appealed to the patriotism of their opponents to waive the points, since all defects in the treaty could be removed by the Senate's action. This policy won over all but the extreme partisans among the Federalists, and the treaty was ratified by a vote of 26 to 5.

In this debate the following speakers were prominent: James Jackson [Ga.], Robert Wright [Md.], John Taylor [Va.], Wilson C. Nicholas [Va.], John Breckinridge [Ky.], and John Quincy Adams [Mass.], in the affirmative; and William H. Wells [Del.], Timothy Pickens [Mass.], and Uriah Tracy [Conn.], in the negative. Mr. Adams had recently been appointed to the Senate. Although he was nominally a Federalist his previous career as a diplomat had removed him from the evil influence of partisanship as well as inclined him to give a free rein to the President in treaty making. Accordingly he supported the treaty, while confessing the constitutional objections to it, and advising that the Constitution be so amended as to permit, without question, such territorial extension. In such recommendation he was in thorough accord with the view of the President.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE LOUISIANA PURCHASE

SENATE, NOVEMBER 3, 1803

SENATOR WELLS.—There are two acts necessary to be performed to carry the present treaty into effect—one by the French Government, the other by our own. They are to deliver us a fair and effectual possession of the ceded territory; and then, and not till then, are we to pay the purchase money. We have already authorized the President to receive possession. This coöperation on our part was requisite to enable the French to comply with the stipulation they had made; they could not deliver unless somebody was appointed to receive. In this view of the subject, the question which presents itself to my mind is: who shall judge whether the French Government does, or does not, faithfully comply with the previous condition? The bill on your table gives to the President this power. I am for our retaining and exercising it ourselves. I may be asked: why not delegate this power to the President? Sir, I answer by inquiring why we should delegate it? To us it properly belongs; and, unless some advantage will be derived to the United States, it shall not be transferred with my consent. Congress will be in session at the time that the delivery of the ceded territory takes place; and, if we should then be satisfied that the French have executed with fidelity that part of the treaty which is incumbent upon them first to perform, I pledge myself to vote for the payment of the purchase money. This appears to me, arguing upon general principles, to be the course which ought to be pursued, even supposing there were attending this case no particular difficulties. But in this especial case are there not among the archives of the Senate sufficient documents, and which have been withheld from the House of Representatives, to justify an apprehension that the French Government was not invested with the capacity to convey this property to us, and that we shall not receive that kind of possession which is stipulated for by the treaty? I am not permitted, by the order of this body, to make any other than this general reference to those documents. Suffice it to say that they have strongly impressed me with an opinion that, even if possession is rendered to us, the territory will come into our hands without any title to justify our holding it.

SENATOR JACKSON.—The honorable gentleman [Mr. Wells] has said that the French have no title, and, having no title herself, we can derive none from her. Is not, I ask, the King of Spain's proclamation, declaring the cession of Louisiana to France, and his orders to his governor and officers to deliver it to France, a title? Do nations give any other?

The treaty of St. Ildefonso [whereby Spain ceded Louisiana back to France] was the groundwork of the cession, and, whatever might have been the terms to be performed by France, the King of Spain's proclamation and orders have declared to all the world that they were complied with.

Last session we were impressed with the necessity of taking immediate possession of the island of New Orleans in the face of two nations, and now we entertain doubts if we can combat the weakest of those powers; and we are further told we are going to sacrifice the immense sum of fifteen millions of dollars, and have to go to war with Spain for the country afterwards; when, last session, war was to take place at all events, and no costs were equal to the object. Gentlemen seem to be displeased because we have procured it peaceably, and at probably ten times less expense than it would have cost us had we taken forcible possession of New Orleans alone, which, I am persuaded, would have involved us in a war which would have saddled us with a debt of from one to two hundred millions, and perhaps have lost New Orleans, and the right of deposit, after all. I again repeat, sir, that I do not believe that Spain will venture war with the United States. I believe she dare not; if she dare, she will pay the costs. The Floridas will be immediately ours; they will almost take themselves. The inhabitants pant for the blessings of your equal and wise government; they ardently long to become a part of the United States. An officer, duly authorized, and armed with the bare proclamation of the President, would go near to take them; the inhabitants by hundreds would flock to his standard, the very Spanish force itself would assist in their reduction; it is composed principally of the Irish brigade and Creoles—the former disaffected, and the latter the dregs of mankind.

Exclusive, however, of the loss of the Floridas, the road to Mexico is now open to us, which, if Spain acts in an amicable way, I wish may, and hope will, be shut, as respects the United States, for ever. For these reasons, I think, sir, Spain will avoid a war in which she has nothing to gain and everything to lose.

SENATOR WRIGHT.—The honorable gentleman from Delaware [Mr. Wells] says we ought to be satisfied that the possession stipulated by the treaty shall have been delivered up before we pass this bill. Has he forgot that, by the Constitution, the President is to superintend the execution of the law? Or has he forgot that treaties are the supreme law of the land? Or why, while he professes to respect this Constitution, does he oppose the commission of the execution of this law to that organ of the Government to which it has been assigned by the Constitution? Why, I ask, does he distrust the President? Has he not been, throughout the whole of this business, very much alive to the peaceful acquisition of this immense territory, and the invaluable waters of the Mississippi? A property which, but the other day, we were told was all-important, and so necessary to our political existence that if it was not obtained the western people would sever themselves from the Union. This property, for which countless millions were then proposed to be expended, and the best blood of our citizens to be shed, and which then was to be had at all hazards, per fas aut per nefas, seems now to have lost its worth, and it would seem as if some gentlemen could not be satisfied with the purchase, because our title was not recorded in the blood of its inhabitants. But that this is not the wish of the American people has been unequivocally declared by their immediate representatives in Congress, as well as by this House, who had each expressed their approbation of the peaceful title we had acquired, by majorities I thought not to be misunderstood. And the gentleman, although he voted for the ratification of the treaty, now again calls on us to investigate the title. It is certainly too late.

SENATOR PICKERING.—A treaty to be obligatory must not contravene the Constitution, nor contain any stipulations which transcend the powers therein given to the President and Senate. The treaty between the United States and the French republic, professing to cede Louisiana to the United States, appeared to him to contain such an exceptionable stipulation—a stipulation which cannot be executed by any authority now existing. It is declared in the third article, that "the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States." But neither the President and Senate, nor the President and Congress, are competent to such an act of incorporation.

The assent of each individual State is necessary for the admission of a foreign country as an associate in the Union; in like manner as in a commercial house, the consent of each member would be necessary to admit a new partner into the company; and whether the assent of every State to such an indispensable amendment is attainable is uncertain.

I have never doubted the right of the United States to acquire new territory, either by purchase or by conquest, and to govern the territory so acquired as a dependent province; and in this way might Louisiana become a territory of the United States, and receive a form of government infinitely preferable to that to which its inhabitants are now subject.

SENATOR TAYLOR.—There have been, Mr. President, two objections made against the treaty; one that the United States cannot constitutionally acquire territory; the other that the treaty stipulates for the admission of a new State into the Union; a stipulation which the treaty-making power is unable to comply with. To these objections I shall endeavor to give answers not heretofore urged.

Before confederation each State in the Union possessed a right, as attached to sovereignty, of acquiring territory, by war, purchase, or treaty. This right must be either still possessed or forbidden both to each State and to the General Government, or transferred to the General Government. It is not possessed by the States separately, because war and compacts with foreign powers and with each other are prohibited to a separate State; and no other means of acquiring territory, exist. By depriving every State of the means of exercising the right of acquiring territory, the Constitution has deprived each separate State of the right itself. Neither the means nor the right of acquiring territory are forbidden to the United States; on the contrary, in the fourth article of the Constitution, Congress is empowered "to dispose of and regulate the territory belonging to the United States." This recognizes the right of the United States to hold territory. The means of acquiring territory consist of war and compact; both are expressly surrendered to Congress and forbidden to the several States; and no right in a separate State to hold territory without its limits is recognized by the Constitution, nor any mode of effecting it possible, consistent with it. The means of acquiring and the right of holding territory, being both given to the United States, and prohibited to each State, it follows that these attributes of sovereignty once held by each State are thus transferred to the United States; and that, if the means of acquiring and the right of holding are equivalent to the right of acquiring territory, then this right merged from the separate States to the United States, as indispensably annexed to the treaty-making power, and the power of making war; or, indeed, is literally given to the General Government by the Constitution.

SENATOR TRACY.—The paragraph in the Constitution which says that "new States may be admitted by Congress into this Union" has been quoted to justify this treaty. To this two answers may be given, either of which are conclusive. First, if Congress have the power collectively of admitting Louisiana, it cannot be vested in the President and Senate alone. Secondly, Congress have no power to admit new foreign states into the Union without the consent of the old partners. The article of the Constitution, if any person will take the trouble to examine it, refers to domestic States only, and not at all to foreign states; and it is unreasonable to suppose that Congress should, by a majority only, admit new foreign states, and swallow up, by it, the old partners, when two-thirds of all the members are made requisite for the least alteration in the Constitution. The words of the Constitution are completely satisfied by a construction which shall include only the admission of domestic States, who were all parties to the Revolutionary war, and to the compact; and the spirit of the association seems to embrace no other. But, I repeat it, if the Congress collectively has this power the President and Senate cannot, of course, have it exclusively.

I think, sir, that, from a fair construction of the Constitution and an impartial view of the nature and principles of our association, the President and Senate have not the power of thus obtruding upon us Louisiana.

SENATOR BRECKINRIDGE.—No gentleman has yet ventured to deny that it is incumbent on the United States to secure to the citizens of the western waters the uninterrupted use of the Mississippi. Under this impression of duty what has been the conduct of the General Government, and particularly of the gentlemen now in the opposition, for the last eight months? When the right of deposit was violated by a Spanish officer without authority from his government, these gentlemen considered our national honor so deeply implicated, and the rights of the western people so wantonly violated, that no atonement or redress was admissible, except through the medium of the bayonet. Negotiation was scouted at. It was deemed pusillanimous, and was said to exhibit a want of fellow-feeling for the western people, and a disregard to their essential rights. Fortunately for their country the counsel of these gentlemen was rejected, and their war measures negatived. The so much scouted process of negotiation was, however, persisted in, and, instead of restoring the right of deposit and securing more effectually for the future our right to navigate the Mississippi, the Mississippi itself was acquired, and everything which appertained to it. I did suppose that those gentlemen who, at the last session, so strongly urged war measures for the attainment of this object, upon an avowal that it was too important to trust to the tardy and less effectual process of negotiation, would have stood foremost in carrying the treaty into effect, and that the peaceful mode by which it was acquired would not lessen with them the importance of the acquisition.

Permit me to examine some of the principal reasons which are deemed so powerful by gentlemen as to induce them to vote for the destruction of this treaty. Unfortunately for the gentlemen, no two of them can agree on the same set of objections; and, what is still more unfortunate, I believe there is no two of them concur in any one objection. In one thing only they seem to agree, and that is to vote against the bill. An honorable gentleman from Delaware [Mr. White] considered the price to be enormous. An honorable gentleman from Connecticut, who has just sat down [Mr. Tracy], says he has no objection whatever to the price; it is, he supposes, not too much. An honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Pickering] says that France acquired no title from Spain, and therefore our title is bad. The same gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Tracy] says he has no objection to the title of France; he thinks it a good one. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Pickering] contends that the United States cannot, under the Constitution, acquire foreign territory. The gentleman from Connecticut is of a different opinion, and has no doubt but that the United States can acquire and hold foreign territory; but that Congress alone have the power of incorporating that territory into the Union. Of what weight, therefore, ought all their lesser objections be entitled to when they are at war among themselves on the greater one?

The same gentleman has told us that this acquisition will, from its extent, soon prove destructive to the Confederacy.

This is an old and hackneyed doctrine: that a republic ought not to be too extensive. But the gentleman has assumed two facts and then reasoned from them: First, that the extent is too great; and, secondly, that the country will be soon populated. I would ask, sir, what is his standard extent for a republic? How does he come at that standard? Our boundary is already extensive. Would his standard extent be violated by including the island of Orleans and the Floridas? I presume not, as all parties seem to think their acquisition, in part or in whole, essential. Why not, then, acquire territory on the west as well as on the east side of the Mississippi? Is the Goddess of Liberty restrained by water courses? Is she governed by geographical limits? Is her dominion on this continent confined to the east side of the Mississippi? So far from believing in the doctrine that a Republic ought to be confined within narrow limits, I believe, on the contrary, that the more extensive its dominion the more safe and more durable it will be. In proportion to the number of hands you intrust the precious blessings of a free government to, in the same proportion do you multiply the chances for their preservation. I entertain, therefore, no fears for the Confederacy on account of its extent.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Tracy] admits explicitly that Congress may acquire territory and hold it as a territory, but cannot incorporate it into the Union. By this construction he admits the power to acquire territory, a modification infinitely more dangerous than the unconditional admission of a new State; for, by his construction, territories and citizens are considered and held as the property of the Government of the United States, and may consequently be used as dangerous engines in the hands of the Government against the States and people.

The same gentleman, in reply to the observations which fell from the gentleman from South Carolina as to the admission of new States, observes that, although Congress may admit new States, the President and Senate, who are but a component part, cannot. Apply this doctrine to the case before us. How could Congress by any mode of legislation admit this country into the Union until it was acquired? And how can this acquisition be made except through the treaty-making power? Could the gentleman rise in his place and move for leave to bring in a bill for the purchase of Louisiana and its admission into the Union? I take it that no transaction of this or any other kind with a foreign power can take place except through the executive department, and that in the form of a treaty, agreement, or convention. When the acquisition is made Congress can then make such disposition of it as may be expedient.

SENATOR ADAMS.—It has been argued that the bill ought not to pass because the treaty itself is unconstitutional, or, to use the words of the gentleman from Connecticut, an extra-constitutional act; because it contains engagements which the powers of the Senate were not competent to ratify, the powers of Congress not competent to confirm, and, as two of the gentlemen have contended, not even the legislatures of the number of States requisite to effect an amendment of the Constitution are adequate to sanction. It is, therefore, say they, a nullity; we cannot fulfill our part of its conditions, and on our failure in the performance of any one stipulation, France may consider herself as absolved from the obligations of the whole treaty on her. For my own part, I am free to confess that the third article, and more especially the seventh, contain engagements placing us in a dilemma from which I see no possible mode of extricating ourselves but by an amendment, or rather an addition, to the Constitution. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Tracy], both on a former occasion and in this day's debate, appears to me to have shown this to demonstration. But what is this more than saying that the President and Senate have bound the nation to engagements which require the coöperation of more extensive powers than theirs to carry them into execution? Nothing is more common, in the negotiations between nation and nation, than for a minister to agree to and sign articles beyond the extent of his powers. This is what your ministers, in the very case before you, have confessedly done. It is well known that their powers did not authorize them to conclude this treaty; but they acted for the benefit of their country, and this House by a large majority has advised to the ratification of their proceedings. Suppose, then, not only that the ministers who signed, but the President and Senate who ratified this compact, have exceeded their powers. Suppose that the other House of Congress, who have given their assent by passing this and other bills for the fulfillment of the obligations it imposes on us, have exceeded their powers. Nay, suppose even that the majority of States competent to amend the Constitution in other cases could not amend it in this without exceeding their powers—and this is the extremest point to which any gentleman on this floor has extended his scruples—suppose all this, and there still remains in the country a power competent to adopt and sanction every part of our engagements, and to carry them entirely into execution. For, notwithstanding the objections and apprehensions of many individuals, of many wise, able, and excellent men, in various parts of the Union, yet such is the public favor attending the transaction which commenced by the negotiation of this treaty, and which, I hope, will terminate in our full, undisturbed, and undisputed possession of the ceded territory, that I firmly believe if an amendment to the Constitution, amply sufficient for the accomplishment of everything for which we have contracted, shall be proposed, as I think it ought; it will be adopted by the legislature of every State in the Union. We can therefore fulfill our part of the conventions, and this is all that France has a right to require of us.

SENATOR NICHOLAS.—The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Tracy] must consider the grant of power to the legislature as a limitation of the treaty-making power, for he says "that the power to admit new States and to make citizens is given to Congress, and not to the treaty-making power"; therefore an engagement in a treaty to do either of these things is unconstitutional. I cannot help expressing my surprise at that gentleman's giving that opinion, and I think myself justifiable in saying that if it is now his opinion it was not always so. The contrary opinion is the only justification of that gentleman's approbation of the British treaty, and of his vote for carrying it into effect. By that treaty a great number of persons had a right to become American citizens immediately; not only without a law but contrary to an existing law. And by that treaty many of the powers specially given to Congress were exercised by the treaty-making power. It is for gentlemen who supported that treaty to reconcile the construction given by them to the Constitution in its application to that instrument with their exposition of it at this time.

The proposal of Senator Adams to amend the Constitution in order to legalize the treaty was not supported, being out of line with the previous policy of the Federalists and not agreeable to the desires of the Democrats now that they were in power in the executive as well as legislative branches of the Government. Accordingly it was not acted upon, and thus the ratification of the Louisiana Purchase marked the greatest step forward that had yet been taken in the broad construction of the Constitution in the matter of increasing the power of the President.

in his message. Referring to the anomaly that the commerce with France for which American vessels were captured and condemned by Great Britain was practiced with impunity by her own merchantmen, he said:

New principles have been interpolated into the law of nations, founded neither in justice nor the usage or acknowledgment of nations. According to these, a belligerent takes to itself a commerce with its own enemy which it denies to a neutral, on the ground of its aiding that enemy in the war. But reason revolts at such an inconsistency, and, the neutral having equal right with the belligerent to decide the question, the interests of our constituents, and the duty of maintaining the authority of reason, the only umpire between just nations, impose on us the obligation of providing an effectual and determined opposition to a doctrine so injurious to the rights of peaceable nations. Indeed, the confidence we ought to have in the justice of others still countenances the hope that a sounder view of those rights will, of itself, induce from every belligerent a more correct observance of them.

On January 17, 1806, the President sent a special message to the Senate on the subject, giving an account of the actions he had taken, and asking that Congress take the matter into consideration. He said:

The right of a neutral to carry on commercial intercourse with every part of the dominions of a belligerent, permitted by the laws of the country (with the exception of blockaded ports and contraband of war), was believed to have been decided between Great Britain and the United States by the sentence of their commissioners mutually appointed to decide on that and other questions of difference between the two nations, and by the actual payment of the damages awarded by them against Great Britain for the infractions of that right. When, therefore, it was perceived that the same principle was revived, with others more novel, and extending the injury, instructions were given to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at the Court of London, and remonstrances duly made by him on the subject, as will appear by documents transmitted herewith. These were followed by a partial and temporary suspension only, without any disavowal of the principle. He has, therefore, been instructed to urge this subject anew, to bring it more fully to the bar of reason, and to insist on rights

A STATE of war had existed between France and Great Britain since May 16, 1803, though actual hostilities did not begin until two years later. In May, 1805, the British Court of Appeals in the case of the captured American vessel Essex reversed the former rule of the British admiralty courts, viz., that in time of war "landing goods and paying duties in a neutral country breaks the continuity of the voyage, and so legalizes the trade," and held that such transshipment, if evidently fraudulent, did not absolve the vessel from capture and condemnation. Immediately following the decision British warships and privateers at once began to prey on American vessels which were carrying through neutral countries the trade between France and her colonies.

MESSAGES ON BRITISH AGGRESSION

President Jefferson brought the matter to the attention of Congress at its next session in December, 1805, too evident and too important to be surrendered. In the mean time the evil is proceeding, under adjudications founded on the principle which is denied. Under these circumstances the subject presents itself for the consideration of Congress.

The Senate referred the matter to a committee, which on February 12, 1806, presented a resolution that importation of British manufactures should be prohibited until equitable arrangements had been made between Great Britain and the United States on the differences between the two governments. This was adopted on April 10, by a vote of 19 to 9.

On January 29, 1806, a similar resolution had been proposed in the House of Representatives by Andrew Gregg [Pa.]. Other resolutions of the same import were presented by Joseph Clay [Pa.] on February 5, and by Joseph B. Nicholson [Md.] on February 10. The subject came up for consideration on March 5, and was debated until March 17, when Mr. Nicholson's resolution was adopted by a vote of 87 to 35.

These measures were evidently inspired by the President and his Secretary of State, James Madison, with both of whom commercial retaliation was a favorite policy.¹

The chief opponent of the measure was John Randolph [Va.] the free lance, who on this question allied himself with the Federalists.

A very interesting report of the debates and proceedings of Congress in reference to the above matters is found in Timothy Pitkin's "Political History of the United States," Volume II, pages 406 to 412.

THE FOLLY OF RETALIATION

JOHN RANDOLPH

I am perfectly aware that on entering upon this subject we go into it manacled, handcuffed, and tongue-tied; gentlemen know that our lips are sealed on subjects of momentous foreign relations, which are indissolubly linked with the present question and which would serve to throw a great light on it in every respect relevant to it. I will, however, endeavor to hobble over the subject as well as my fettered limbs and palsied tongue will enable me to do it.

I am not surprised to hear this resolution discussed by its friends as a war measure. They say (it is true) that it is not a war measure; but they defend it on principles which would justify none but war measures, and seem pleased with the idea that it may prove the forerunner of war. If war is necessary—if we have reached this point—let us have war. But while I have life I will never consent to these incipient war measures, which, in their commencement, breathe nothing but peace, though they plunge at last into war. It has been well observed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania behind me [Mr. J. Clay] that the situation of this nation in 1793 was in every respect different from that in which it finds itself in 1806. Let me ask, too, if the situation of England is not since materially changed? Gentlemen who, it would appear from their language, have not got beyond the horn-book of politics, talk of our ability to cope with the British navy, and tell us of the war of our Revolution. What was the situation of Great Britain then? She was then contending for the empire of the British channel, barely able to maintain a doubtful equality with her enemies, over whom she never gained the superiority until Rodney's victory of the twelfth of April.¹ What is her present situation? The combined fleets of France, Spain, and Holland are dissipated, they no longer exist. I am not surprised to hear men advocate these wild opinions, to see them goaded on by a spirit of mercantile avarice, straining their feeble strength to excite the nation to war, when they have reached this stage of infatuation, that we are an overmatch for Great Britain on the ocean. It is mere waste of time to reason with such persons. They do not deserve anything like serious refutation. The proper arguments for such statesmen are a straight waistcoat, a dark room, water gruel, and depletion.

¹Vice-Admiral George Brydges Rodney defeated the French Admiral DeGrasse in the West Indies, April 12, 1782.

tie, deep and wide as it is, will prove just as good a barrier against his ambition, if directed against you, as the Mediterranean to the power of the Caesars. Do I mean (when I say so) to crouch to the invader? No! I will meet him at the water's edge, and fight every inch of ground from thence to the mountains—from the mountains to the Mississippi.

But, sir, I have yet a more cogent reason against going to war, for the honor of the flag in the narrow seas, or any other maritime punctilio. It springs from my attachment to the Government under which I live. I declare, in the face of day, that this Government was not instituted for the purposes of offensive war. No! It was framed (to use its own language) "for the common defence and the general welfare," which are inconsistent with offensive war. I call that offensive war which goes out of our jurisdiction and limits for the attainment or protection of objects not within those limits and that jurisdiction. As in 1798 I was opposed to this species of warfare, because I believed it would raze the Constitution to its very foundation—so, in 1806, I am opposed to it, and on the same grounds. No sooner do you put the Constitution to this use—to a test which it is by no means calculated to endure—than its incompetency becomes manifest, apparent to all. I fear if you go into a foreign war, for a circuitous, unfair carrying trade, you will come out without your Constitution. Have not you contractors enough yet in this House? Or do you want to be overrun and devoured by commissaries, and all the vermin of contract? I fear, sir, that what are called "the energy men" will rise up again—men who will burn the parchment. We shall be told that our Government is too free; or, as they would say, weak and inefficient. Much virtue, sir, in terms! That we must give the President power to call forth the resources of the nation. That is, to filch the last shilling from our pockets—to drain the last drop of blood from our veins. I am against giving this power to any man, be he who he may. The American people must either withhold this power or resign their liberties. There is no other alternative. Nothing but the most impetuous necessity will justify such a grant. And is there a powerful enemy at our doors? You may begin with a First Consul. From that chrysalis state he soon becomes an emperor. You have your choice. It depends upon your election whether you will be a free, happy, and united people at home, or the light of your Executive Majesty shall beam across the Atlantic in one general blaze of the public liberty.

Much more am I indisposed to war, when, among the first

What is the question in dispute? The carrying trade. What part of it? The fair, the honest, and the useful trade that is engaged in carrying our own productions to foreign markets, and bringing back their productions in exchange? No, sir. It is that carrying trade which covers enemy's property, and carries the coffee, the sugar, and other West India products, to the mother country. No, sir, if this great agricultural nation is to be governed by Salem and Boston, New York and Philadelphia, and Baltimore and Norfolk and Charleston, let gentlemen come out and say so; and let a committee of public safety be appointed from those towns to carry on the Government. I, for one, will not mortgage my property and my liberty to carry on this trade. The nation said so seven years ago—I said so then, and I say so now. It is not for the honest carrying trade of America, but for this mushroom, this fungus of war—for a trade which, as soon as the nations of Europe are at peace, will no longer exist—it is for this that the spirit of avaricious traffic would plunge us into war.

I am forcibly struck on this occasion by the recollection of a remark made by one of the ablest (if not the honestest) ministers that England ever produced. I mean Sir Robert Walpole, who said that the country gentlemen (poor meek souls!) came up every year to be sheared—that they lay mute and patient whilst their fleeces were taking off—but that if he touched a single bristle of the commercial interest the whole sty was in an uproar. It was indeed shearing the hog—"great cry and little wool."

I am averse to a naval war with any nation whatever. I was opposed to the naval war of the last administration, and I am as ready to oppose a naval war of the present administration, should they meditate such a measure. What! shall this great mammoth of the American forest leave his native element and plunge into the water in a mad contest with the shark? Let him beware that his proboscis is not bitten off in the engagement. Let him stay on shore, and not be excited by the mussels and periwinkles on the strand, or political bears in a boat, to venture on the perils of the deep. Gentlemen say, will you not protect your violated rights? and I say, why take to water, where you can neither fight nor swim? Look at France—see her vessels stealing from port to port on her own coast—and remember that she is the first military power of the earth, and as a naval people second only to England.

Let the battle of Actium be once fought and the whole line of sea coast will be at the mercy of the conqueror. The Atlanmeans for carrying it on, I see gentlemen propose the confiscation of debts due by Government to individuals. Does a bona fide creditor know who holds his paper? Dare any honest man ask himself the question? 'Tis hard to say whether such principles are more detestably dishonest than they are weak and foolish. What, sir, will you go about with proposals for opening a loan in one hand and a sponge for the national debt in the other? If, on a late occasion, you could not borrow at a less rate of interest than eight per cent., when the Government avowed that they would pay to the last shilling of the public ability, at what price do you expect to raise money with an avowal of these nefarious opinions? God help you if these are your ways and means for carrying on war; if your finances are in the hands of such a chancellor of the exchequer. What are you going to war for? For the carrying trade? Already you possess seven-eighths of it. What is the object in dispute? The fair, honest trade that exchanges the product of our soil for foreign articles for home consumption? Not at all. You are called upon to sacrifice this necessary branch of your navigation, and the great agricultural interest—whose handmaid it is—to jeopardize your best interests for a circuitous commerce, for the fraudulent protection of belligerent property under your neutral flag. Will you be goaded by the dreaming calculations of insatiate avarice to stake your all for the protection of this trade? I do not speak of the probable effects of war on the price of our produce. Severely as we must feel, we may suffice through it. I speak of its reaction on the Constitution. You may go to war for this excrescence of the carrying trade, and make peace at the expense of the Constitution. Your executive will lord it over you, and you must make the best terms with the conqueror that you can. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Gregg) tells you that he is for acting in this, as in all things, uninfluenced by the opinion of any minister whatever—foreign or, I presume, domestic. On this point I am willing to meet the gentleman—am unwilling to be dictated to by any minister, at home or abroad. Is he willing to act on the same independent footing? I have before protested, and I again protest, against secret, irresponsible, overruling influence. The first question I asked when I saw the gentleman's resolution was, "Is this a measure of the cabinet?" Not of an open declared cabinet; but of an invisible, insurmountable, unconstitutional cabinet, without responsibility, unknown to the Constitution. I speak of back-stairs' influence—of men who bring messages to this House, which, although they do not appear on the journals, govern its decisions. Sir, the first question that I asked on the subject of British relations was, What is the opinion of the cabinet? What measures will they recommend to Congress?—(well knowing that whatever measures we might take they must execute them, and therefore that we should have their opinion on the subject). My answer was (and from a cabinet minister, too), “There is no longer any cabinet.”

At the commencement of this session we received a printed message from the President of the United States, breathing a great deal of national honor and indignation at the outrages we had endured, particularly from Spain. Some of the State legislatures sent forward resolutions pledging their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor in support of any measures you might take in vindication of your injured rights. Well, sir, what have you done? You have had resolutions laid upon your table, gone to some expense of printing and stationery—mere pen, ink, and paper, that’s all. Like true political quacks you deal only in handbills and nostrums. Sir, I blush to see the record of our proceedings; they resemble nothing but the advertisements of patent medicines. Here you have “the worm-destroying lozenges,” there “Church’s cough drops”; and, to crown the whole, “Sloan’s vegetable specific,” an infallible remedy for all nervous disorders and vertiges of brain-sick politicians; each man earnestly adjuring you to give his medicine only a fair trial. If, indeed, these wonder-working nostrums could perform but one half of what they promise there is little danger of our dying a political death, at this time at least. But, sir, in politics as in physics, the doctor is oftentimes the most dangerous disease; and this I take to be our case at present.

But, sir, why do I talk of Spain? “There are no longer Pyrenees!” There exists no such nation, no such being as a Spanish King or minister. It is a mere juggle, played off for the benefit of those who put the mechanism into motion. You know, sir, that you have no differences with Spain; that she is the passive tool of a superior power, to whom, at this moment, you are crouching. Are your differences, indeed, with Spain? And where are you going to send your political panacea, resolutions and handbills excepted, your sole arcanum of government, your king cure all? To Madrid? No—to Paris. You know, at least, where the disease lies, and there you apply your remedy. When the nation anxiously demands the result of your deliberations you hang your head and blush to tell. You are afraid to tell. Your mouth is hermetically sealed. Your honor has received a wound which must not take air. After shrinking from the Spanish jackal, do you presume to bully the British lion? But here the secret comes out. Britain is your rival in trade, and, governed as you are by counting-house politicians, you would sacrifice the paramount interests of your country to wound that rival. For Spain and France you are carriers, and from good customers every indignity is to be endured. Yes, sir, and when a question of great national magnitude presents itself to you, it causes those who now prate about national honor and spirit to pocket any insult; to consider it as a mere matter of debit and credit; a business of profit and loss, and nothing else.

I ask any man who now advocates a rupture with England to assign a single reason for his opinion that would not have justified a French war in 1798? If injury and insult abroad would have justified it we had them in abundance then. But what did the Republicans say at that day? That, under the cover of a war with France, the executive would be armed with a patronage and power which might enable it to master our liberties. They deprecated foreign war and navies, and standing armies, and loans, and taxes. The delirium passed away—the good sense of the people triumphed, and our differences were accommodated without a war. And what is there in the situation of England that invites to war with her? It is true she does not deal so largely in perfectibility, but she supplies you with a much more useful commodity—with coarse woolsens. With less profession, indeed, she occupies the place of France in 1793. She is the sole bulwark of the human race against universal dominion; no thanks to her for it. In protecting her own existence she insures theirs. I care not who stands in this situation, whether England or Bonaparte. I practice the doctrines now that I professed in 1798. I voted against all such projects under the administration of John Adams, and I will continue to do so under that of Thomas Jefferson. Are you not contented with being free and happy at home? Or will you surrender these blessings that your merchants may tread on Turkish and Persian carpets, and burn the perfumes of the East in their vaulted rooms? Gentlemen say it is but an annual million lost, and even if it were five times that amount, what is it compared with your neutral rights? Sir, let me tell them a hundred millions will be but a drop in the bucket if once they launch without rudder or compass into this ocean of foreign warfare. Whom do they want to attack? England. They hope it is a popular thing, and talk about Bunker Hill, and the gallant feats of our Revolution. But is Bunker Hill to be the theater of war? No, sir, you have selected the ocean, and the object of attack is that very navy which prevented the combined fleets of France and Spain from levying contribution upon you in your own seas; that very navy which, in the famous war of 1798, stood between you and danger. *Quem Deus vult perdere prius dementat.*¹ Are you mad enough to take up the cudgels that have been struck from the nerveless hands of the three great maritime powers of Europe? Shall the planter mortgage his little crop, and jeopardize the Constitution in support of commercial monopoly, in the vain hope of satisfying the insatiable greediness of trade? Administer the Constitution upon its own principles; for the general welfare, and not for the benefit of any particular class of men.

A great deal is said about the laws of nations. What is national law but national power guided by national interest? You yourselves acknowledge and practice upon this principle where you can, or where you dare—with the Indian tribes for instance. I might give another and more forcible illustration. Will the learned lumber of your libraries add a ship to your fleet, or a shilling to your revenue? Will it pay or maintain a single soldier? And will you preach and prate of violations of your neutral rights, when you tamely and meanly submit to the violation of your territory [i. e., by Spain]. Will you collar the stealer of your sheep, and let him escape that has invaded the repose of your fireside—has insulted your wife and children under your own roof? This is the heroism of truck and traffic—the public spirit of sordid avarice. Great Britain violates your flag on the high seas. What is her situation? Contending, not for the dismantling of Dunkirk, for Quebec, or Pondicherry, but for London and Westminster—for life; her enemy violating at will the territories of other nations, acquiring thereby a colossal power that threatens the very existence of her rival. But she has one vulnerable point to the arms of her adversary, which she covers with the ensigns of neutrality; she draws the neutral flag over the heel of Achilles. And can you ask that adversary to respect it at the expense of her existence? and in favor of whom? An enemy that respects no neutral territory of Europe, and not even your own. I repeat that the insults of Spain toward this nation have been at the instigation of France; that there is no longer any Spain. Well, sir, because the French Government does not put this in the Moniteur you choose to shut your eyes to it. None so blind as those who will not see. You shut your own eyes, and to blind those of other people you go into conclave, and slink out again and say,

“a great affair of State!”—C’est une grande affaire d’Etat! It seems that your sensibility is entirely confined to the extremities. You may be pulled by the nose and ears, and never feel it, but let your strong box be attacked and you are all nerve—“Let us go to war!” Sir, if they called upon me only for my little *peculium*² to carry it on, perhaps I might give it; but my rights and liberties are involved in the grant, and I will never surrender them while I have life. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Crowninshield) is for sponging the debt. I can never consent to it; I will never bring the ways and means of fraudulent bankruptcy into your committee of supply. Confiscation and swindling shall never be found among my estimates to meet the current expenditure of peace or war. No, sir, I have said with the doors closed, and I say so when the doors are open, “pay the public debt”; get rid of that dead weight upon your Government—that cramp upon all your measures—and then you may put the world at defiance. So long as it hangs upon you you must have revenue, and to have revenue you must have commerce—commerce, peace. And shall these nefarious schemes be advised for lightening the public burdens; will you resort to these low and pitiful shifts; dare even to mention these dishonest artifices to eke out your expenses, when the public treasure is lavished on Turks and infidels, on singing boys and dancing girls, to furnish the means of bestiality to an African barbarian?

Gentlemen say that Great Britain will count upon our divisions. How? What does she know of them? Can they ever expect greater unanimity than prevailed at the last presidential election? No, sir, it is the gentleman’s own conscience that squeaks. But if she cannot calculate upon your divisions, at least she may reckon upon your pusillanimity. She may well despise the resentment that cannot be excited to honorable battle on its own ground; the mere effusion of mercantile cupidities. Gentlemen talk of repealing the British treaty. And what is all this for? A point which Great Britain will not abandon to Russia, you expect her to yield to you—Russia! indisputably the second power of continental Europe; with not less than half a million of hardy troops; with sixty sail-of-the-line, thirty millions of subjects, and a territory more extensive even than our own—Russia, sir, the storehouse of the British navy, whom it is not more the policy and the interest than the sentiment of that government to soothe and to conciliate—her sole hope of a diversion on the continent, and her only efficient ally. What this formidable power cannot obtain with fleets and armies you will command by writ—with pothooks and hangers. I am for no such policy. True honor is always the same. Before you enter into a contest, public or private, be sure you have fortitude enough to go through with it. If you mean war, say so, and prepare for it: Look on the other side; behold the respect in which France holds neutral rights on land. And if you make the French Emperor monarch of the ocean you may bid adieu to it forever. You may take your leave, sir, of navigation—even of the Mississippi. What is the situation of New Orleans if attacked to-morrow? Filled with a discontented and repining people, whose language, manners, and religion all incline them to the invader—a dissatisfied people, who despise the miserable governor you have set over them—whose honest prejudices and basest passions alike take part against you. You have official information that the town and its dependencies are utterly defenceless and untenable. You have held that post, you now hold it, by the tenure of the naval predominance of England, and yet you are for a British naval war.

There are now but two great commercial nations—Great Britain is one, and the United States the other. When you consider the many points of contact between our interests you may be surprised that there has been so little collision. Sir, to the other belligerent nations of Europe your navigation is a convenience, I might say, a necessary. If you do not carry for them they must starve, at least for the luxuries of life, which custom has rendered almost indispensable; and if you cannot act with some degree of spirit toward those who are dependent upon you as carriers, do you reckon to browbeat a jealous rival, who, the moment she lets slip the dogs of war, sweeps you at a blow from the ocean? And cui bono? for whose benefit? The planter? Nothing like it. The fair, honest, real American merchant? No, sir, for renegades; to-day American, to-morrow Danes. Go to war when you will, the property, now covered by the American, will then pass under the Danish, or some other neutral flag. Gentlemen say that one English ship is worth three of ours; we shall therefore have the advantage in privateering. Did they ever know a nation to get rich by privateering? This is stuff, sir, for the nursery. Remember that your products are bulky, as has been stated; that they require a vast tonnage to transport them abroad, and that but two nations possess that tonnage. Take these carriers out of the market. What is the result? The manufactures of England, which (to use a finishing touch of the gentlemen's rhetoric) have received the finishing stroke of art, lie in a small comparative compass. The neutral trade can carry them. Your produce rots in the warehouse. You go to Eustatia or St. Thomas, and get a striped blanket for a joe;^a if you can raise one. Double freight, charges, and commission. Who receives the profit? The carrier. Who pays it? The consumer. All your produce that finds its way to England must bear the same accumulated charges—with this difference, that there the burden falls on the home price. I appeal to the experience of the late war, which has been so often cited. What then was the price of produce, and of broad-cloth?

But you are told England will not make war; that she has her hands full. Holland calculated in the same way in 1781. How did it turn out? You stand now in the place of Holland, then without her navy, and unaided by the preponderating fleets of France and Spain, to say nothing of the Baltic powers. Do you want to take up the cudgels where these great maritime states have been forced to drop them? to meet Great Britain on the ocean, and drive her off its face? If you are so far gone as this, every capital measure of your policy has hitherto been wrong. You should have nurtured the old, and devised new, systems of taxation, and have cherished your navy. Begin this business when you may, land-taxes, stamp-acts, window-taxes, hearth-money, excise, in all its modifications of vexation and oppression, must precede or follow after. But, sir, as French is the fashion of the day, I may be asked for my projet. I can readily tell gentlemen what I will not do. I will not propitiate any foreign nation with money. I will not launch into a naval war with Great Britain, although I am ready to meet her at the Cowpens or on Bunker's Hill—and for this plain reason we are a great land animal, and our business is on shore. I go further: I would (if anything) have laid an embargo. This would have got our own property home, and our adversary's into our power. If there is any wisdom left among us the first step toward hostility will always be an embargo. In six months all your mercantile megrims would vanish. As to us, although it would cut deep, we can stand it. Without such a precaution, go to war when you will, you go to the wall. As to debts, strike the balance to-morrow, and England is, I believe, in our debt.

I ask your attention to the character of the inhabitants of that Southern country, on whom gentlemen rely for support of their measure. Who and what are they? A simple, agricultural people, accustomed to travel in peace to market with the produce of their labor. Who takes it from us? Another people, devoted to manufactures—our sole source of supply. I have seen some stuff in the newspapers about manufactures in Saxony. But what became of their Dresden china? Why the Prussian bayonets have broken all the pots, and you are content with Worcestershire or Staffordshire ware. There are some other fine manufactures on the continent, but no supply, except perhaps of linens, the article we can best dispense with. A few individuals, sir, may have a coat of Louvier's cloth, or a service of Sèvres china; but there is too little, and that little too dear, to furnish the nation. You must depend on the fur trade in earnest, and wear buffalo hides and bear skins.

But, sir, it seems that we, who are opposed to this resolution, are men of no nerve, who trembled in the days of the British treaty—cowards (I presume) in the reign of terror? Is this true? Hunt up the journals; and let our actions tell. We pursue our old unshaken course. We care not for the nations of Europe, but make foreign relations bend to our political principles and subserve our country's interest. We have no wish to see another Actium, or Pharsalia, or the lieutenants of a modern Alexander playing at piquet, or all-fours, for the empire of the world. It is poor comfort to us to be told that France has too decided a taste for luxurious things to meddle with us; that Egypt is her object, or the coast of Barbary, and, at the worst, we shall be the last devoured. We are enamored with neither nation; we would play their own game upon them, use them for our interest and convenience. But with all my abhorrence of the British Government I should not hesitate between Westminster Hall and a Middlesex jury, on the one hand, and the wood of Vincennes and a file of grenadiers, on the other. That jury-trial, which walked with Horne Tooke and Hardy through the flames of ministerial persecution, is, I confess, more to my taste than the trial of the Duke d'Enghien.

I offer as apology for these undigested, desultory remarks my never having seen the treasury documents. Until I came into the House this morning I had been stretched on a sick bed. But when I behold the affairs of this nation, instead of being where I hoped, and the people believed, they were, in the hands of responsible men, committed to Tom, Dick, and Harry, to the refuse of the retail trade of politics, I do feel, I cannot help feeling, the most deep and serious concern. If the executive Government would step forward and say, "such is our plan, such is our opinion, and such are our reasons in support of it," I would meet it fairly, would openly oppose, or pledge myself to support it. But, without compass or polar star, I will not launch into an ocean of unexplored measures, which stand condemned by all the information to which I have access. The Constitution of the United States declares it to be the province and the duty of the President "to give to Congress, from time to time, information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge expedient and necessary." Has he done it? I know, sir, that we may say, and do say, that we are independent (would it were true); as free to give a direction to the executive as to receive it from him. But do what you will, foreign relations, every measure short of war, and even the course of hostilities, depend upon him. He stands at the helm, and must guide the vessel of state. You give him money to buy Florida, and he purchases Louisiana. You may furnish means; the application of those means rests with him. Let not the master and mate go below when the ship is in distress, and throw the responsibility upon the cook and the cabin-boy. I blush with indignation at the misrepresentations which have gone forth in the public prints of our proceedings, public and private. Are the people of the United States the real sovereigns of the country, unworthy of knowing what, there is too much reason to believe, has been communicated to the privileged spies of foreign governments? Let the nation know what they have to depend upon. Be true to them, and (trust me) they will prove true to themselves and to you. The people are honest—now at home at their ploughs, not dreaming of what you are about. But the spirit of inquiry, that has too long slept, will be, must be, awakened. Let them begin to think why things have been done—not to accept them as proper because they have been done—and all will be right.

Upon the passage of the Non-Importation Act, William Pinkney was appointed a special envoy to assist James Monroe, minister to Great Britain, in securing a new treaty. On December 19, 1806, the President caused the Non-Importation Act to be suspended, having arrived at the conclusion that he might thus hasten the negotiations. If this had any effect, however, it was purely psychic, since a treaty was agreed to by the representatives of the two countries on December 31, before news reached England of the suspension of the act.

This convention recognized the American contention that indirect trade should be permitted between a belligerent and its colonies by a landing made by the carrier in a neutral country, and that provisions should be taken from the contraband list. Monroe and Pinkney were compelled to yield the right of search and impressment, on the understanding, however, that it would be exercised only under extraordinary circumstances.

Owing to this concession the President declined to submit the treaty to the Senate for confirmation, and ordered the American envoys to continue their negotiations.

THE ORDERS IN COUNCIL

In the meantime events had occurred in the war between Great Britain and France which greatly aggravated the American grievances.

Great Britain had issued, on January 7, 1807, an "Order in Council," by which all neutral vessels were prohibited from trading between the ports of France and her allies. Then, when she further declared a blockade of all ports from which her flag was excluded, Napoleon retorted with his "Milan Decrees" of December 7, 1807, and January 11, 1808, which proclaimed that any vessel which was in any way connected with British trade, or which should submit to search by a British commander, became thereby "denationalized" and was a good prize for the vessels of France or of the countries which were her allies.

But even more than the injury to their commerce did the American people resent an outrage against the persons of their citizens and against their flag, which was committed on June 22, 1807, by the British frigate Leopard in taking four sailors by force from the American frigate Chesapeake.

Prompted by his own sentiments as well as by the voice of the people, the President assembled Congress in October, 1807, in advance of its regular time of assembly, and laid before them the actions of the British which demanded redress.

As he stated in his message, he had, without waiting for Congress, taken instant action for redress.

persons whom they had forcibly taken from on board the Chesapeake.

To former violations of maritime rights another is now added of very extensive effect. The government of that nation has issued an order interdicting all trade by neutrals between ports not in amity with them. And being now at war with nearly every nation on the Atlantic and Mediterranean seas, our vessels are required to sacrifice their cargoes at the first port they touch, or to return home without the benefit of going to any other market. Under this new law of the ocean our trade on the Mediterranean has been swept away by seizures and condemnations, and that in other seas is threatened with the same fate.

On December 18, 1807, the President, having in the meantime learned of the second "Order in Council" of the British Government, sent the following special message to Congress:

The communications now made, showing the great and increasing dangers with which our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise are threatened on the high seas and elsewhere, from the belligerent powers of Europe, and it being of the greatest importance to keep in safety these essential resources, I deem it my duty to recommend the subject to the consideration of Congress, who will doubtless perceive all the advantages which may be expected from an inhibition of the departure of our vessels from the ports of the United States.

Agreeably to the recommendation of the President, on December 21, Congress, in a secret session which lasted until midnight, passed an embargo act temporarily prohibiting all commerce between the United States and foreign ports.

For a time after the passage of the act the patriotism of the nation was staunch enough to approve it, in the hope that the loss of the American trade would bring Great Britain and France to terms with this country. Many State legislatures passed approving resolutions, and the suffering shipowners and merchants for a while bore their losses in grim silence. In three or four months, however, opposition to the act began to assert itself both in and out of Congress.

Nor could the opponents be accused of lack of patri-

MESSAGE TO CONGRESS

PRESIDENT JEFFERSON, OCTOBER 27, 1807

Circumstances, fellow-citizens, which seriously threatened the peace of our country, have made it a duty to convene you at an earlier period than usual. The love of peace, so much cherished in the bosoms of our citizens, which has so long guided the proceedings of their public councils, and induced forbearance under so many wrongs, may not insure our continuance in the quiet pursuits of industry. The many injuries and depredations committed on our commerce and navigation upon the high seas for years past, the successive innovations on those principles of public law which have been established by the reason and usage of nations as the rule of their intercourse, and the umpire and security of their rights and peace, and all the circumstances which induced the extraordinary mission to London, are already known to you.

The President here commented upon the several concessions which the embassy had been authorized to grant and the others which the treaty called for, which his own sense of honor and ideas of justice could not allow him to consider. He spoke of the consequent fruitlessness of the mission, and continued:

On the 22d day of June last, by a formal order from a British admiral, the frigate Chesapeake, leaving her port for a distant service, was attacked by one of those vessels which had been lying in our harbors under the indulgences of hospitality, was disabled from proceeding, had several of her crew killed, and four taken away. On this outrage no commentaries are necessary. Its character has been pronounced by the indignant voice of our citizens with an emphasis and unanimity never exceeded. I immediately, by proclamation, interdicted our harbors and waters to all British armed vessels. An armed vessel of the United States was dispatched with instructions to our ministers at London to call on that government for the satisfaction and security required by the outrage.

The aggression thus begun has been continued on the part of the British commanders, by remaining within our waters in defiance of the authority of the country, by habitual violations of its jurisdiction, and, at length, by putting to death one of the otism in view of the fact that no indication had yet appeared that the purpose of the embargo would be accomplished. Indeed, Great Britain professed to be pleased with its effects, chief of which was the surrender of the carrying trade to her own marine and the upbuilding of her American colonies. Napoleon, too, praised it highly, and in characteristic fashion enforced his professions by another proclamation, the "Bayonne Decree" of April 17, 1808, which righteously supported the embargo by ordering the seizure and sale of all American vessels which should enter the ports of France or its allies in violation of the act.

The first strong attack in Congress upon the embargo came from a representative of the President's own State. John Randolph, who had advocated an embargo in substitution for the Non-Importation Act, now permitted his hostility to the Administration to get the better of his consistency and, on April 7, 1808, in opposing a bill to increase the army in view of the prospect of a war with Great Britain, included the embargo among the objects of his reprobation. As for some reason, probably the great number and length as well as incoherence of his speeches, all of his remarks were not reported in the succeeding debate, his attack on the embargo in the army debate is presented in connection with the embargo debate.

On April 8, George W. Campbell, of Tennessee, in the interest of the Administration moved that the President have the right to suspend the act in view of certain contingencies (i. e., the settlement of difficulties with Great Britain and France) which might arise during the coming recess of Congress.

During the debates the speakers who chose the opportunity to denounce the embargo as wrong in principle and ineffective in practice were John Randolph [Va.], Josiah Masters [N. Y.], and Philip B. Key [Md.]; and those who defended it were Richard M. Johnson [Ky.], John Love [Va.], James Fick [Vt.], and Mr. Campbell.

The bill giving the President the desired power was passed on April 19, 1808, by a vote of 54 to 33.

SUSPENSION OF THE EMBARGO

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 8-19 1808

Mr. RANDOLPH.—The non-importation law might be called the edge of the wedge, the embargo the center, and the standing army the butt [of the President's policy for the aggrandizement of his power], and it is all about to be driven to the hilt.

We quarreled about impressed American seamen, and commenced a system which produced consequences the remedy for which is an embargo; and we give up all our seamen, for they are not to be embargoed; they will slip out. Great Britain has now not only all her own seamen, but a great many of ours. I am not surprised to learn that in England the embargo is a most popular measure; that they are glad to see the patriotism with which we bear it, and hope it will not fail us.

The British West Indies, so long verging to ruin, are at last relieved. Year after year they have petitioned Parliament, complaining that they are undersold by the enemies' colonies, whose produce is carried in neutral bottoms (chiefly American) free of war risks and charges. We have done more for them than their own government could do. We have given them the monopoly of the supply of Europe; and to the mother country the monopoly of the carrying trade also.

I therefore am not one of those who approve the embargo; and so far permit me to differ with my friend from South Carolina (Mr. D. R. Williams) in considering the embargo a half-way measure. Not so. It is up to the hilt; commerce and agriculture are lingering and must die under its operation. A half-way measure indeed! It gives up to Great Britain all the seamen and all the commerce; their feet are not now upon your decks, for your vessels are all riding safely moored along your slips and wharves; and this measure absolutely gives agriculture a blow which she cannot recover till the embargo is removed.

Mr. Randolph then entered into a constitutional argument against the measure, making a distinction between a permanent and a temporary embargo, and saying that because it affected exportation the measure was in the same category as export duties, which were prohibited by the Constitution.

Mr. Johnson answered the first of these arguments.

If we have power to lay an embargo for one day, have we not the power to renew it at the end of that day? If for sixty days, have we not the power to lay it again? Would it not amount to the same thing? If we pass a law to expire within a limited term, we may renew it at the end of that term; and there is no difference between a power to do this and a power to pass laws without specified limit.

Mr. Randolph said he would just remind his friend from Kentucky that he had never conceded the right of Congress to lay even a temporary embargo.

Mr. Johnson resumed:

The gentleman has told us that the embargo is well received in Great Britain. Do we not know the warm discussions which have taken place in the British Parliament? Have we not seen the petitions of the people of England, and from our minister himself do we not know that if we are plunged into a war the whole world will say that the cause of America is just? If we are upon wrong ground let us retract; if not, let us have bare justice, and I for one will be satisfied.

Mr. Love answered the second of Mr. Randolph's constitutional arguments:

But to lay an embargo is unconstitutional, because Congress cannot lay an export duty! And it is argued by the same gentleman that the lesser power being thus provided against the exercise of the greater must of course be included in the prohibition; the minor forming an objection, the major is, a fortiori, inadmissible. How easily, sir, is this argument of inference retorted on the gentleman; for, according to a familiar and certainly plain course of reasoning, it would seem that, if the subjects are the same as is said, when the framers of our Constitution made an exception of the lesser power, if they had intended also to except the greater, they would not have forgotten it.

The reasons which influenced the framers of that instrument to provide against the power of laying an export duty were obvious; the provision was adopted in that spirit of mutual accommodation which was so necessary to the harmony of the whole. It would be difficult, it was easily foreseen, to devise an export duty which would not bear harder on some of the States than others; it was better therefore not to resort at all to a mode of taxation which would afford so fruitless a source of contention. The policy, too, of taxing exports was perhaps radically inadmissible; yet I cannot, for my life, discern how an export duty has been drawn into analogy with an embargo.

That the embargo was a curse, sir, and continues to be a most calamitous one to us all, I have heard no one deny; but until now I have not heard the assertion advanced that our Government, by its conduct, was the author of that cause. Yes, sir, many evils which the injustice of other nations has inflicted on the peace and honor of the United States are acknowledged to be curses of the most irritating and affecting nature; but the gentleman has said more for England and France than either of them have before said for themselves, when he attributes to his own government the misconduct which has produced those evils. It was scarcely to be expected that any state of internal division or any views of whatever description would have produced on this floor an assertion which has thus put a new argument in the hands of our enemies in justification of their aggressions on us; it is more than our enemies have asserted. We have heard indeed from France and England that their decrees and orders, which make the present voluntary retirement from the seas necessary on our part, were the effect of an unjustifiable attack, which each has attributed in the first instance to the other. Each criminalizes the other, and not America, with being the author of the peculiar mode of warfare which has proved so destructive to the rights of neutrals. The very language of their orders and decrees assumes this position, and they are all prefaced with the declaration that their orders are enacted in the spirit of retaliation on each other, and not, sir, for any offence which our Government has been the author of, as the gentleman now tells the American people; for what purpose let the nation judge.

Remove the embargo and we must arm our vessels, and war is at once declared. Compare the evils, both of great extent. I admit, by the embargo, we lose half the value of the products of our country, or the receipt of it is suspended; by war, to admit the effect in this particular, no worse, at least it could be no better; but have we counted the costs of the armies we are to raise, and to pay, of the supplies we are to furnish, of the loss of our blood, and the diminution of our strength, of the reduction of the profits of agriculture itself, by calling men from their domestic occupations, and lessening the number of hands for tillage—have we calculated the thousand other evils which follow in the train of war? To plunge into war, sir, to escape the curse of the embargo, would be truly fulfilling the adage of old—"out of the frying-pan into the fire."

Mr. Masters censured President Jefferson for his refusal to ratify the treaty with Great Britain which had been signed by James Monroe and William Pinkney. He said:

Mr. Chairman, I shall not undertake to say that the rejected treaty is so advantageous as we had a right to expect. But I do not hesitate to declare that, or even Jay's treaty, is preferable to the present state of our affairs. Can we expect that nation, whose navy commands the seas, will sacrifice that navy, or any part of her power, by conceding the point of search for her seamen on board of neutral vessels? It is inconsistent with their interest, and it is inconsistent with their superiority. My wish is to raise the embargo and arm our vessels. The nation cannot bear the pressure. The embargo virtually inhibits all intercourse with foreign nations; the effects are and will be pernicious to the agricultural productions of this country, and produce will fall to the lowest ebb, and enforce the most unparalleled distress on the community. Commerce ought always to be left to the merchant, unshackled and unembarrassed, as much as possible. Our commercial intercourse is the principal resource, both of revenue and commercial opulence. The embargo will tear up by the roots and annihilate the commerce of this country. And the effects will be heavy taxes, an exhausted treasury, a diminished and ruined revenue. It weakens your own power, fetters your operations, and deludes your citizens; it devours not only the fruits but the seeds of industry. It will sink down and depress the nation to an absence of hope and a want of resources; it will be felt by the nation as a calamity, without deciding the general question of dispute. Prove to me the embargo is consistent with common sense, and will be the means of adjusting our differences with the belligerent powers, and I will then be an advocate for it. It may be good in theory, but it is chimerical in practice, a mere speculative proposition. Search all the histories of the world and you will not find eleven hundred thousand tons of shipping, of one of the greatest commercial nations, embargoed for an unlimited time.

If you entertain a sense of the many blessings which you have enjoyed; if you value a continuance of that commerce which is the source of so much opulence; if you wish to preserve that high state of prosperity by which the country has, for some years past, been so eminently blessed, you lose all these advantages by continuing the embargo and neglecting to arm your vessels. Restore, then, confidence and vigor to commerce. You are at war with your own interest and every idea of policy; instead of protecting commerce you destroy it.

In whatever view the embargo presents itself it appears to me to be fraught with impolicy; it was laid at midnight; that miserable scene was closed under the darkness which suits with it, and under the secret shelter of our own walls. If we are to go to war, you have, instead of warlike preparations and exerting every sinew of national ability, laid an embargo, and obtained just nothing.

The policy of France, as regards Great Britain, is to make a warlike non-intercourse, and we have, by a side-wind, fallen into the measure, adopted and sanctioned it; we have abandoned the great highway of nations: our dispute with Great Britain is about commercial rights; we have given them up.

Is this country at that crisis when we shall surrender all those rights her citizens hold most dear? God forbid! I have contemplated upon the embargo, which is hazardous and impolitic, with great pain and anxiety, and I turn my face from it with horror. If there are any who improperly foster and countenance the threatening storm, and whatever consequences may follow, they are answerable to their country and their God.

All the advocates of the embargo on this floor have admitted that it was oppressive and a curse. Take away this curse and arm your vessels. It does not follow, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Love] supposes, that arming will involve us in a war. When Great Britain finds we resist the French decrees she will revoke her orders of council. When France sees she cannot bring us into her views she will revoke her decrees.

Mr. FISK.—The gentleman last up and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Randolph] yesterday have expressed sentiments which, if they once take root in this nation, will prostrate your liberties and rights at the feet of foreign governments. The gentleman who just took his seat has observed that the subject of impressment was the main block in the way of negotiation. Very true, it was, sir; it goes to the personal liberty and security of your citizens; and, if you surrender that right, what do you expect those citizens will say to you? Do you expect they will greet you with, "well done thou good and faithful servant!" What can the gentleman think when he recollects the sensation displayed at New York on the death of Pierce, in consequence of the exercise by Britain of the right of impressment? Were those tears and lamentations feigned, or were they the sincere effusions of citizens feeling the injury done them, and burning with indignation at seeing their fellow-citizens murdered almost before their face? If we could believe what the gentleman now suggests we should suppose that the liberties and lives of our citizens were of no value compared with commerce.

I am a little surprised to hear gentlemen telling us that arming our merchant vessels would not produce war. Why arm, if they are not to defend themselves? If the belligerents defend their proceedings, will they not resist our vessels arming against their orders? Could it be done without being met by a declaration of war? But the gentleman from New York has told us that if we suffer our merchants to arm the British would consider it a sufficient token of our resistance to the French decrees, and remove their orders of council. You have seen all the decrees and orders which make innovations on the law of nations and subject our commerce to plunder. Look at the treaty which our Government is on this floor condemned for not signing, with the note annexed, declaring that, if we submit to the decrees of France, His Britannic Majesty would consider himself bound not to observe the treaty.

What do the British ministers offer us? If we will trade as they please, and pay them a duty on all our exports, we may carry on our commerce. Is it possible that any man who professes himself an American could accede to this? The spirit of 1776, refusing to pay a duty of two per cent. on tea, would certainly not now yield that for which they then contended, and become again tributary to the British Government. And yet gentlemen wish us to raise the embargo, to embrace these regulations, open all our ports to this fettered commerce, and will not place it in the power of the Executive to suspend the embargo. I am a little astonished that gentlemen who consider the embargo as the heaviest curse which could befall this nation should be against any measure for removing its pressure. But so it is. Here permit me to say that I admire the flexibility of the sentiments of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Randolph) who, in combating the non-importation law, said that if we take measures at all they should be strong measures; none of your milk-and-water measures, but an embargo; which would be an efficient measure.

Mr. KEY.—Mr. Chairman, let us review this law and its effects. In a commercial point of view it has annihilated our trade. In an agricultural point of view it has paralyzed industry. I have heard that the touch of Midas converted everything into gold; but the embargo law, like the head of Medusa, turns everything into stone. Our most fertile lands are reduced to sterility, so far as it respects our surplus product. As a measure of political economies it will drive (if continued) our seamen into foreign employ, and our fishermen to foreign sand-banks. In a financial point of view it has dried up our revenue, and if continued will close the sales of Western lands, and the payment of instalments of past sales; for unless produce can be sold payments cannot be made. As a war measure the embargo has not been advocated.

It remains, then, to consider its effects as a peace measure—a measure inducing peace. I grant, sir, that if the friends of the embargo had rightly calculated its effects; if it had brought the belligerents of Europe to a sense of justice and respect for our rights, through the weakness and dependence of their West India possessions, it would have been infinitely wise and desirable, and that they voted for it with such noble views I have no doubt. But, sir, the experience of near four months has not produced that effect; and I have endeavored to show from the situation of our country, the manner in which the law is executed, the demand for subsistence, the consequent rise in price, and the facility of supply, that the West Indies (British) will be supplied.

If that be the case, if such should be the result, then will the embargo of all measures be the most acceptable to Britain; by occluding our ports you give to her ships the exclusive use of the ocean; and you give to her despairing West India planter the monopoly of sugar and rum and coffee to the European world. But, sir, what are we? A peaceable agricultural people, of simple and I trust virtuous habits, of stout hearts and willing minds, and a brave, powerful, but badly disciplined militia, unarmed, and without troops; and whom are we to come in conflict with? The master of continental Europe in the full career of universal domination, and the mistress of the ocean contending for self-preservation; nations who feel power and forget right. What man can be weak enough to suppose that a sense of justice can repress or regulate the conduct of Bonaparte? We need not resort to other nations for examples. Has he not, in a manner as flagrant as flagitations, directly, openly, publicly violated and broken a solemn treaty entered into with us? Did he not stipulate that our property should pass free even to enemy ports, and has he not burnt our ships at sea under the most causeless pretenses? Look to England; see her conduct to us; do we want any further evidence of what she will do in the hour of impending peril than the attack on Copenhagen? That she prostrates all rights that come in collision with her self-preservation? Strangely infatuated would she be, to make our repealing the embargo to depend on the acts of governments, which will be annulled whenever their interest or their danger prompt them. No, sir; let us pursue the steady line of rigid impartiality; let us hold the scales of impartial neutrality with a high and steady hand, and export our products to, and bring back supplies from, all who will trade with us. Much of the world is yet open to us, and let us profit of the occasion.

At present we exercise no neutral rights; we have quit the ocean; we have abandoned our rights; we have retired to our shell. Sooner than thus continue our merchantmen should arm to protect legitimate trade. Sir, I believe war itself, as we could carry it on, would produce more benefit and less cost than the millions lost by the continuance of the embargo.

Mr. CAMPBELL.—It is true, sir, we have abandoned our commerce with Great Britain, but not to her; we have retired from the ocean, and in retiring have carried with us almost the whole commerce of the European world. The belligerent powers cannot carry on commerce with each other, and there are no neutrals in Europe with which they can trade—what commerce, then, is abandoned by us to Great Britain? There is scarcely a merchant vessel that sails the ocean—she can hardly find a solitary ship to pursue—we had carried on almost the whole of the neutral trade—we were forced to abandon it—we did so—we retired, and left the great Leviathan of the ocean to roam about without a solitary object upon which to prey. Let gentlemen, then, inform us what commerce Great Britain has acquired by this measure; they can point out none; they cannot designate a single branch of trade of any importance which Great Britain has got by our retiring. But let us notice what the first statesmen in that country say on this subject—and they seem to have furnished the full to what was said on this floor, as has frequently been the case, with only this difference, that they stated the whole case, whereas a part only was stated here. They say that, in consequence of their orders of council, you have abandoned your commerce, as you ought to have done; and yet they inquire what is the commerce thus abandoned? They admit they have all that is left, but they inquire what that is; they cannot ascertain it; they say there is none, and in this they are correct. With regard to the effect of the embargo they state what has been before, in substance, stated on this floor, what was always considered, and so stated, would be the effect of this measure. They say the French West India islands will starve; but, supposing this to be the case, they inquire what will become of their own islands, whose sole dependence for subsistence is on the commerce and productions of America. They say they must also starve; they inquire if a famine must be produced in England, in order to supply their islands with provisions, which they could not even then effect. They pursue the picture, which every one must have seen; they describe the distresses that must be produced in Great Britain itself, as well as in the islands; and ascribe the whole of these misfortunes to the orders of council of their own government. This does not go to prove that the embargo was the very measure which Great Britain wanted; nor does it show that she acquired any real or valuable acquisition of commerce by our retiring from the ocean; it contradicts the assertion that the embargo has failed in its object, and proves, in a very decided manner, that it is in full operation, and in a fair way toward effecting the object for which it was laid; and that its pressure is severely felt by both the great belligerent powers.

MR. RANDOLPH.—The embargo power, which now holds in its palsyng gripe all the hopes of this nation, is distinguished by two characteristics of material import, in deciding what control shall be left over it during our recess. I allude to its greatness and its novelty.

As to its greatness, nothing is like it. Every class of men feels it. This power resembles not the mild influences of an intelligent mind, balancing the interests and conditions of men, and so conducting a complicated machine as to make inevitable pressure bear upon its strongest parts. But it is like one of the blind visitations of nature; a tornado or a whirlwind. It sweeps away the weak; it only strips the strong. The humble plant, uprooted, is overwhelmed by the tempest. The oak escapes with the loss of nothing except its annual honors. It is true the sheriff does not enter any man's house to collect a tax from his property. But want knocks at his door and poverty thrusts his face into the window. And what relief can the rich extend? They sit upon their heaps and feel them mouldering into ruins under them. The regulations of society forbid what was once property to be so any longer. For property depends on circulation; on exchange; on ideal value. The power of property is all relative. It depends not merely upon opinion here, but upon opinion in other countries. If it be cut off from its destined market much of it is worth nothing, and all of it is worth infinitely less than when circulation is unobstructed.

But the magnitude of the embargo power is not more remarkable than its novelty. An experiment such as is now making, der became a safe and profitable and extensive trade. Indeed, some of the State courts decided that the embargo was unconstitutional, since it went beyond the regulation of commerce to its annihilation. The State legislatures, too, following the precedent of the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions, which they had formerly denounced, expressed their condemnation of the embargo, intimating that it was a sectional measure, passed by the agricultural Middle and Southern States at the expense of commercial New England.

At the next session of Congress memorials against the embargo poured in upon that body from various interests injured by the act. It appeared that every industry but domestic manufacture was suffering.

The President in his message reported that the embargo had not yet been effective in securing the revocation of the obnoxious decrees of Great Britain and France, but that it had been the means of "saving our mariners, and our vast mercantile property, as well as was never before—I will not say tried—it never before entered into the human imagination. There is nothing like it in the narrations of history or in the tales of fiction. All the habits of a mighty nation are at once counteracted. All their property depreciated. All their external connections violated. Five millions of people are engaged. They cannot go beyond the limits of that once free country; now they are not even permitted to thrust their own property through the grates. I am not now questioning its policy, its wisdom, or its practicability, I am merely stating the fact. And I ask if such a power as this, thus great, thus novel, thus interfering with all the great passions and interests of a whole people, ought to be left for six months in operation without any power of control, except upon the occurrence of certain specified and arbitrary contingencies? Who can foretell when the spirit of endurance will cease? Who, when the strength of nature shall outgrow the strength of your bonds? Or, if they do, who can give a pledge that the patience of the people will not first be exhausted? I make a supposition, Mr. Chairman—you are a great physician; you take a hearty, hale man, in the very pride of health, his young blood all active in his veins, and you outstretch him on a bed; you stop up all his natural orifices, you hermetically seal down his pores, so that nothing shall escape outward, and that all his functions and all his humors shall be turned inward upon his system. While your patient is laboring in the very crisis of this course of treatment you, his physician, take a journey into a far country, and you say to his attendant, "I have a great experiment here in process, and a new one. It is all for the good of the young man, so do not fail to adhere to it. No attention is to be paid to any internal symptom which may occur. If the patient be convulsed you are to remove none of my bandages. But in case something external should happen, if the sky should fall, and larks should begin to appear, if three birds of Paradise should fly into the window, the great purpose of all these sufferings is answered. Then, and then only, have you my authority to administer relief."

OPPOSITION TO THE EMBARGO

During the following recess of Congress the feeling against the embargo became extreme in certain parts of the country, particularly New England.

The Federal courts there began to find it difficult to secure convictions from juries of even flagrant violations of the act, and smuggling over the Canadian bor-of affording time for prosecuting the defensive and provisional measures called for by the occasion." He added:

It has demonstrated to foreign nations the moderation and firmness which govern our councils, and to our citizens the necessity of uniting in support of the laws and the rights of their country, and has thus long frustrated those usurpations and spoliations which, if resisted, involved war, if submitted to, sacrificed a vital principle of our national independence.

He therefore left the matter with Congress to decide.

On November 21, 1808, James Hillhouse [Conn.] offered a resolution in the Senate to repeal the embargo. The arguments were much the same as those presented in the House in the preceding debate, and therefore need not be repeated. There were, however, brought forward in the course of the debate opposing views of the effectiveness of an appeal to the patriotism of the country when this is at the sacrifice of its financial interests, which has a psychological import not limited to the special crisis, and therefore is deserving of presentation. Senator Hillhouse and Senator William B. Giles [Va.] were the antagonists.

PUBLIC HONOR VS. PRIVATE INTEREST

THE SENATE, NOVEMBER 21-24, 1808

SEN. HILLHOUSE.—This embargo, instead of operating on those nations which had been violating our rights, was fraught with evils and privations to the people of the United States. They were the sufferers. And have we adopted the monkish plan of scourging ourselves for the sins of others? He hoped not; and that, having made the experiment and found that it had not produced its expected effect, they would abandon it, as a measure wholly inefficient as to the objects intended by it, and as having weakened the great hold which we had on Great Britain, from her supposed dependence on us for raw materials.

Some gentlemen appeared to build up expectations of the efficiency of this system by an addition to it of a non-intercourse law. Mr. H. treated this as a futile idea. He said he was young when the old non-intercourse took place, but he remembered it well, and had then his ideas on the subject. The British army was then at their door, burning their towns and ravaging the country, and at least as much patriotism existed then as now; but British fabrics were received and consumed to almost as great an extent as before the prohibition. When the country was in want of clothing, and could get it for one-fourth price from the British, what was the consequence? Why, all the zealous patriots—for this work of tarring and feathering, and meeting in mobs to destroy their neighbor's property, because he could not think quite as fast as they did, which seemed to be coming in fashion now, had been carried on then with great zeal—these patriots, although all intercourse was penal, carried on commerce notwithstanding. Now, Mr. H. wanted to know how a non-intercourse law was to be executed by us with a coast of fifteen hundred miles open to Great Britain by sea, and joining her by land? Her goods would come through our courts of admiralty by the means of friendly captors; they would be brought in, condemned, and then naturalized, as Irishmen are now naturalized, before they have been a month in the country.

SEN. GILES.—Sir, I have always understood that there were two objects contemplated by the embargo laws. The first, precautionary, operating upon ourselves. The second, coercive, operating upon the aggressing belligerents. Precautionary, in saving our seamen, our ships, and our merchandise, from the plunder of our enemies, and avoiding the calamities of war. Coercive, by addressing strong appeals to the interests of both the belligerents. The first object has been answered beyond my most sanguine expectations.

The President of the United States, ever watchful and anxious for the preservation of the persons and property of all our fellow-citizens, but particularly of the merchants, whose property is most exposed to danger, and of the seamen whose persons are also most exposed, recommended the embargo for the protection of both; and it has saved and protected both.

But, sir, these are not the only good effects of the embargo. It has preserved our peace—it has saved our honor—it has saved our national independence. Are these savings not worth notice? Are these blessings not worth preserving?

Mr. President, the eyes of the world are now turned upon us; if we submit to these indignities and aggressions, Great Britain herself would despise us; she would consider us an outcast among nations; she would not own us for her offspring; France would despise us; all the world would despise us; and, what is infinitely worse, we should be compelled to despise ourselves! If we resist we shall command the respect of our enemies, the sympathies of the world, and the noble approbation of our own consciences.

Mr. President, our fate is in our own hands; let us have union and we have nothing to fear. So highly do I prize union, at this awful moment, that I would prefer any one measure of resistance with union to any other measure of resistance with division; let us, then, sir, banish all personal feelings; let us present to our enemies the formidable front of an indissoluble band of brothers; nothing else is necessary to our success. Mr. President, unequal as this contest may seem; favored as we are by our situation, and under the blessing of a beneficent Providence, who has never lost sight of the United States in times of difficulty and trial, I have the most perfect confidence that if we prove true to ourselves we shall triumph over our enemies. Deeply impressed with these considerations, I am prepared to give the resolution a flat and decided negative.

The views of statesmen such as Giles were still predominant, and on January 9, 1809, a drastic enforcing act supplementary to the embargo was passed. This act was published by many newspapers in New England inclosed in black borders and headed by such mottoes as "Liberty Is Dead!"

John Quincy Adams, who had resigned from the Senate because he could not conscientiously represent his State on the question of the embargo, informed the Government in February, 1809, that execution of the enforcing act in New England might result in the secession of its five States from the Union,—indeed, that unofficial negotiations were already in progress for British assistance to that end.

An opportunity was afforded the President to "back water" on the subject by intimations received from the British Government that its objectionable Orders in Council would be withdrawn if the United States met it half way. Accordingly the administration secured the passage by Congress of a "Non-Intercourse Bill," which repealed the embargo after May 20, 1809, and gave the President power to open trade with either Great Britain or France upon the repeal of its oppressive decrees in so far as these related to the United States. The bill was passed by the Senate on February 21, and by the House on February 27, and approved by the President on March 1, 1809.

This Non-Intercourse Bill was to continue to the end of the next session of Congress. Owing to circumstances hereinafter related it was renewed, and continued until abolished by the Treaty of Ghent in 1814.

The last speaker on the subject in the House (James Sloan, of New Jersey) expressed the prevalent opinion both of the embargo and the device by which it had been repealed, as follows:

Gentlemen could not detest the bill more than he did; and yet he should vote for it for this reason, that the people, as well as himself, were so heartily tired of the embargo that they would be glad to get anything else in place of it. Another reason was that it contained a limitation to the embargo laws, and he hoped that the embargo would expire at the time limited, never again to be reinitiated; that it would be dead, dead, dead.

RESISTANCE OR SUBMISSION TO GREAT BRITAIN?

The British Minister, D. M. Erskine, Withdraws the "Orders in Council"—His Government Repudiates the Action—Election of a Militant Congress—Message of President James Madison—Report of the Committee on Foreign Relations—Debate: in Favor of War Measures, Richard M. Johnson [Ky.], Robert Wright [Md.], John C. Calhoun [S. C.]; Opposed, John Randolph [Va.]—The President Recommends an Embargo as Preliminary to War—Debate as to Its Good Faith: in Favor, Henry Clay [Ky.]; Opposed, Mr. Randolph, Josiah Quincy, 3rd [Mass.].

THE administration of James Madison began under most favorable auspices in respect to foreign relations. On April 19, 1809, the British minister at Washington, D. M. Erskine, withdrew the "Orders in Council," and on the same day President Madison proclaimed the full renewal of trade with that country after June 10, 1809.

The satisfaction over this agreement was, however, short-lived, since the British Government repudiated the action of its minister as unauthorized and recalled him in disgrace. Accordingly, on August 9, 1809, President Madison by proclamation reestablished the rescinded part of the Non-Intercourse Law which related to Great Britain. F. J. Jackson, the successor of Erskine, charged that the agreement with his predecessor had been obtained by trickery, and the Secretary of State, Robert Smith, refused to hold communications with him.

The Non-Intercourse Act was equally ineffective in bringing France to terms.

In January, 1810, Napoleon informed John Armstrong, our minister to France, that the repeal of his various "Decrees" was dependent on the withdrawal by Great Britain of her blockade of the European continent, and on March 23, 1810, he issued his "Rambou-illegitimate Decree," by which 132 American vessels, of a value of $8,000,000, which had entered the ports of France and her allies, were condemned and sold.

On May 1, 1810, Congress replaced the Non-Inter-course Act, which was shortly to expire, with one which removed all restrictions from commerce but excluded 248 British and French ships of war from the harbors of the United States until either country should withdraw its restrictions on American commerce. This bill contained a proviso that if either belligerent withdrew its decrees before March 3, 1811, and the other should fail to do so within three months thereafter, the President would restore the Non-Inter-course Act against the delinquent alone.

Napoleon seized the opportunity thus afforded him to involve the United States in war with Great Britain. On August 5, 1810, he informed Minister Armstrong that he had revoked his obnoxious decrees, on the understanding that Great Britain would revoke her Orders in Council or, on her failure to do so, the United States would assert her rights in the matter.

On November 2 the President accepted this arrangement. The British Government refused to revoke its orders, denying that Napoleon had made a bona fide revocation because he retained the money for which the vessels seized under the Rambouillet Decree had been sold, and because the French prize courts refused to consider any of the former decrees revoked.

Notwithstanding this protest, the Non-Inter-course Act went into effect against Great Britain alone on March 2, 1811.

In the elections to the succeeding Congress, the people of the country, weary of temporizing measures, had replaced many of the old "peace-at-any-price" statesmen with younger men of a more violent temper. Among these may be mentioned Henry Clay [Ky.], who entered the House of Representatives by the unusual door of the Senate, and John C. Calhoun [S. C.]. Clay, owing to the prestige he had gained in the Upper House, was elected Speaker by the new element.

The President convened Congress at an early date.

It is more than five years since England and France, in violation of those principles of justice and public law held sacred by all civilized nations, commenced this unprecedented system by seizing the property of the citizens of the United States, peaceably pursuing their lawful commerce on the high seas. To shield themselves from the odium which such outrage must incur, each of the belligerents sought a pretext in the conduct of the other—each attempting to justify his system of rapine as a retaliation for similar acts on the part of his enemy. As if the law of nations, founded on the eternal rules of justice, could sanction a principle which, if ingrafted into our municipal code, would excuse the crime of one robber upon the sole plea that the unfortunate object of his rapacity was also a victim to the injustice of another. The fact of priority could be true as to one only of the parties, and, whether true or false, could furnish no ground of justification.

The United States, thus unexpectedly and violently assailed by the two greatest powers in Europe, withdrew their citizens and property from the ocean: and, cherishing the blessing of peace, although the occasion would have fully justified war, sought redress in an appeal to the justice and magnanimity of the belligerents. When this appeal had failed of the success which was due to its moderation, other measures, founded on the same specific policy, but applying to the interests instead of the justice of the belligerents, were resorted to. Such was the character of the non-intercourse and non-importation laws, which invited the return of both powers to their former state of amicable relations, by offering commercial advantages to the one who should first revoke his hostile edicts, and imposing restrictions on the other.

A year has elapsed since the French decrees were rescinded, and yet Great Britain, instead of retracing pari passu that course of unjustifiable attack on neutral rights in which she professed to be only the reluctant follower of France, has advanced with bolder and continually increasing strides. To the categorical demands lately made by our Government for the repeal of her Orders in Council, she has affected to deny the practical extinction of the French decrees, and she has, moreover, advanced a new and unexpected demand, increasing in hostility the orders themselves. She has insisted, through her accredited minister at this place, that the repeal of the Orders in Council must be preceded, not only by the practical abandonment of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, so far as they infringe the neutral rights of the United States; but by the renunciation

In his message he reviewed the events which had taken place in the recess of the national legislature, and recommended that action be taken to maintain the nation's rights.

MESSAGE TO CONGRESS

PRESIDENT MADISON, NOVEMBER 5, 1811

The period is arrived which claims from the legislative guardians of the national rights a system of more ample provisions for maintaining them. Notwithstanding the scrupulous justice, the protracted moderation, and the multiplied efforts on the part of the United States to substitute for the accumulating dangers to the peace of the two countries all the mutual advantages of reestablished friendship and confidence, we have seen that the British Cabinet perseveres, not only in withholding a remedy for other wrongs, so long and so loudly calling for it, but in the execution, brought home to the threshold of our territory, of measures which, under existing circumstances, have the character, as well as the effect, of war on our lawful commerce.

With this evidence of hostile inflexibility, in trampling on rights which no independent nation can relinquish, Congress will feel the duty of putting the United States into an armor and an attitude demanded by the crisis, and corresponding with the national spirit and expectations.

On November 29 Peter B. Porter, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, made the following report:

ARMED RESISTANCE AGAINST GREAT BRITAIN

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, NOVEMBER 29, 1811

Without recurring to the multiplied wrongs of which we have so just cause of complaint against the two great belligerents, your committee will only call your attention, at this time, to the systematic aggression of those powers, authorized by their edicts against neutral commerce—a system which, as regarded its principles, was founded on pretensions that went to the subversion of our national independence; and which, although now abandoned by one power, is, in its broad and destructive operation, as still enforced by the other, sapping the foundation of our prosperity.

on the part of France of the whole of her system of commercial warfare against Great Britain, of which those decrees originally formed a part.

This system is understood to consist in a course of measures adopted by France and the other powers on the Continent subject to, or in alliance with, her, calculated to prevent the introduction into their territories of the produce and manufactures of Great Britain and her colonies; and to annihilate her trade with them. However hostile these regulations may be on the part of France toward Great Britain, or however sensible the latter may feel their effects, they are, nevertheless, to be regarded only as the expedients of one enemy against another, for which the United States, as a neutral power, can, in no respect, be responsible; they are, too, in exact conformity with those which Great Britain has herself adopted and acted upon in time of peace as well as war. And it is not to be presumed that France would yield to the unauthorized demand of America what she seems to have considered as one of the most powerful engines of the present war.

Such are the pretensions upon which Great Britain founds the violation of the maritime rights of the United States—pretensions not theoretical merely, but followed up by a desolating war upon our unprotected commerce. The ships of the United States, laden with the products of our own soil and labor, navigated by our own citizens, and peaceably pursuing a lawful trade, are seized on our own coasts, at the very mouths of our harbors, condemned, and confiscated.

Your committee are not, however, of that sect whose worship is at the shrine of a calculating avarice. And, while we are laying before you the just complaints of our merchants against the plunder of their ships and cargoes, we cannot refrain from presenting to the justice and humanity of our country the unhappy case of our impressed seamen. Although the groans of these victims of barbarity for the loss of (what should be dearer to Americans than life) their liberty; although the cries of their wives and children, in the privation of protectors and parents, have, of late, been drowned in the louder clamors at the loss of property; yet is the practice of forcing our mariners into the British navy, in violation of the rights of our flag, carried on with unabated rigor and severity. If it be our duty to encourage the fair and legitimate commerce of this country by protecting the property of the merchant; then, indeed, by as much as life and liberty are more estimable than ships and goods, so much more impressive is the duty to shield the persons of our seamen, whose hard and honest services are employed equally with those of the merchants in advancing, under the mantle of its laws, the interests of their country.

To sum up, in a word, the great causes of complaint against Great Britain, your committee need only say that the United States, as a sovereign and independent power, claim the right to use the ocean, which is the common and acknowledged highway of nations, for the purposes of transporting, in their own vessels, the products of their own soil and the acquisitions of their own industry, to a market in the ports of friendly nations, and to bring home, in return, such articles as their necessities or convenience may require—always regarding the rights of belligerents as defined by the established laws of nations. Great Britain, in defiance of this incontestable right, captures every American vessel bound to, or returning from, a port where her commerce is not favored; enslaves our seamen, and, in spite of our remonstrances, perseveres in these aggressions.

To wrongs so daring in character, and so disgraceful in their execution, it is impossible that the people of the United States should remain indifferent. We must now tamely and quietly submit, or we must resist by those means which God has placed within our reach.

Your committee would not cast a shade over the American name by the expression of a doubt which branch of this alternative will be embraced. The occasion is now presented when the national character, misunderstood and traduced for a time by foreign and domestic enemies, should be vindicated. If we have not rushed to the field of battle like the nations who are led by the mad ambition of a single chief, or the avarice of a corrupted court, it has not proceeded from a fear of war, but from our love of justice and humanity. That proud spirit of liberty and independence which sustained our fathers in the successful assertion of their rights against foreign aggression is not yet sunk. The patriotic fire of the Revolution still burns in the American breast with a holy and unextinguishable flame, and will conduct this nation to those high destinies which are not less the reward of dignified moderation than of exalted valor.

But we have borne with injury until forbearance has ceased to be a virtue. The sovereignty and independence of these States, purchased and sanctified by the blood of our fathers, from whom we received them, not for ourselves only, but as the inheritance of our posterity, are deliberately and systematically violated. And the period has arrived when, in the opinion of your committee, it is the sacred duty of Congress to call forth the patriotism and resources of the country. By the aid of these, and with the blessing of God, we confidently trust we shall be enabled to procure that redress which has been sought for by justice, by remonstrance, and forbearance, in vain.

Your committee, reserving for a future report those ulterior measures which, in their opinion, ought to be pursued, would, at this time, earnestly recommend, in the words of the President, "that the United States be put into an armor and attitude demanded by the crisis, and corresponding with the national spirit and expectations."

The committee recommended an increase of the army, a refitting of the navy, and resort to privateering.

These recommendations were adopted after long and heated debates, of which the first, that on the increase of the army, contained the leading arguments, pro and con.

In this debate the following were the chief speakers in the affirmative: Richard M. Johnson [Ky.], Robert Wright [Md.], and John C. Calhoun [S. C.]. John Randolph [Va.], the free lance, was a member of the committee and the only one who dissented from the resolution, being vehement in opposition to the measure when it was brought before the House. By a vote of 110 to 22 the House resolved to increase the army.

ON PREPARATIONS FOR WAR

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 6-16, 1811

JOHN RANDOLPH.—In the days of terror we shrunk at standing armies; and what is the object now—defence? Who? Freemen who would not defend themselves. Are seven millions of Americans to be protected in their lives and liberties by ten thousand vagabonds who are fit food for gunpowder? It will be necessary to know the ulterior views of the committee on this point. It will be proper, before a vote is taken on this resolution, to know for what purpose these additional troops are wanted. The House ought not to commit itself on a question of such magnitude without detailed information. I am as much opposed to raising standing armies now as in the reign of terror. I have seen too much of the corruptions attendant on those establishments not to disclaim all share in the creation of them.

The people of the United States can defend themselves, if necessary, and have no idea of resting their defense on mercenaries, picked up from brothels and tippling houses—pickpockets who have escaped from Newgate, etc., and sought refuge in this asylum of oppressed humanity. This resolution contains an unconstitutional proposition, and the standing army now in the service of the United States is maintained in the very teeth of that part of the Constitution which declares that no money for the support of a standing army should be appropriated for more than two years. I ask again what is the object of the army now proposed to be raised? If the President says they are necessary for the protection of New Orleans, to be employed against the Indians, or to repel incursions from Canada (although this seems not to be much thought of), I shall not refuse to grant them. I know not how gentlemen calling themselves republicans can advocate such a war. What was their doctrine in 1798-'9, when the command of the army—that highest of all possible trusts in any government, be the form what it may—was reposed in the bosom of the Father of his Country, the sanctuary of a nation's love, the only hope that never came in vain! When other worthies of the Revolution—Hamilton, Pinckney, and the younger Washington—men of tried patriotism, of approved conduct and valor, of untarnished honor, held subordinate command under him? Republicans were then unwilling to trust a standing army even to his hands who had given proof that he was above all human temptation. Where now is the Revolutionary hero to whom you are about to confide this sacred trust? To whom will you confide the charge of leading the flower of our youth to the Heights of Abraham? Will you find him in the person of an acquitted felon? What; then you were unwilling to vote an army where such men as had been named held high command! When Washington himself was at the head—did you then show such reluctance, feel such scruples; and are you now nothing loth, fearless of every consequence? Will you say that your provocations were less then than now? When your direct commerce was interdicted—your ambassadors treated with derision from the French Court—tribute demanded—actual war waged upon you!

Those who opposed the army then were indeed denounced as the partisans of France; as the same men—some of them at least—are now held up as the advocates of England; those firm and undeviating Republicans who then dared, and now dare, to cling to the ark of the Constitution, to defend it even at the expense of their fame, rather than surrender themselves to the wild projects of mad ambition! There is a fatality attending plenitude of power. Soon or late some mania seizes upon its possessors—they fall from the dizzy height through the giddiness of their own heads. Will not the same causes produce the same effects now as then? Sir, you may raise this army, you may build up this vast structure of patronage, this mighty apparatus of favoritism; but—"lay not the flattering unction to your souls"—you will never live to enjoy the succession. You sign your political death warrant.

An insinuation has fallen from the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Grundy) that the late massacre of our brethren on the Wabash has been instigated by the British Government. Has the President given any such information? Has the gentleman received any such, even informally, from any officer of this Government? Is it so believed by the Administration? I have cause to think the contrary to be the fact; that such is not their opinion. This insinuation is of the grossest kind—a presumption the most rash, the most unjustifiable. Show but good ground for it, I will give up the question at the threshold—I am ready to march to Canada. It is indeed well calculated to excite the feelings of the Western people particularly, who are not quite so tenderly attached to our red brethren as some modern philosophers; but it is destitute of any foundation, beyond mere surmise and suspicion.

This war of conquest, a war for the acquisition of territory and subjects, is to be a new commentary on the doctrine that republics are destitute of ambition—that they are addicted to peace, wedded to the happiness and safety of the great body of their people. But it seems this is to be a holiday campaign—there is to be no expense of blood, or treasure, on our part—Canada is to conquer herself—she is to be subdued by the principles of fraternity. The people of that country are first to be seduced from their allegiance, and converted into traitors, as preparatory to the making them good citizens. Although I must acknowledge that some of our flaming patriots were thus manufactured, I do not think the process would hold good with a whole community. It is a dangerous experiment. We are to succeed in the French mode by the system of fraternization—all is French; but how dreadfully it might be retorted on the Southern and Western slaveholding States. I detest this subornation of treason. No—if he must have them, let them fall by the valor of our arms, by fair, legitimate conquest; not become the victims of treacherous seduction.

I am not surprised at the war spirit which is manifesting itself in gentlemen from the South. In the year 1805-'6, in a struggle for the carrying trade of belligerent colonial produce, this country had been most unwisely brought into collision with the great powers of Europe. By a series of most impolitic and ruinous measures,¹ utterly incomprehensible to every rational, sober-minded man, the Southern planters, by their own votes, had succeeded in knocking down the price of cotton to seven cents, and of tobacco (a few choice crops excepted) to nothing—and in raising the price of blankets (of which a few would not be amiss in a Canadian campaign), coarse woolsens, and every article of first necessity, three or four hundred per cent. And now that, by our own acts, we have brought ourselves into this unprecedented condition, we must get out of it in any way but by an acknowledgment of our own want of wisdom and forecast. But is war the true remedy? Who will profit by it? Speculators—a few lucky merchants, who draw prizes in the lottery—commissaries and contractors. Who must suffer by it? The people. It is their blood, their taxes, that must flow to support it.

I am gratified to find gentlemen acknowledging the demoralizing and destructive consequences of the non-importation law—confessing the truth of all that its opponents foretold when it was enacted. And will you plunge yourselves in war because you have passed a foolish and ruinous law, and are ashamed to repeal it? "But our good friend the French Emperor stands in the way of its repeal," and as we cannot go too far in making sacrifices to him, who has given such demonstration of his love for the Americans, we must, in point of fact, become parties to his war. "Who can be so cruel as to refuse him this favor?" My imagination shrinks from the miseries of such a connection. I call upon the House to reflect whether they are not about to abandon all reclamation for the unparalleled outrages, "insults and injuries" of the French Government, to give up our claim for plundered millions; and I ask what reparation or atonement they can expect to obtain in hours of future dalliance, after they have made a tender of their person to this great deflowerer of the virginity of republics. We have by our own wise (he would not say wise-acre) measures, so increased the trade and wealth of Montreal and Quebec that at last we begin to cast a wishful eye at Canada. Having done so much toward its improvement by the exercise of "our restrictive energies," we begin to think the laborer worthy of his hire, and to put in claim for our portion. Suppose it ours, are we any nearer to our point? As his minister said to the King of Epirus, "may we not as well take our bottle of wine before as after this exploit?" Go! march to Canada! leave the broad bosom of the Chesapeake and her hundred tributary rivers—the whole line of seacoast from Machias to St. Mary's—unprotected! You have taken Quebec—have you conquered England? Will you seek for the deep foundations of her power in the frozen deserts of Labrador?

"Her march is on the mountain wave,
Her home is on the deep!"

Will you call upon her to leave your ports and harbors untouched, only just till you can return from Canada to defend them? The coast is to be left defenceless, while men of the interior are reveling in conquest and spoil. But grant for a moment, for mere argument's sake, that in Canada you touched the sinews of her strength, instead of removing a clog upon her resources—an encumbrance, but one which, from a spirit of honor, she will vigorously defend. In what situation would you then place some of the best men of the nation? As Chatham and Burke, and the whole band of her patriots, prayed for her defeat in 1776, so must some of the truest friends to their country deprecate the success of our arms against the only power that holds in check the arch-enemy of mankind.

Our people will not submit to be taxed for this war of conquest and dominion. The Government of the United States is not calculated to wage offensive foreign war—it was instituted for the common defence and general welfare; and whosoever should embark in a war of offence would put it to a test which it was by no means calculated to endure. I am unwilling to embark in common cause with France and be dragged at the wheels of the car of some Burr or Bonaparte.

What is the situation of the slaveholding States? During the war of the Revolution, so fixed were the habits of subordination of the blacks that when the whole Southern country was overrun by the enemy, who invited them to desert, no fear was ever entertained of an insurrection of the slaves. During the war of seven years, with our country in possession of the enemy, no such danger was ever apprehended. But should we therefore be unobservant spectators of the progress of society within the last twenty years—of the silent and powerful change wrought by time and chance upon its composition and temper? When the fountains of the great deep of abomination were broken up even the poor slaves had not escaped the general deluge. The French Revolution had polluted even them. Nay, there had not been wanting men in that House, witness their legislative Legendre, the butcher who once held a seat there, to preach upon that floor these imprescriptible rights to a crowded audience of blacks in the galleries—teaching them that they are equal to their masters; in other words, advising them to cut their throats. Similar doctrines were disseminated by peddlers from New England and elsewhere, throughout the Southern country—and masters have been found so infatuated as by their lives and conversation, by a general contempt of order, morality, and religion, unthinkingly to cherish these seeds of self-destruction to them and their families. What was the consequence? Within the last ten years repeated alarms of insurrection among the slaves—some of them awful indeed. From the spreading of this infernal doctrine the whole Southern country has been thrown into a state of insecurity. Men dead to the operation of moral causes have taken away from the poor slave his habits of loyalty and obedience to his master, which lightened his servitude by a double operation; beguiling his own cares and disarming his master's suspicions and severity; and now, like true empirics in politics, you are called upon to trust to the mere physical strength of the fetter which holds him in bondage. You have deprived him of all moral restraint, you have tempted him to eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, just enough to perfect him in wickedness; you have opened his eyes to his nakedness; you have armed his nature against the hand that has fed, that has clothed him, that has cherished him in sickness; that hand which, before he became a pupil of your school, he had been accustomed to press with respectful affection. You have done all this—and then show him the gibbet and the wheel, as incentives to a sullen, repugnant obedience. God forbid, sir, that the Southern States should ever see an enemy on their shores, with these infernal principles of French fraternity in the van! While talking of taking Canada, some of us are shuddering for our own safety at home. The night-bell never tolls for fire in Richmond that the mother does not hug her infant more closely to her bosom. I have been a witness of some of the alarms in the capital of Virginia.

Strange! that we should have no objection to any people or government, civilized or savage, in the whole world other than the British. The great Autocrat of all the Russias receives the homage of our high consideration. The Dey of Algiers and his Divan of Pirates are very civil, good sort of people, with whom we find no difficulty in maintaining the relations of peace and amity—"Turks, Jews, and Infidels"; Mellimelli, or the Little Turtle; barbarians and savages of every clime and color are welcome to our arms. With chiefs of banditti, negro or mulatto, we can treat and can trade. Name, however, but England, and all our antipathies are up in arms against her. Against whom? Against those whose blood runs in our veins; in common with whom we claim Shakespeare, and Newton, and Chatham for our countrymen; whose form of government is the freest on earth, our own only excepted; from whom every valuable principle of our own institutions has been borrowed—representation, jury trial, voting the supplies, writ of habeas corpus—our whole civil and criminal jurisprudence—against our fellow Protestants, identified in blood, in language, in religion with ourselves. In what school did the worthies of our land, the Washingtons, Henrys, Hancocks, Franklins, Rutledges of America, learn those principles of civil liberty which were so nobly asserted by their wisdom and valor? And American resistance to British usurpation has not been more warmly cherished by these great men and their compatriots; not more by Washington, Hancock, and Henry, than by Chatham and his illustrious associates in the British Parliament. It ought to be remembered, too, that the heart of the English people was with us. It was a selfish and corrupt ministry, and their servile tools, to whom we were not more opposed than they were. I trust that none such may ever exist among us—for tools will never be wanting to subserve the purposes, however ruinous or wicked, of kings and ministers of state.

I acknowledge the influence of a Shakespeare and Milton upon my imagination, of a Locke upon my understanding, of a Sidney upon my political principles, of a Chatham upon qualities which, would to God! I possessed in common with that illustrious man—of a Tillotson, a Sherlock, and a Porteus, upon my religion. This is a British influence which I could never shake off. I allow much to the just and honest prejudices growing out of the Revolution. But by whom have they been suppressed when they ran counter to the interests of his country? By Washington. By whom, would you listen to them, are they most keenly felt? By felons escaped from the jails of Paris, Newgate, and Kilmahinham, since the breaking out of the French Revolution—who, in this abused and insulted country, have set up for political teachers, and whose disciples give no other proof of their progress in republicanism except a blind devotion to the most ruthless military despotism that the world ever saw. These are the patriots who scruple not to brand with the epithet of 'Tory men' (looking toward the seat of Col. Stuart) by whose blood your liberties have been cemented. These are they who hold in so keen remembrance the outrages of the British armies, from which many of them were deserters. Ask these self-styled patriots where they were during the American war (for they are for the most part old enough to have borne arms), and you strike them dumb—their lips are closed in eternal silence. If it were allowable to entertain partialities, every consideration of blood, language, religion, and interest would incline us toward England; and, yet, shall they be alone extended to France and her ruler, whom we are bound to believe a chastening God suffers as the scourge of a guilty world! On all other nations he tramples—he holds them in contempt—England alone he hates; he would, but he cannot, despise her—fear cannot despise. And shall we disparage our ancestors?—shall we bastardize ourselves by placing them even below the brigades of St. Domingo? with whom Mr. Adams had negotiated a sort of treaty, for which he ought to have been and would have been impeached if the people had not previously passed sentence of disqualification for their service upon him. This antipathy to all that is English must be French.

The outrages and injuries of England, bred up in the principles of the Revolution, I myself never palliate, much less defend. I well remember flying with my mother and her newborn child from Arnold and Phillips—and how they had been driven by Tarleton and other British pandours from pillar to post, while her husband was fighting the battles of his country. The impression is indelible on my memory—and yet (like my worthy old neighbor, who added seven buckshot to every cartridge at the battle of Guilford, and drew a fine sight at his man) I must be content to be called a Tory by a patriot of the last importation. Let us not get rid of one evil (supposing it to be possible) at the expense of a greater—mutatis mutandis! Suppose France in possession of the British naval power—and to her the trident must pass should England be unable to wield it—what would be your condition? What would be the situation of your seaports and their seafaring inhabitants? Ask Hamburg, Lubec. Ask Savannah. What, sir! when their privateers are pent up in our harbors by the British bulldogs, when they receive at our hands every rite of hospitality, from which their enemy is excluded, when they capture within our own waters, interdicted to British armed ships, American vessels; when such is their deportment toward you, under such circum-pendence and acknowledge ourselves her devoted colonies. The people whom I represent will not hesitate which of the two courses to choose; and, if we are involved in war to maintain our dearest rights and to preserve our independence, I pledge myself to this House and my constituents to this nation, that they will not be wanting in valor nor in their proportion of men and money to prosecute the war with effect. Before we relinquish the conflict I wish to see Great Britain renounce the piratical system of paper blockade; to liberate our captured seamen on board her ships of war; relinquish the practice of imprisonment on board our merchant vessels; to repeal her orders in Council; and cease in every other respect to violate our neutral rights; to treat us as an independent people. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Randolph] has objected to the destination of this auxiliary force—the occupation of the Canadas and the other British possessions upon our borders where our laws are violated, the Indians stimulated to murder our citizens, and where there is a British monopoly of the peltry and fur trade. I should not wish to extend the boundary of the United States by war if Great Britain would leave us to the quiet enjoyment of independence; but, considering her deadly and implacable enmity, and her continued hostility, I shall never be contented until I see her expulsion from North America, and her territories incorporated with the United States.

The waters of the St. Lawrence and the Mississippi interlock and the great Disposer of Human Events intended those two rivers should belong to the same people.

But it has been denied that British influence had any agency in the late dreadful conflict and massacre upon the Wabash; and this is said to vindicate the British nation from so foul a charge. Sir, look to the book of the Revolution. See the Indian savages in Burgoyne's army urged on every occasion to use the scalping-knife and tomahawk—not in battle, but against old men and women, and children, in the night, when they were taught to believe an omniscient eye could not see their guilty deeds; and, thus hardened in iniquity, they perpetrated the same deeds by the light of the sun when no arm was found to oppose or protect. And when this crying sin was opposed by Lord Chatham in the House of Lords, the employment of these Indians was justified by a speech from one of the ministry. Thus we see how the principles of honor, of humanity, of Christianity were violated and justified in the face of the world. Therefore I can have no doubt of the influence of British agents stances, what could you expect if they were the uncontrolled lords of the ocean? Had those privateers at Savannah borne British commissions, or had your shipments of cotton, tobacco, ashes, and what not to London and Liverpool been confiscated and the proceeds poured into the English exchequer—my life upon it!—you would never have listened to any miserable wire-drawn distinctions between "orders and decrees affecting our neutral rights," and "municipal decrees" confiscating in mass your whole property. You would have had instant war! The whole land would have blazed out in war.

And shall republicans become the instruments of him who has effaced the title of Attila to the "Scourge of God!" Yet even Attila, in the fallen fortunes of civilization, had, no doubt, his advocates, his tools, his minions, his parasites in the very countries that he overran—sons of that soil whereon his horses had trod; where grass could never after grow.

I beseech the House, before they run their heads against this post Quebec, to count the cost. My word for it, Virginia planters will not be taxed to support such a war—a war which must aggravate their present distresses; in which they have not the remotest interest. Where is the Montgomery, or even the Arnold, or the Burr who is to march to Point Levi?

I call upon those professing to be republicans to make good the promises held out by their republican predecessors when they came into power—promises which, for years afterwards, they had honestly, faithfully fulfilled. We had vaunted of paying off the national debt, of retrenching useless establishments; and yet had now become as infatuated with standing armies, loans, taxes, navies, and war as ever were the Essex Junto. What republicanism is this?

RICHARD M. JOHNSON.—For the first time since my entrance into this body there now seems to be but one opinion with a great majority—that with Great Britain war is inevitable; that the hopes of the sanguine as to a returning sense of British justice have expired; that the prophecies of the discerning have failed; and, that her infernal system has driven us to the brink of a second revolution as important as the first. Upon the Wabash, through the influence of British agents, and within our territorial sea by the British navy, the war has already commenced. Thus, the folly, the power, and the tyranny of Great Britain have taken from us the last alternative of longer forbearance.

We must now oppose the farther encroachments of Great Britain by war, or formally annul the Declaration of our Indein keeping up Indian hostility to the people of the United States, independent of the strong proofs on this occasion; and I hope it will not be pretended that these agents are too moral or too religious to do the infamous deed. So much for the expulsion of Great Britain from her dominions in North America and their incorporation into the United States of America.

The gentleman from Virginia says we are identified with the British in religion, in blood, in language, and deeply laments our hatred to that country, who can boast of so many illustrious characters. This deep-rooted enmity to Great Britain arises from her insidious policy, the offspring of her perfidious conduct toward the United States. Her disposition is unfriendly; her enmity is implacable; she sickens at our prosperity and happiness. If obligations of friendship do exist, why does Great Britain rend those ties asunder and open the bleeding wounds of former conflicts? Or does the obligation of friendship exist on the part of the United States alone? I have never thought that the ties of religion, of blood, of language, and of commerce would justify or sanctify insult and injury—on the contrary, that a premeditated wrong from the hand of a friend created more sensibility and deserved the greater chastisement and the higher execration. What would you think of a man to whom you were bound by the most sacred ties who would plunder you of your substance, aim a deadly blow at your honor, and, in the hour of confidence, endeavor to bury a dagger in your bosom? Would you, sir, proclaim to the world your affection for this miscreant of society after this conduct, and endeavor to interest your audience with the ties of kindred that bound you to each other? So let it be with nations, and there will be neither surprise nor lamentation that we execrate a government so hostile to our independence—for it is from the government that we meet with such multiplied injury, and to that object is our hatred directed. As to individuals of merit, whether British or French, I presume no person would accuse the people of the United States of such hatred to them, or of despising individuals who might not be instrumental in the maritime despotism which we feel; and this accounts for the veneration we have for Sidney and Russell, statesmen of whom the gentleman has spoken; they are fatal examples why we should love the British Government. The records of that government are now stained with the blood of these martyrs in freedom's cause, as vilely as with the blood of American citizens; and certainly we shall not called upon to love equally the murderer and the victim. For God's sake let us not again be told of the ties of religion, of laws, of blood, and of customs which bind the two nations together, with a view to extort our love for the English Government, and, more especially, when the same gentleman has acknowledged that we have ample cause of war against that nation—let us not be told of the freedom of that corrupt government whose hands are washed alike in the blood of her own illustrious statesmen for a manly opposition to tyranny and the citizens of every other clime. But I would inquire into this love for the British Government and British institutions, in the gross, without any discrimination. Why love her rulers? Why kiss the rod of iron which inflicts the stripes without a cause? When all admit we have just cause of war such attachments are dangerous and encourage encroachment. I will venture to say that our hatred of the British Government is not commensurate with her depredations and her outrages on our rights, or we should have waged a deadly war against her many years past. The subject of foreign attachments and British hatred has been examined at considerable length. I did not intend to begin that discussion, but I will pursue it, and, though I make no charge of British attachments, I will, at all times, at every hazard, defend the Administration and the Republican party against the charge of foreign partialities—French or Spanish, or any other kind—when applied to the measures of our Government. This foreign influence is a dangerous enemy; we should destroy the means of its circulation among us—like the fatal tunic, it destroys where it touches. It is insidious, invisible, and takes advantage of the most unsuspecting hours of social intercourse. I would not deny the good will of France nor of Great Britain to have an undue influence among us. But Great Britain alone has the means of this influence to an extent dangerous to the United States. It has been said that Great Britain was fighting the battles of the world—that she stands against universal dominion threatened by the arch-fiend of mankind. I should be sorry if our independence depended upon the power of Great Britain. If, however, she would act the part of a friendly power toward the United States I should never wish to deprive her of power, of wealth, of honor, of prosperity. But, if her energies are to be directed against the liberties of this free and happy people, against my native country, I should not drop a tear if the fast-anchored isle would sink into the waves, provided the innocent inhabitants could escape the deluge and find an asylum in a more favorable soil.

And as to the power of France, I fear it as little as any other power; I would oppose her aggressions under any circumstances as soon as I would British outrages.

The ties of religion, of language, of blood, as it regards Great Britain, are dangerous ties to this country, with her present hostile disposition—instead of pledges of friendship they are used to paralyze the strength of the United States in relation to her aggressions. There are other ties equally efficacious. The number of her commercial traders within our limits, her agents, etc., the vast British capital employed in our commerce and our moneyed institutions, connected with her language, ancestry, customs, habits, and laws. These are formidable means for estranging the affections of many from our republican institutions, and producing partialities for Great Britain.

The gentleman from Virginia has called the military regular forces mercenaries. If, by this appellation, any reproach or degradation is intended, its justice and propriety is denied. In times like the present, when dangers thicken upon us, at the moment when we are compelled by most wanton tyranny upon the high seas, and upon land may be added, to abandon our peaceful habits for the din of arms, officers and soldiers in this country are governed by the noble feelings of patriotism and of valor. The history of the world may be ransacked; other nations may be brought in review before us, and examples of greater heroism cannot be quoted than shall be performed in battle by our officers and soldiers, military and naval marine. The deeds of their ancestors would be before them; glory would animate their bosoms, and love of country would nerve the heart to deeds of mighty fame. If, therefore, there should not be a diminution of respect for those who entertain an opinion so degrading to our army, it should at least be understood that such opinions do not lessen the confidence due to those who faithfully serve their country, and who would lay down their lives for it. This reflection brings to memory the late memorable conflict upon the Wabash. Governor Harrison pitched his tents near the Prophet's town; and, although this fanatic and his followers collected, and the American forces were anxious to finish the work by an open and daylight engagement, if there was a necessity to resort to arms, their impetuous valor was easily stayed, when they were informed that the white flag of peace was to be hoisted next morning, and the effusion of blood was to be spared. But in the silent watches of the night, relieved from the fatigues of valor, and slumbering under the perfidious promises of the savages, who were infuriated and made drunk by British traders, dreaming of the tender smile of a mother, and the fond embraces of affectionate wives, and of prattling children upon their knees, on their return from the fatigues of a campaign!—the destroyers came with the silent instruments of death—the war-club, the scalping-knife, the tomahawk, and the bow and arrow; with these they penetrate into the heart of our forces—they enter the tents of our officers—many close their eyes in death—it was a trying moment for the rest of our heroes, but they were equal to the dreadful occasion. The American forces flew to arms; they rallied at the voice of their officers, and soon checked the work of death. The savages were successively and successfully charged and driven until daylight, when they disappeared like the mist of morning. In this dreadful conflict many were killed and wounded on both sides; and the volunteers and the regiment under Colonel Boyd acted and fought with equal bravery and to their immortal honor. The volunteers from Kentucky were men of valor and worth—young men of hopeful prospects, and married men of reputation and intelligence, governed by no mercenary views—honor prompted them to serve their country. Some of these fallen heroes were my acquaintances, my friends: one not the least conspicuous lived in my district—Colonel Owens; Colonel Daviess, a neighbor. You, Mr. Speaker, know the worth of some of these men; and I regret that you are not in my place to speak their praise. So long as the records of this transaction remain, the 9th of November will not be forgotten, and time shall only brighten the fame of the deeds of our army, and a tear shall be shed for those who have fallen.

ROBERT WRIGHT.—I, sir, shall take the liberty of varying the question from the honorable member from Virginia [Mr. Randolph] who, yesterday, considered it a question of peace or war. I shall consider it as a question of war or submission, dire alternatives, of which, however, I trust no honest American can hesitate in choosing when the question is correctly stated and distinctly understood. The gentleman from Virginia contends that it is a dispute about the carrying trade, brought on us by the cupidity of the American merchants, in which the farmer and planter have little interest; that he will not consent to tax his constituents to carry on a war for it; that the enemy is invulnerable on the "mountain wave," the element of our wrongs, but should they violate the "natale solum,"¹ he would point all the energies of the nation and avenge the wrong. Was that gentleman stricken on the nose by a man so tall that he could not reach his nose, I strongly incline to think his manly pride would not permit him to decline the conflict. Sir, the honorable member is incorrect in his premises, and, of course, in his conclusions. I will endeavor to convince him of this, and shall be gratified if I can enlist his talents on the side of a bleeding country. Sir, the violations of the commercial rights of which we complain do not only embrace the carrying trade, properly so called, but also the carrying of the products of our own soil, the fruits of our own industry; these, although injurious only to our property, are just causes of war. But, sir, the impressment of our native seamen is a stroke at the vitals of liberty itself, and, although it does not touch the "natale solum," yet it enslaves the "nativos filios"—the native sons of America; and, in the ratio that liberty is preferable to property, ought to enlist the patriotic feelings of that honorable member and make his bosom burn with that holy fire that inspired the patriots of the Revolution.

Sir, the carrying trade—by which I mean the carrying of articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of a foreign clime—except articles contraband of war—is as much the right of the American people as the carrying of the products of their own soil, and is not only secured by the law of nations, but by the positive provisions of the British treaty. To us, sir, it is an all-important right. We import from the West Indies, annually, property to the amount of forty millions of dollars, for which we pay in the products of our own soil; of this, ten millions are consumed in the United States and the surplus thirty millions are exported to foreign countries, on which the American merchant pays three per cent. on the duties to the United States, obtains the profits on the freight of thirty millions of dollars, and furnishes a market for American productions to the same amount.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia has declared that, if he could believe that the late massacre of the troops in the attack on Governor Harrison by the Indians under the Prophet was the effect of British agency he would unite with us, heart and hand, and personally assist to avenge the bloody deed. I feel a confidence that, if the gentleman will attend to the circumstances of this case and take a retrospective view of the conduct of the British Government, he will feel no doubt of the fact.

At the late great council with Governor Harrison the chiefs of many tribes were convened, all of whom, except Tecumseh, the Prophet's brother, in their speeches avowed their friendly dispositions and their devotion to peace with the United States.

Tecumseh, who, with a number of his tribe, came from Fort Malden in Canada, declared his hostile intentions against the United States, left the council with that avowed intention, and returned again to Fort Malden. Shortly after this the Shawanees assembled a large body in arms in the Indian Territory under the Prophet, and committed the assault on the troops of Governor Harrison, though they have paid for their temerity. This, I trust, connected as it is with the immorality and extraordinary pretensions of that government at this crisis, will satisfy, not only the gentleman from Virginia, but this House, of a British agency in the case.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that the gentleman from Virginia should ascribe to gentlemen of the West a disposition for war, with a view to raise the price of their hemp; or to the gentlemen of the North, with a view to raise the price of their beef and flour. These, sir, are selfish motives, and such I cannot for a moment believe will be taken into consideration; they will, with every other section of the Union, unite in deciding it on its merits; they will count the wrongs we have sustained; they will reflect that the honor, the interest, and the very independence of the United States are directly attacked; they will, as guardians of the nation's rights, agreeably to the advice of the administration "put the United States into an armor and an attitude demanded by the crisis, and correspondent with the national spirit and expectations"; they will prepare to chastise the wrongs of the British cabinet which, the President tells us, "have the character as well as the effect of war on our commercial rights which no independent nation can relinquish." They will decide, with the President, the executive organ of the nation's will, "that these wrongs are no longer to be endured." They will decide, with the Committee of Foreign Relations, "that forbearance longer to repel these wrongs has ceased to be a virtue," and I hope they will decide with me that submission is a crime; and, sir, if they will examine a document on that table, I mean the returns of the Twelfth Congress, and compare them with the eleventh, they will find nearly one-half of the eleventh Congress removed. This, sir, may correctly be considered as the sentence of the nation against the doctrine of submission; it is certainly an expression of the nation's will in a language not to be misunderstood and too serious in its application not to be respected.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia says he expects to be charged with being under British influence; however, he disregarded it. I assure him I shall not be one of his accusers;

I believe him governed by himself, and influenced by pure American motives, and that, if he saw the subject as I do, his bosom would burn with the same sacred fire to avenge our wrongs; and were I to hear him charged in his absence with British influence I should repel it, notwithstanding he has told us, in a prideful manner, that he had descended from British ancestors; that, from a Shakespeare he had formed his taste, from a Locke his mind, from a Chatham his politics, from a Sydney his patriotism, from a Tillotson his religion. Mr. Speaker, had I been that honorable member I should have boasted a nobler line of ancestry; I should have claimed my descent from the beardless Powhatan and the immortal Pocahontas,¹ and I should have taken as models, from my own State, a Henry for my eloquence, a Jefferson for my politics, a Washington for my patriotism, and a Madison, or rather the Oracles of Revolution, for my religion. But, sir, I am myself so much a Roman that I can truly say, in their language:

"Aut genus aut proavos, aut qua non fecimus ipse, viz ea nostra voco."²

"Honor and shame from no condition rise, Act well your part, there all the honor lies."

Sir, the charge of foreign influence and the recrimination of one political party by the other are unpleasant things. I should rejoice to see the curtain of oblivion drawn over them and all uniting under the nobler distinction of American.

MR. CALHOUN.—Sir, I am not insensible to the weighty importance of this question, for the first time submitted to this House, as a redress of our long list of complaints against one of the belligerents; but, according to my mode of thinking on this subject, however serious the question, whenever I am on its affirmative side my conviction must be strong and unalterable. War, in this country, ought never to be resorted to but when it is clearly justifiable and necessary; so much so as not to require the aid of logic to convince our reason, nor the ardor of eloquence to inflame our passions. There are many reasons why this country should never resort to it but for causes the most urgent and necessary. It is sufficient that, under a government like ours, none but such will justify it in the eye of the nation; and, were I not satisfied that such is the present case, I certainly would be no advocate of the proposition now before the House.

² "Neither race, nor ancestors, nor ought save what I myself have accomplished hardly do I call mine."

Sir, I might prove the war, should it ensue, justifiable by the express admission of the gentleman from Virginia; and necessary by facts undoubted and universally admitted, such as that gentleman did not pretend to controvert. The extent, duration, and character of the injuries received; the failure of those peaceful means heretofore resorted to for the redress of our wrongs, is my proof that it is necessary. Why should I mention the impressment of our seamen; depredation on every branch of our commerce, including the direct export trade, continued for years, and made under laws which professedly undertake to regulate our trade with other nations; negotiation resorted to time after time, till it is become hopeless; the restrictive system persisted in to avoid war, and in the vain expectation of returning justice? The evil still grows, and in each succeeding year swells in extent and pretension beyond the preceding. The question, even in the opinion and admission of our opponents, is reduced to this single point—which shall we do, abandon or defend our own commercial and maritime rights, and the personal liberties of our citizens employed in exercising them? These rights are essentially attacked, and the war is the only means of redress. The gentleman from Virginia has suggested none—unless we consider the whole of his speech as recommending patient and resigned submission as the best remedy. Sir, which alternative this House ought to embrace it is not for me to say. I hope the decision is made already by a higher authority than the voice of any man. It is not for the human tongue to instill the sense of independence and honor. This is the work of nature—a generous nature, that disdains tame submission to wrongs.

This part of the subject is so imposing as to enforce silence even on the gentleman from Virginia. He dared not to deny his country's wrongs, or vindicate the conduct of her enemy.

Only one point of that gentleman's argument had any, the most remote, relation to this point. He would not say we had not a good cause of war, but insisted that it was our duty to define that cause. If he means that this House ought, at this stage of the proceeding, or any other, to enumerate such violations of our rights as we are willing to contend for, he prescribes a course which neither good sense nor the usage of nations warrants. When we contend, let us contend for all our rights; the doubtful and the certain, the unimportant and essential. It is as easy to struggle, or even more so, for the whole as a part. At the termination of the contest secure all that our wisdom and valor and the fortune of the war will permit. This is the dictate of common sense; such, also, is the usage of nations. How, then, could the gentleman, after his admissions, with the facts before him and the nation, complain? The causes are such as to warrant, or rather make it indispensable in any nation not absolutely dependent to defend its rights by force. Let him, then, show the reasons why we ought not so to defend ourselves. On him, then, is the burden of proof. This he has attempted; he has endeavored to support his negative. Before I proceed to answer the gentleman particularly, let me call the attention of the House to one circumstance: that is, that almost the whole of his arguments consisted of an enumeration of evils always incident to war, however just and necessary; and that, if they have any force, it is calculated to produce unqualified submission to every species of insult and injury. I do not feel myself bound to answer arguments of the above description; and, if I should touch on them, it will be only incidentally and not for the purpose of serious refutation. The first argument of the gentleman which I shall notice is the unprepared state of the country. Whatever weight this argument might have in a question of immediate war it surely has little in that of preparation for it. If our country is unprepared, let us remedy the evil as soon as possible. Let the gentleman submit his plan; and, if a reasonable one, I doubt not it will be supported by the House. But, sir, let us admit the fact and the whole force of the argument, I ask whose is the fault? Who has been a member for many years past, and has seen the defenceless state of his country even near home, under his own eyes, without a single endeavor to remedy so serious an evil? Let him not say: "I have acted in a minority." It is no less the duty of the minority than a majority to endeavor to serve our country. For that purpose we are sent here, and not for that of opposition. We are next told of the expenses of the war, and that people will not pay taxes. Why not? Is it a want of capacity? What, with one million tons of shipping, a trade of near $100,000,000, manufactures of $150,000,000, and agriculture of thrice that amount, shall we be told the country wants capacity to raise and support ten thousand or fifteen thousand additional regulars? No; it has the ability, that is admitted; but will it not have the disposition? Is not the course a just and necessary one? Shall we, then, utter this libel on the nation? Where will proof be found of a fact so disgraceful? It is said in the history of the country twelve or fifteen years ago. The case is not parallel. The ability of the country is greatly increased since. The object of that tax was unpopular. But on this, as well as my memory and almost infant observation at that time serve me, the objection was not to the tax or its amount, but the mode of collection. The eye of the nation was frightened by the number of officers; its love of liberty shocked with the multiplicity of regulations. We, in the vile spirit of imitation, copied from the most oppressive part of European laws on that subject, and imposed on a young and virtuous nation all the severe provisions made necessary by corruption and long growing chicanery. If taxes should become necessary I do not hesitate to say the people will pay cheerfully. It is for their Government and their cause, and it would be their interest and duty to pay. But it may be, and I believe was, said that the nation will not pay taxes because the rights violated are not worth defending, or that the defence will cost more than the profit. Sir, I here enter my solemn protest against this low and "calculating avarice" entering this hall of legislation. It is fit only for shops and counting-houses, and ought not to disgrace the seat of sovereignty by its squalid and vile appearance. Whenever it touches sovereign power, the nation is ruined. It is too short-sighted to defend itself. It is an unpromising spirit, always ready to yield a part to save the balance. It is too timid to have in itself the laws of self-preservation. It is never safe but under the shield of honor.

Sir, I know of only one principle to make a nation great, to produce in this country not the form but real spirit of union, and that is to protect every citizen in the lawful pursuit of his business. He will then feel that he is backed by the Government; that its arm is his arms; and will rejoice in its increased strength and prosperity. Protection and patriotism are reciprocal. This is the road that all great nations have trod. Sir, I am not versed in this calculating policy; and will not, therefore, pretend to estimate in dollars and cents the value of national independence or national affection. I cannot dare to measure, in shillings and pence, the misery, the stripes, and the slavery of our impressed seamen; nor even to value our shipping, commercial, and agricultural losses under the Orders in Council and the British system of blockade. I hope I have not condemned any prudent estimate of the means of a country before it enters on a war. This is wisdom, the other folly. Sir, the gentleman from Virginia has not failed to touch on the calamity of war; that fruitful source of declamation by which pity becomes the advocate of cowardice; but I know not what we have to do with that subject. If the gentleman desires to repress the gallant ardor of our countrymen by such topics, let me inform him that true courage regards only the cause—that it is just and necessary—and that it despises the pain and danger of war. If he really wishes to promote the cause of humanity, let his eloquence be addressed to Lord Wellesley or Mr. Percival, and not the American Congress. Tell them, if they persist in such daring insult and injury to a neutral nation, that, however inclined to peace, it will be bound in honor and interest to resist; that their patience and benevolence, however great, will be exhausted; that the calamity of war will ensue; and that they, in the opinion of wounded humanity, will be answerable for all its devastation and misery. Let melting pity and regard to the interest of humanity stay the hand of injustice, and, my life on it, the gentleman will not find it difficult to call off his country from the bloody scenes of war.

We are next told of the danger of war! I believe we are all ready to acknowledge its hazard and accidents; but I cannot think we have any extraordinary danger to contend with, at least so much as to warrant an acquiescence in the injuries we have received. On the contrary, I believe no war can be less dangerous to internal peace or national existence. But we are told of the black population of the South. As far as the gentleman from Virginia speaks of his own personal knowledge I will not pretend to contradict him; I only regret that such is the dreadful state of his particular part of the country. Of the Southern section I, too, have some personal knowledge, and can say that in South Carolina no such fears in any part are felt. But, sir, admit the gentleman's statement; will a war with Great Britain increase the danger? Will the country be less able to repress insurrection? Had we any thing to fear from that quarter, which I sincerely disbelieve, in my opinion, the precise time of the greatest safety is during a war in which we have no fear of invasion—then the country is most on its guard; our militia the best prepared; and standing force the greatest. Even in our Revolution no attempts were made by that portion of our population; and, however the gentleman may frighten himself with the disorganizing effects of French principles, I cannot think our ignorant blacks have felt much of their baneful influence. I dare say more than one-half of them never heard of the French Revolution.

But, as great as is the danger from our slaves, the gentleman's fears end not there—the standing army is not less terrible to him. Sir, I think a regular force, raised for a period of actual hostilities, cannot be called a standing army. There is a just distinction between such a force, and one raised as a peace establishment. Whatever may be the composition of the latter, I hope the former will consist of some of the best materials of the country. The ardent patriotism of our young men, and the reasonable bounty in land which is proposed to be given, will impel them to join their country's standard and to fight her battles; they will not forget the citizen in the soldier, and, in obeying their officer, learn to condemn their Constitution. In our officers and soldiers we will find patriotism no less pure and ardent than in the private citizen; but, if they should be depraved, as represented, what have we to fear from twenty-five or thirty thousand regulars? Where will be the boasted militia of the gentleman? Can one million of militia be overpowered by thirty thousand regulars? If so, how can we rely on them against a foe invading our country? Sir, I have no such contemptuous idea of our militia—their untainted bravery is sufficient to crush all foreign and internal attempts on their country's liberties.

But we have not yet come to the end of the chapter of dangers. The gentleman's imagination, so fruitful on this subject, conceives that our Constitution is not calculated for war, and that it cannot stand its rude shock. This is rather extraordinary—we must depend upon the pity or contempt of other nations for our existence. The Constitution, it seems, has failed in its essential part, "to provide for the common defence." No, says the gentleman from Virginia, it is competent for a defensive, but not an offensive, war. It is not necessary for me to expose the error of this opinion. Why make the distinction in this instance? Will he pretend to say that this is an offensive war; a war of conquest? Yes, the gentleman has dared to make this assertion; and for reasons no less extraordinary than the assertion itself. He says our rights are violated on the ocean, and that these violations affect our shipping and commercial rights, to which the Canadas have no relation. The doctrine of retaliation has been much abused of late by an unnatural extension; we have now to witness a new abuse. The gentleman from Virginia has limited it down to a point. By his system, if you receive a blow on the breast, you dare not return it on the head, you are obliged to measure and return it on the precise point on which it was received. If you do not proceed with mathematical accuracy it ceases to be just self-defence; it becomes an unprovoked attack. In speaking of Canada the gentleman from Virginia introduced the name of Montgomery with much feeling and interest. Sir, there is danger in that name to the gentleman's argument. It is sacred to heroism! It is indignant of submission! This calls my memory back to the time of our Revolution; to the Congress of '74 and '75. Supposing a speaker of that day had risen and urged all the arguments which we have heard on this subject; had told that Congress: "your contest is about the right of laying a tax, and that the attempt on Canada had nothing to do with it; that the war would be expensive; that danger and devastation would over-spread our country; and that the power of Great Britain was irresistible." With what sentiment, think you, would such doctrines have been received? Happy for us, they had no force at that period of our country's glory. Had they been then acted on, this hall would never have witnessed a great nation convened to deliberate for the general good; a mighty empire, with prouder prospects than any nation the sun ever shone on would not have risen in the West. No; we would have been vile, subjected colonies; governed by that imperious rod which Great Britain holds over her distant provinces.

The gentleman from Virginia is at a loss to account for what he calls our hatred to England. He asks how can we hate the country of Locke, of Newton, Hampden, and Chatham; a country having the same language and customs with ourselves, and descending from a common ancestry. Sir, the laws of human affections are uniform. If we have so much to attach us to that country powerful indeed must be the cause which has overpowered it.

Yes, sir, there is a cause strong enough. Not that occult courtly affection which he has supposed to be entertained for France; but it is to be found in continued and unprovoked insult and injury. A cause so manifest that the gentleman from Virginia had to exert much ingenuity to overlook it. But, sir, here I think the gentleman, in his eager admiration of that country, has not been sufficiently guarded in his argument. Has he reflected on the cause of that admiration? Has he examined the reasons of our high regard for her Chatham? It is his ardent patriotism; his heroic courage of his mind that could not brook the least insult or injury offered to his country, but thought that her interest and honor ought to be vindicated at every hazard and expense.

[Here Mr. Calhoun indulged in a rather ungenerous comparison between Lord Chatham and Mr. Randolph, the Representative from Virginia having challenged it, which, on reflection, the young member from South Carolina caused to be omitted from the recorded speech.]

MR. RANDOLPH.—The nation has been brought into its present alarming and unprecedented situation by means in nowise unaccountable—by steps as direct and successive as Hogarth's celebrated series of prints, "The Rake's Progress," beginning at the gaming table and ending in a jail, or in bedlam. We commenced our system somewhat on the plan of Catharine of Russia, when she lent her nominal aid to the coalition; we had dealt even more profusely than she in manifestoes; we began, under the instigation of mercantile cupidity, to contend by proclamations and resolutions for the empire of the ocean. But, instead of confining ourselves as she had done to this bloodless warfare, we must copy the wise example of her successors, and, after our battle of Friedland, I suppose we also shall have our peace of Tilsit.

The gentleman from Maryland has expressed surprise at my manner of speaking of our origin from an English stock. We were vastly particular about the breed of our horses, cattle, and sheep, but careless of the breed of human nature. And yet to our Anglo-Saxon origin we owe our resistance to British tyranny. Whence, but from that origin came all the blessings of life, so far as political privileges are concerned? To what is it owing that we are at this moment deliberating under the forms of a free representative government? Had we sprung from the loins of Frenchmen (he shuddered at the thought!) where would have been that proud spirit of resistance to ministerial encroachment on our rights and liberties which achieved our independence? In what school had the illustrious men of the Revolution formed those noble principles of civil liberty asserted by their eloquence and maintained by their arms? Among the grievances stated in their remonstrance to the King a "standing army" met us at the threshold. It was curious to see in that list of wrongs so many that had since been self-inflicted by us.

I will forever stand up for the militia. It is not in the scoffs of the epaulette gentry, who, for any service they have seen, are the rawest militia, to degrade them in my eyes. Who are they? Ourselves—the country. Arm them and you are safe, beyond the possibility of danger. Yearly did the standing army sweep off the money, while the militia received empty praise. I would rather see the thing reversed. But there will forever be a court and country party. The standing army is the devoted creature of the court. It must forever be so. Can we wonder that it should be cherished by its master? I will ever uphold the militia; but I detest standing armies as the profligate instruments under this joint operation of the two parties, ministerial and federal, to the poor client between two lawyers, or the cloth between the tailor's shears.

I am glad to hear that this is not to be a party war. When the last additional force bill was raised, to which this was about to be superadded, it was an indispensable preliminary to an appointment to sign, or to promise to sign, the thirty-nine articles of the creed of the reigning political church. But now the political millennium was at hand—already had John Adams and Citizen Genet laid down, like the lion and the lamb, in the same fold. And, if they were not joined by their fellow-laborer in Newgate, it was his keeper's fault, not that of his inclination. Citizen Genet, now an American patriot of the first order, who extols "our Washington"; the champion of the laws of nations; the vindicator of American rights against foreign (and, of course, French) aggression!

I am glad to hear that it is not to be a war for the protection of manufactures. To domestic manufactures, in the true sense of the term, I have always been, and ever shall be, a friend; I have taken a pride in clothing myself in them until it was attempted to be made a political test. I abhor tests of all sorts, political and religious, and never will submit to them. I am sick of this cant of patriotism which extends to a man's victuals, drink, and clothes. I have, from a sort of obstinacy that belongs to me, laid aside the external use of these manufactures; but I am their firm friend, and of the manufacturers also. They are no new things to me; no Merino hobby of the day; I have known them from my infancy.

On April 1, 1812, President Madison, reverting to his favorite weapon of commercial restrictions, sent a confidential message to Congress which proposed as "expedient under existing circumstances and prospects" a general embargo for sixty days.

This was discussed in executive session, the proceedings, however, being printed later by order of the House.

The debate centered upon the question as to whether the embargo was what it was evidently intended to mean, namely, a genuine preparation for war, or whether it was another measure in the long series of commercial restrictions on which the Government had thus far vainly relied to bring Great Britain to terms. Henry Clay of despotism, as the bloodhounds of hell. They would support any and every existing government. In all history I remember only one instance of their deserting their government and taking part with the people: and that was when the Duke of Orleans had bribed the army of the last of the Bourbon Kings. A mercenary soldier is disgusting to our senses; odious and detestable to the eye of reason, republicanism, and religion. Yet, that "mere machine of murder," rude as it is, was the manufacturer of all the Cæsars and Cromwells, and Bonapartes of the earth; consecrated by a people's curse, not loud but deep, to the infernal gods. As from the filth of the kennel and common sewer spread the pestilence that carried havoc through a great city, so from this squalid, outcast, homeless wretch springs the scourge of military despotism. And yet we are told that there is no danger from an army of thirty or forty thousand men. With five thousand Cæsar had passed the Rubicon. With twenty-two thousand he fought the battle of Pharsalia which rendered him master of the world. To come to later times—what number had Bonaparte when, deserting his companions in arms, he returned a solitary fugitive from Egypt, to overturn that government which, if it had possessed one particle of energy, if it had been possible for the civil authority to cope with military power, would have cashiered him for having ruined one of the best-appointed fleets and armies that ever sailed from a European port? Well might the father of political wisdom (Lord Chatham) say to the Parliament of England: "entrench yourselves in parchment to the teeth, the sword will find a passage to the vitals of the constitution." As good a Republican as ever sat on that floor (Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun) had dissolved his political friendship with the Earl of Sunderland when he found him supporting an army; and the event justified his sagacity. Cromwell, the affected patron of liberty, always encouraged the army. We know the consequence. It was a fundamental principle of free government that a legislature which would preserve its liberty must avoid that canker, a standing army. Are we to forget, as chimerical, our notions of this institution which we imbibed from our very cradles, which are imprinted on our bills of rights and Constitutions, which we avowed under the reign of John Adams? Are they to be scourged out of us by the birch of the unfledged political pedagogues of the day? If I were the enemy of this Government, could I reconcile it to my principles, I would follow the example set me in another quarter and say to the majority, go to your inevitable destruction! I liken the people [Ky.], the Speaker of the House, upheld the former view. He was opposed by John Randolph and Josiah Quincy, 3rd [Mass.].

THE WAR EMBARGO

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 1-3, 1812

MR. CLAY warmly expressed his satisfaction and full approbation of the message, and the proposition now before the committee. He approved of it because it is to be viewed as a direct precursor to war. Sir, said Mr. C., after the pledges we have made, and the stand we have taken, are we now to cover ourselves with shame and indelible disgrace by retreating from the measures and grounds we have taken? He said what would disgrace an individual under certain circumstances would disgrace a nation. And what would you think of one individual who had thus conducted to another, and should then retreat? He said there was no intrinsic difficulty or terror in the war: there was no terror except what arises from the novelty. Where are we to come in contact with our enemy? On our own continent. If gentlemen please to call these sentiments Quixotic he would say he pitied them for their sense of honor. We know no pains have been spared to vilify the Government. If we now proceed we shall be supported by the people. Many of our people have not believed that war is to take place. They have been wilfully blinded. He was willing to give them further notice. It remains for us to say whether we will shrink or follow up the patriotic conduct of the President. As an American and a member of this House he felt a pride that the Executive had recommended this measure.

MR. RANDOLPH was confident in declaring that this was not a measure of the Executive—that it was engendered by an extensive excitement upon the Executive. Whose ever measure it is the people of the United States will consider it as a subterfuge for war; as a retreat from the battle. We some years ago resolved that we must have war, embargo, or submission—we have not had war or submitted—we must therefore have embargo. It appears to be limited to sixty days; at the expiration of that time will any one say we shall be prepared for war? Sir, we are in the situation of a debtor who promises to pay his note at the bank in sixty days—we shall prolong the time sixty days, and sixty days after that, until deferred hope makes the heart sick. He would tell the honorable Speaker that, at the end of sixty days, we shall not have war, and the reason is the Executive dare not plunge the nation into a war in our unprepared state.

Are the majority, in consequence of having been goaded by the presses, to plunge the people into a war by bringing them first to the whipping-post and then by exciting their spirit? He would assure the House the spirit of the people is not up to it at this time; if so, there would be no necessity of those provocations to excite this false spirit—this kind of Dutch courage. If you mean war, if the spirit of the country is up to it, why have you been spending five months in idle debate?

From Lossing's "Field Book of the War of 1812"

Mr. QUINCY expressed in strong terms his abhorrence of the measure. He said that his objection was that it was not what it pretended to be; and was what it pretended not to be. That it was not embargo preparatory to war; but that it was embargo as a substitute for the question of declaring war.

But it is said "we must protect our merchants." Heaven help our merchants from embargo-protection! It is also said that "the present condition of things has been brought upon the country by the merchants; that it was their clamor, in 1805 and 1806, which first put Congress upon this system of coercive restriction, of which they now so much complain." It is true that, in those years, the merchants did petition, not for embargo, not for commercial embarrassment and annihilation, but for protection. They, at that time, really thought that this national Government was formed for protection, and that it had at heart the prosperity of all the great interests of the country. If "it was a grievous fault, grievously have the merchants answered it." They asked you for relief and you sent them embarrassment. They asked you for defence and you imposed embargo. They "asked bread and you gave them a stone." They "asked a fish and you gave them a serpent." Grant that the fault was great, suppose that they did mistake the nature and character of the Government, is the penalty they incurred by this error never to be remitted? Permit them once to escape and, my word for it, they will never give you an apology for this destructive protection. If they do they will richly deserve all the misery which, under the name of protection, you can find means to visit upon them. Your tender mercies are cruelties. The merchants hate and spurn this ruinous defence.

Seeing the war spirit in Congress President Madison laid aside his pet remedy of commercial retaliation against British aggression, and reluctantly resorted to armed resistance.

THE WAR OF 1812

DECLARATION OF WAR

The message was referred to a committee of which John C. Calhoun was chairman. On June 3 he brought in the report of the committee which reviewed the case against Great Britain even more fully than the President had done, and concluded with the recommendation of an immediate appeal to arms.

"Your committee, believing that the free-born sons of America are worthy to enjoy the liberty which their fathers purchased at the price of so much blood and treasure, and seeing, in the measures adopted by Great Britain, a course commenced and persisted in, which must lead to a loss of national character and independence, feel no hesitation in advising resistance by force; in which the Americans of the present day will prove to the enemy and to the world that we have not only inherited that liberty which our fathers gave us, but also the will and power to maintain it. Relying on the patriotism of the nation, and confidently trusting that the Lord of Hosts will go with us to battle in the righteous cause and crown our efforts with success, your committee recommend an immediate appeal to arms."

On June 16, 1812, the Senate passed a bill declaring war with Great Britain. It was concurred in by the House on June 18, and approved by the President on the same day.

The minority in the House of Representatives drew up the following protest against the declaration, which they addressed to their constituents:

The momentous question of war with Great Britain is decided. On this topic, so vital to your interests, the right of public debate, in the face of the world, and especially of their constituents, has been denied to your Representatives. They have been called into secret session on this most interesting of all your public relations, although the circumstances of the time and of the nation afforded no one reason for secrecy, unless it be found in the apprehension of the effect of public debate on public opinion; or of public opinion on the result of the vote.

Except the message of the President of the United States, which is now before the public, nothing confidential was communicated. That message contained no fact not previously

THE SECOND WAR WITH GREAT BRITAIN

President Madison's Message on Relations with Great Britain—Declaration of War—Protest of the Minority—The President's Message on "The Justice of the War"—Debate on Bill to Raise Additional Troops; It Develops into One on the Justice and Expediency of the War: in Favor of the War: Felix Grundy [Tenn.], Henry Clay [Ky.]; Opposed, Joseph Pearson [N. H.], in Opposition to the War, and John C. Calhoun [S. C.] in Its Defence—The Hartford Convention—The Treaty of Ghent.

ON June 1, 1812, the President sent a message to Congress which, exhaustively reviewing our relations with Great Britain, summed up the situation as follows:

We behold, in fine, on the side of Great Britain, a state of war against the United States; and, on the side of the United States, a state of peace toward Great Britain.

Whether the United States shall continue passive under these progressive usurpations, and their accumulating wrongs, or, opposing force to force in defence of their national rights, shall commit a just cause into the hands of the Almighty Disposer of Events, avoiding all connections which might entangle it in the contest or views of other powers, and preserving a constant readiness to concur in an honorable reestablishment of peace and friendship, is a solemn question which the Constitution wisely confides to the legislative department of the Government. In recommending it to their early deliberation, I am happy in the assurance that the decision will be worthy the enlightened and patriotic councils of a virtuous, a free, and a powerful nation.

known. No one reason for war was intimated but such as was of a nature public and notorious. The intention to wage war and invade Canada had been long since openly avowed. The object of hostile menace had been ostentatiously announced. The inadequacy of both our army and navy for successful invasion, and the insufficiency of the fortifications for the security of our seaboard, were everywhere known. Yet the doors of Congress were shut upon the people. They have been carefully kept in ignorance of the progress of measures, until the purposes of the administration were consummated and the fate of the country sealed. In a situation so extraordinary the undersigned have deemed it their duty by no act of theirs to sanction a proceeding so novel and arbitrary. On the contrary, they made every attempt in their power to attain publicity for their proceedings. All such attempts were vain. When this momentous subject was stated as for debate, they demanded that the doors should be opened.

This being refused, they declined discussion; being perfectly convinced, from indications too plain to be misunderstood, that, in the House, all argument with closed doors was hopeless, and that any act giving implied validity to so flagrant an abuse of power would be little less than treachery to the essential rights of a free people.

A RIGHTEOUS WAR

MESSAGE TO CONGRESS BY PRESIDENT MADISON

In his annual message to Congress at its next session, in November, 1812, the President, after stating the military operations which had been undertaken, and recommending measures of war proper to the circumstances, said:

Above all, we have the inestimable consolation of knowing that the war in which we are actually engaged is a war neither of ambition nor of vain glory; that it is waged, not in violation of the rights of others, but in the maintenance of our own; that it was preceded by a patience without example, under wrongs accumulating without end; and that it was finally not declared until every hope of averting it was extinguished by the transfer of the British scepter into new hands clinging to former councils; and, until declarations were reiterated to the last hour, through the British envoy here, that the hostile edicts against our commercial rights and our maritime independence would not be revoked; nay, that they could not be revoked without violating the obligations of Great Britain to other powers, as well as to her own interests. To have shrunk, under such circumstances, from manly resistance would have been a degradation blasting our best and proudest hopes; it would have struck us from the high ranks where the virtuous struggles of our fathers had placed us, and have betrayed the magnificent legacy which we hold in trust for future generations. It would have acknowledged that, on the element which forms three-fourths of the globe we inhabit, and where all independent nations have equal and common rights, the American people were not an independent people, but colonists and vassals. It was at this moment, and with such an alternative, that war was chosen. The nation felt the necessity of it and called for it. The appeal was accordingly made, in a just cause, to the just and all-powerful Being who holds in His hand the chain of events and the destiny of nations. It remains only that, faithful to ourselves, entangled in no connections with the views of other powers, and ever ready to accept peace from the hand of justice, we prosecute the war with united counsels and with the ample faculties of the nation, until peace be so obtained and as the only means, under the Divine blessing, of speedily obtaining it.

A bill to raise an additional military force which it was intended to use for the conquest of Canada (a pet plan of the Administration) was introduced in the House of Representatives on December 24, 1812, by David R. Williams, of South Carolina, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. It was debated from December 29, 1812, to January 14, 1813, when it was passed by a vote of 77 to 42.

Of this debate Senator Benton says, in his "Debates of Congress":

This debate, although arising on a subject which implied a limited discussion, soon passed beyond its apparent bounds, and, instead of being confined to the simple military question of raising additional troops, expanded into a discussion of the whole policy, objects, and causes of the war, and became the principal debate of the session. All the leading members of the House took part in it; and many new members, then young, and whose names have since become famous, then took their start.

The chief speakers in favor of a continuance of the war were: Felix Grundy [Tenn.] and Henry Clay [Ky.]. Leading opponents of the war were: Joseph Pearson [N. C.], Timothy Pitkin, Jr. [Conn.], Josiah Quincy, 3rd [Mass.], and John Randolph [Va.].

THE CONTINUANCE OF THE WAR

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 29, 1812-JANUARY 14, 1813

MR. PEARSON.—Mr. Speaker: Whatever may have been the original causes for the declaration of this war, we are now taught to believe that the question in contest is reduced to a single point. The British Orders in Council were repealed on the 21st of June, three days after our declaration of war; and, of course, without a knowledge of that event, the blockade of May, 1806, had long ceased to exist. The sole avowed cause, therefore, remaining, and for which the war is now carried on, is the practice of impressment from on board our merchant vessels. This subject has for many years engaged the attention of both nations; it has been a fruitful theme of execration and declamation for almost every editor and orator of the age. Great as our cause of complaint may have been (and I am not disposed to palliate it), it must be admitted by all who understand the nature and true bearing of the question that it had been subjected to much exaggeration. Permit me, sir, to remark that, notwithstanding the importance, the difficulty, and delicacy which have been justly attributed to this subject, and the unwillingness at all times manifested on the part of the British Government to abandon or derogate from the abstract right of impressing her own seamen from on board neutral merchant vessels, it is very far from being certain that she has not been willing to enter into such arrangement with this Government as would place the question of impressment on a basis both safe and honorable to this nation. By a reference to the correspondence of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney with the British Commissioners, which preceded the treaty concluded by those gentlemen in the year 1806, but which was unfortunately rejected by the then President, it is evident that the interest of impressment was, in the opinion of those gentlemen, placed on a footing well calculated to secure our own seamen from the abuse against which we had complained, and against which it was our duty to protect them. This opinion was not only expressed in forcible and decisive language at the time of entering into the arrangement, but repeated by Mr. Monroe more than a year after, in a formal letter to the Secretary of State.

Thus, sir, as we have conclusive evidence of a disposition on the part of the British Government, at one period at least, to advance considerable length toward an adjustment of this long-contested question and as we have no evidence that different principles and claims are now asserted from those then advanced, I think it fair to conclude that it is still in our power to put an end to this controversy with safety to our seamen and advantage to the nation. Instead, then, of passing this bill, and spending the blood and treasure of our countrymen in the prosecution of this war, I conceive it our duty to make an effort for the sanction of our just rights, and the restoration of peace, without a further appeal to force. It is my decided opinion that such an effort, if fairly and liberally made by this House, and the executive branch of the Government, would not fail in producing the desired effect.

This is what I ask you now to do—pass a law effectually to exclude all British subjects from the public and private maritime service of the United States; let the law be well guarded against the possibility of violation or evasion; and let us be determined rigidly to enforce it; place this law in the hands of your Executive; let him immediately appoint one or more honest, able, independent commissioners; give them ample powers to form a treaty or arrange the sole question which is now the pivot on which this war depends. Do all this; do it faithfully, and I venture to predict you will obtain a peace and secure your just rights more speedily, more effectually, and more satisfactorily to the people of this country than by all the military operations in the compass of your power.

MR. PITKIN.—On the subject of impressments, for which alone the war is now to be continued, what, let me ask, is the principle for which our Government contends? It is this, sir: that the flag of the merchant vessel shall cover all who sail under it; or, in other words, that our flag shall protect all the foreigners our merchants may think proper to employ in their service, whether naturalized or not. Before we raise immense armies, before we sacrifice any more of the lives of American citizens, let us inquire—

1st. Whether the principle, if yielded to us to-morrow, would benefit our native seamen, or would promote the real permanent interests of their country.

2d. Whether there is a probability of obtaining a recognition of this principle by a continuance of the war.

The foreigners employed in our service are those who have not been naturalized, and those who have taken the benefit of our naturalization laws. The former constitute nearly the whole: the latter class is very inconsiderable. The foreigners of the first description, of course, are in competition with our native seamen, and either exclude them from employment, or lessen the rate of their wages. In this way, then, the employment of foreign seamen is an injury to our native seamen; and, in a national point of view, it may well be questioned whether their employment subverts the permanent and solid interest of the country.

Is it not, sir, of the first importance to us, as a commercial and maritime nation, especially when we may be engaged in a war with a great naval power, to be able to have a sufficient number of native seamen employed in our service? Seamen who shall be attached by every tie to this country, and on whom we can depend for its defence in time of danger?

The situation in which we now are proves the correctness, as well as the importance, of the position. We are now at war with Great Britain. And, at the very time when this war was declared, thousands of British seamen who had not been naturalized in this country were, and they still continue, in our employment. These seamen (I am speaking, sir, of those not naturalized) are now claimed as British subjects, and, indeed, by our own laws, are now considered as alien enemies.

With respect to foreigners who have been naturalized under our laws, the question is of a more distinct nature and presents greater difficulties. We ought, undoubtedly, to fulfill all our obligations toward them. I presume, however, the number of naturalized British seamen now in our employ does not exceed two or three hundred. Shall we, sir, continue the war for these men?

I am aware, sir, that, with respect to impressment from our merchant vessels, abuses have happened; that, although the right of taking American citizens is not claimed, the British commanders have not been scrupulous whether they took British subjects or American citizens. Sir, these abuses I never can, and I never will, justify. I am satisfied, however, that they have been exaggerated.

But, sir, let me ask if we have not really intended to protect foreign seamen under our flag, if we have not been guilty of gross negligence, to say the least of it, toward our native seamen?

In 1796 Congress passed an act for the relief and protection of American seamen. By this act the collectors of the several ports were directed, on application, to enter the names of seamen, being citizens of the United States, to grant them certificates, in a form given in the act. Have those certificates, or protections, as they are commonly called, been confined to bona fide American citizens? No, sir; we cannot, we ought not, to shut our eyes against facts too notorious to be concealed or denied. Under this act, made expressly for the protection of American seamen, every foreign seaman, almost, at the moment of setting his feet on our shores, has obtained a certificate from some collector that he is a citizen of the United States; and, with this certificate in his pocket, although perhaps a deserter from his own government, he enters a public or private vessel as an American seaman. Not only have these protections been thus obtained by fraud and perjury, but they have also, long since, been an object of barter; they have been bought and sold, and transferred from one to another, not only in this country, but in foreign countries. When we ourselves place no confidence in these certificates, when we know that they are thus obtained by fraud and perjury, can we expect that foreign nations will give credit to them? Instead of being a shield and protection to the real American sailor, they have become a dangerous weapon of offence.

MR. QUINCY.—When war against Great Britain was proposed at the last session there were thousands in these United States, and I confess to you I was myself among the number, who believed not one word of the matter. I put my trust in the old-fashioned notions of common sense and common prudence. That a people which had been more than twenty years at peace should enter upon hostilities against a people which had been twenty years at war; that a nation whose army and navy were little more than nominal should engage in a war with a nation possessing one of the best appointed armies and the most powerful marine on the globe; that a country to which neutrality had been a perpetual harvest should throw that great blessing away for a controversy in which nothing was to be gained and everything valuable put in jeopardy; from these, and innumerable like considerations, the idea seemed so absurd that I never once entertained it as possible. And now, after war has been declared, the whole affair seems so extraordinary and so utterly irreconcilable to any previous suggestions of wisdom and duty that I know not what to make of it or how to believe it. Even at this moment my mind is very much in the state of certain Pennsylvania Germans, of whom I have heard it asserted that they are taught to believe, by their political leaders, and do at this moment consider the allegation, that war is at present existing between the United States and Great Britain to be a "Federal falsehood."

It was just so with respect to the invasion of Canada. I heard of it last June. I laughed at the idea, as did multitudes of others, as an attempt too absurd for serious examination. I was in this case again beset by common sense and common prudence. That the United States should precipitate itself upon the unoffending people of that neighboring colony, unmindful of all previously subsisting amities, because the parent state, three thousand miles distant, had violated some of our commercial rights; that we should march inland, to defend our ships and seamen; that with raw troops, hastily collected, miserably appointed, and destitute of discipline, we should invade a country defended by veteran forces, at least equal, in point of numbers, to the invading army; that bounty should be offered and proclamations issued, inviting the subjects of a foreign power to treason and rebellion, under the influences of a quarter of the country upon which a retort of the same nature was so obvious, so easy, and, in its consequences, so awful; in every aspect the design seemed so fraught with danger and disgrace that it appeared absolutely impossible that it should be seriously entertained. Those, however, who reasoned after this manner were, as the event proved, mistaken. The war was declared. Canada was invaded. We were in haste to plunge into these great difficulties, and we have now reason, as well as leisure enough, for regret and repentance.

The great mistake of all those who reasoned concerning the war and the invasion of Canada, and concluded that it was impossible that either should be seriously intended, resulted from this, that they never took into consideration the connection of both those events with the great election for the chief magistracy which was then pending. It never was sufficiently considered by them that plunging into war with Great Britain was among the conditions on which the support for the Presidency was made dependent. They did not understand that an invasion of Canada was to be in truth only a mode of carrying on an electioneering campaign. But since events have explained political purposes there is no difficulty in seeing the connections between projects and interests. It is now apparent to the most mole-fighted how a nation may be disgraced, and yet a cabinet attain its desired honors. All is clear. A country may be ruined in making an Administration happy.

Concerning the invasion of Canada as a means of carrying on the subsisting war, it is my duty to speak plainly and decidedly, not only because I herein express my own opinions upon the subject, but, as I conscientiously believe, the sentiments also of a very great majority of that whole section of country in which I have the happiness to reside. I say then, sir, that I consider the invasion of Canada as a means of carrying on this war as cruel, wanton, senseless, and wicked.

You will easily understand, Mr. Speaker, by this very statement of opinion, that I am not one of that class of politicians which has for so many years predominated in the world on both sides of the Atlantic. You will readily believe that I am not one of those who worship in that temple where Condorcet is the high priest and Machiavel the God. With such politicians the end always sanctifies the means; the least possible good to themselves perfectly justifies, according to their creed, the inflicting the greatest possible evil upon others. In the judgment of such men, if a corrupt ministry at three thousand miles' distance shall have done them an injury, it is an ample cause to visit with desolation a peaceable and unoffending race of men, their neighbors, who happen to be associated with that ministry by ties of mere political independence. What though these colonies be so remote from the sphere of the questions in controversy that their ruin or prosperity could have no possible influence upon the result? What though their cities offer no plunder? What though their conquest can yield no glory? In their ruin there is revenge. And revenge to such politicians is the sweetest of all morsels. With such men neither I nor the people of that section of country in which I reside hold any communion. There is between us and them no one principle of sympathy either in motive or action.

That wise, moral, reflecting people, which constitute the great mass of the population of Massachusetts—indeed, of all New England—look for the sources of their political duties nowhere else than in those fountains from which spring their moral duties. According to their estimate of human life and its obligations, both political and moral duties emanate from the nature of things, and from the essential and eternal relations which subsist among them. True it is that a state of war gives the right to seize and appropriate the property and territories of an enemy. True it is that the colonies of a foreign power are viewed, according to the law of nations, in the light of its property. But, in estimating the propriety of carrying desolation into the peaceful abodes of their neighbors, the people of

New England will not limit their contemplation to the mere circumstance of abstract right, nor ask what lawyers and jurists have written or said, as if this was conclusive upon the subject. That people are much addicted to think for themselves, and, in canvassing the propriety of such an invasion, they will consider the actual condition of those colonies, their natural relations to us, and the effect which their conquest and ruin will have, not only upon the people of those colonies, but upon themselves and their own liberties and Constitution. And above all, what I know will seem strange to some of those who hear me, they will not forget to apply to a case occurring between nations, as far as is practicable, that heaven-descended rule which the great author and founder of their religion has given them for the regulation of their conduct toward each other. They will consider it the duty of these United States to act toward those colonies as they would wish those colonies to act, in exchange of circumstances, toward these United States.

The actual condition of those colonies, and the relation in which they stood to the United States antecedent to the declaration of war, were of this nature. Those colonies had no connection with the questions in dispute between us and their parent state. They had done us no injury. They meditated none to us. Between the inhabitants of those colonies and the citizens of the United States the most friendly and mutually useful intercourse subsisted. The borderers on this, and those on the other side of the St. Lawrence, and of the boundary line, scarcely realized that they were subjects of different governments. They interchanged expressions and acts of civility. Inter-marriages took place among them. The Canadian sometimes settled in the United States; sometimes our citizens emigrated to Canada.

After the declaration of war, had they any disposition to assail us? We have the reverse expressly in evidence. They desired nothing so much as to keep perfect the then subsisting relations of amity. Would the conquest of those colonies shake the policy of the British cabinet? No man has shown it. On the contrary, nothing was more obvious than that an invasion of Canada must strengthen the ministry of Great Britain, by the excitement and sympathy which would be occasioned in the people of that country in consequence of the sufferings of the innocent inhabitants of those colonies, on account of a dispute in which they had no concern, and of which they had scarcely a knowledge. All this was anticipated—all this was frequently urged to this House, at the last and preceding ses-

"Fame is no plant that grows on mortal soil,
Nor in the glistening foil
Set off to the world, nor in broad rumor lies,
But lives and spreads aloft, by those pure eyes,
And perfect witness of all-judging Jove,
As he pronounces lastly on each deed."
May such fame as this be my country's meed!

The army which advances to the walls of Quebec, in the present condition of Canadian preparation, must be veteran. And a veteran army, under a popular leader, flushed with victory, each individual realizing that while the body remains combined he may be something, and possibly very great; that, if dissolved, he sinks into insignificance; will not be disbanded by vote. They will consult with one another, and with their beloved chieftain, upon this subject; and not trouble themselves about the advice of the old people who are knitting and weaving in the chimney corners at Washington. Let the American people receive this as an undoubted truth, which experience will verify. Whoever plants the American standard on the walls of Quebec conquers it for himself, and not for the people of the United States. Whoever lives to see that event—may my head be low in the dust before it happen!—will witness a dynasty established in that country by the sword. He will see a king or an emperor, dukedoms, and earldoms, and baronies, distributed to the officers, and knights' fees bestowed on the soldiery. Such an army will not trouble itself about geographical lines in portioning out the divisions of its new empire; and will run the parallels of its power by other steel than that of the compass. When that event happens the people of New England, if they mean to be free, must have a force equal to defend themselves against such an army. And a military force equal to this object will itself be able to enslave the country.

Mr. Speaker—when I contemplate the character and consequences of this invasion of Canada; when I reflect upon its criminality and its danger to the peace and liberty of this once happy country; I thank the great Author and Source of all virtue that through His grace that section of country in which I have the happiness to reside is, in so great a degree, free from the iniquity of this transgression. I speak it with pride, the people of that section have done what they could to vindicate themselves and their children from the burden of this sin. That whole section has risen, almost as one man, for the purpose of driving from power, by one great constitutional effort,¹ the guilty authors of this war. If they have failed it has not been sions, as the necessary effect of such a measure. The event has justified those predictions. The late elections in Great Britain have terminated in the complete triumph of the friends of the British ministry.

As there was no direct advantage to be hoped from the conquest of Canada, so also there was none incidental. Plunder there was none—at least, none which would pay the cost of the conquest. Glory there was none. Could seven millions of people obtain glory by precipitating themselves upon half a million, and trampling them into the dust? A giant obtain glory by crushing a pigmy? That giant must have a pigmy's spirit who could reap, or hope, glory from such an achievement.

Show any advantage which justifies that dreadful vial of wrath which, if the intention of the American Cabinet had been fulfilled, would, at this day, have been poured out upon the heads of the Canadians. It is not owing to the tender mercies of the American Administration if the bones of the Canadians are not at this hour mingled with the ashes of their habitations. It is easy enough to make an excuse for any purpose. When a victim is destined to be immolated every hedge presents sticks for the sacrifice. The lamb who stands at the mouth of the stream will always trouble the water, if you take the account of the wolf who stands at the source of it. But show a good to us bearing any proportion to the multiplied evils proposed to be visited upon them. There is none. Never was there an invasion of any country worse than this, in point of moral principle, since the invasion of the West Indies by the Buccaneers or that of the United States by Captain Kidd. Indeed, both Kidd and the Buccaneers had more apology for their deed than the American Cabinet. They had at least the hope of plunder; but in this case there is not even the poor refuge of cupidity. We have heard great lamentations about the disgrace of our arms on the frontier. Why, sir, the disgrace of our arms on the frontier² is terrestrial glory in comparison with the disgrace of the attempt. The whole atmosphere rings with the utterance, from the other side of the House, of this word "glory"—"glory" in connection with this invasion. What glory? Is it the glory of the tiger, which lifts his jaws, all foul and bloody, from the bowels of his victim, and roars for his companions of the wood to come and witness his prowess and his spoils? Such is the glory of Genghis Khan and of Bonaparte. Be such glory far, very far, from my country. Never, never may it be accursed with such fame.

through the want of will or of exertion, but in consequence of the weakness of their political power. When in the usual course of Divine Providence, who punishes nations as well as individuals, His destroying angel shall on this account pass over this country—and sooner or later, pass it will—I may be permitted to hope that over New England his hand will be stayed. Our souls are not steeped in the blood which has been shed in this war. The spirits of the unhappy men who have been sent to an untimely audit have borne to the bar of divine justice no accusations against us.

This opinion, concerning the principles of this invasion of Canada, is not peculiar to me. I believe this sentiment is entertained, without distinction of parties, by almost all the moral sense, and nine-tenths of the intelligence, of the whole Northern section of the United States. I know that men from that quarter of the country will tell you differently. Stories of a very different kind are brought by all those who come trooping to Washington for place, appointments, and emoluments; men who will say anything to please the ear, or do anything to please the eye of majesty, for the sake of those fat contracts and gifts which it scatters; men whose fathers, brothers, and cousins are provided for by the departments; whose full-grown children are at suck at the money-distilling breasts of the treasury; the little men who sigh after great offices; those who have judgeships in hand or judgeships in promise; toads that live upon the vapor of the palace, that swallow great men's spittle at the levees; that stare and wonder at all the fine sights which they see there; and most of all wonder at themselves—how they got there to see them. These men will tell you that New England applauds this invasion.

But, Mr. Speaker, look at the elections. What is the language they speak? The present tenant of the chief magistracy rejected, by that whole section of country, with the exception of a single State unanimously. And for whom? In favor of a man² out of the circle of his own State without much influence, and personally almost unknown. In favor of a man against whom the prevailing influence in New England had previously strong political prejudices; and with whom, at the time of giving him their support, they had no political understanding; in favor of a man whose merits, whatever in other respects they might be, were brought into notice, in the first instance, chiefly so far as that election was concerned, by their opinion of the utter want of merit of the man whose reelection they opposed.

I have taken some pains to learn the sentiments which prevail in New England, and particularly among its yeomanry, the pride and the hope of that country. I have conversed with men, resting on their spades and leaning on the handles of their ploughs, while they relaxed for a moment from the labor by which they support their families, and which gives such a hardihood and character to their virtues. They asked—"What do we want of Canada? We have land enough. Do we want plunder? There is not enough of that to pay the cost of getting it. Are our ocean rights there? Or is it there our seamen are held in captivity? Are new States desired? We have plenty of those already. Are they to be held as conquered territories? This will require an army there. Then, to be safe, we must have an army here. And with a standing army what security for our liberties?"

These are no fictitious reasonings. They are the suggestions I doubt not of thousands and tens of thousands of our hardy New England yeomanry; men who, when their country calls, at any wise and real exigency, will start from their native soils and throw their shields over their liberties, like the soldiers of Cadmus, "armed in complete steel"; yet men who have heard the winding of your horn to the Canada campaign with the same apathy and indifference with which they would hear in the streets the trilling of a jewsharp or the twirling of a banjo.

MR. GRUNDY.—At the last session of Congress, when every hope of obtaining justice in any other way was lost, the United States declared war, not to procure a repeal of the Orders in Council only, but to obtain redress for the unjust spoliation which had been committed on the property of American citizens, and to cause Great Britain to cease the practice of impressment. Other causes of irritation existed, but these were the prominent causes of the war. You are now asked to lay down the sword before you have obtained any of the objects of the war, except the abolition of these obnoxious orders. I request gentlemen to reflect whether this is not, in point of fact, an abandonment of the other points in dispute? Do you not, by ceasing to prosecute the war which is already commenced, declare, in the strongest possible terms, that you will not make war for the injuries which remain undressed? Can any man persuade himself that you will obtain that by negotiation for which you have determined you will not fight! and that, too, from a nation at all times disposed to depress this growing country? That politician must have a very imperfect knowledge of the considerations which influence all cabinets who does not know that the strongest inducement which can be brought to operate in favor of an injured nation is the apprehension of retaliation, or fear of war, entertained by the other party.

If you now say that you will not prosecute the war, the enemy must view it as a decision pronounced by this Government that war shall not be waged by the American nation for the impressment of her citizens, or for depredations committed on commerce. It might as well be said in plain, intelligible language that the ocean is to be abandoned by the people of the United States, except so far as depends on the will of Great Britain. If both the property and liberty of American citizens on the ocean are subject to her disposal, you cease to possess the rights of a sovereign and independent nation. For my own part, if we have the right to claim security for the liberty and property of our citizens against that nation, of which no man dare express a doubt, I am far from asserting it until the object is attained, or the ability of this nation fails; of the latter I have no fear.

It is pretended that this Government is not desirous of peace, and that this is a war of conquest and ambition. I beg gentlemen to refrain from making statements which they themselves do not believe. After the declaration of war, what has been the conduct of the Executive? Through Mr. Russell, our chargé des affaires at London, they have offered to conclude an armistice on terms which would remove every pretext for complaint on the part of Great Britain. He proposed that this country should exclude from her service British seamen. It is true that Lord Castlereagh urged Mr. Russell's want of powers, and stated that the American Congress alone could make the necessary provisions on that subject. If, however, sincerity had existed with the British ministry, a temporary arrangement could have been made by which hostilities would have been suspended until the legitimate authorities of this country could have expressed an opinion.

MR. CLAY.—If gentlemen would only reserve for their own government half the sensibility which is indulged for that of Great Britain, they would find much less to condemn. Restriction after restriction has been tried; negotiation has been resorted to until longer to have negotiated would have been disgraceful. While these peaceful experiments are undergoing a trial, what is the conduct of the opposition? They are the champions of war; the proud, the spirited, the sole repository of the nation's honor; the exclusive men of vigor and energy. The Administration, on the contrary, is weak, feeble, and pusillanimous—"incapable of being kicked into a war." The maxim, "not a cent for tribute, millions for defence," is loudly proclaimed. Is the Administration for negotiation? The Opposition is tired, sick, disgusted with negotiation. They want to draw the sword and avenge the nation's wrongs. When, at length, foreign nations, perhaps emboldened by the very opposition here made, refused to listen to the amicable appeals made, and repeated and reiterated by the Administration, to their justice and to their interests; when, in fact, war with one of them became identified with our independence and our sovereignty, and it was no longer possible to abstain from it, behold the opposition become the friends of peace and of commerce. They tell you of the calamities of war; its tragical events; the squandering away of your resources; the waste of the public treasure, and the spilling of innocent blood. They tell you that honor is an illusion! Now we see them exhibiting the terrific forms of the roaring king of the forest! Now the meekness and humility of the lamb! They are for war, and no restrictions, when the Administration is for peace; they are for peace and restrictions when the Administration is for war. You find them, sir, tacking with every gale, displaying the colors of every party, and of all nations, steady only in one unalterable purpose: to steer, if possible, into the haven of power.

During all this time the parasites of opposition do not fail by cunning sarcasm or sly innuendo to throw out the idea of French influence, which is known to be false; which ought to be met in one manner only, and that is by the lie direct. The Administration of this country devoted to foreign influence! The Administration of this country subservient to France! Great God! how is it so influenced? By what ligament, on what basis, on what possible foundation, does it rest? Is it on similarity of language? No! we speak different tongues; we speak the English language. On the resemblance of our laws! No! the sources of our jurisprudence spring from another and a different country. On commercial intercourse? No! we have comparatively none with France. Is it from the correspondence in the genius of the two governments? No! here alone is the liberty of man secure from the inexorable despotism which everywhere else tramples it under foot. Where, then, is the ground of such an influence? But, sir, I am insulting you by arguing on such a subject. Yet, preposterous and ridiculous as the insinuation is, it is propagated with so much industry that there are persons found foolish and credulous enough to believe it. You will, no doubt, think it incredible (but I have nevertheless been told the fact) that an honorable member of this House, now in my eye, recently lost his election by the circulation of a story in his district that he was the first cousin of the Emperor Napoleon. The proof of the charge was rested on a statement of facts which was undoubtedly true. The gentleman in question it was alleged had married a connection of the lady of the President of the United States, who was the intimate friend of Thomas Jefferson, late President of the United States, who, some years ago, was in the habit of wearing red French breeches. Now, taking these premises as established, you, Mr. Chairman, are too good a logician not to see that the conclusion necessarily followed!

Throughout the period he had been speaking of the opposition had been distinguished, amid all its veerings and changes, by another inflexible feature—the application of every vile epithet, which our rich language affords, to Bonaparte. He has been compared to every hideous monster and beast, from that of the Revelations to the most insignificant quadruped. He has been called the scourge of mankind, the destroyer of Europe, the great robber, the infidel, and—Heaven knows by what other names. Really, gentlemen remind me of an obscure lady in a city, not very far off, who also took it into her head, in conversation with an accomplished French gentleman, to talk of the affairs of Europe. She, too, spoke of the destruction of the balance of power, stormed and raged about the insatiable ambition of the emperor; called him the curse of mankind—the destroyer of Europe. The Frenchman listened to her with perfect patience, and, when she had ceased, said to her, with ineffable politeness: "Madam, it would give my master, the emperor, infinite pain if he knew how hardly you thought of him."

Sir, gentlemen appear to me to forget that they stand on American soil; that they are not in the British House of Commons, but in the Chamber of the House of Representatives of the United States; that we have nothing to do with the affairs of Europe—the partition of territory and sovereignty there—except in so far as these things affect the interests of our own country. Gentlemen transform themselves into the Burkes, Chathams, and Pitts, of another country, and forgetting, from honest zeal, the interests of America, engage, with European sensibility, in the discussion of European interests. If gentlemen ask me if I do not view with regret and sorrow the concentration of such vast power in the hands of Bonaparte, I reply that I do. I regret to see the Emperor of China holding such immense sway over the fortunes of millions of our species. I regret to see Great Britain possessing so uncontrolled a command over all the waters of our globe. And if I had the ability to distribute among the nations of Europe their several portions of power and of sovereignty, I would say that Holland should be resuscitated and given the weight she enjoyed in the days of her De Witts. I would confine France within her natural boundaries—the Alps, the Pyrenees, and the Rhine—and make her a secondary naval power only. I would abridge the British maritime power, raise Prussia and Austria to first-rate powers, and preserve the integrity of the Empire of Russia. But these are speculations. I look at the political transactions of Europe, with the single exception of their possible bearing upon us, as I do at the history of other countries or other times. I do not survey them with half the interest that I do the movements in South America. Our political relation is much less important than it is supposed to be. I have no fears of French or English subjugation. If we are united we are too powerful for the mightiest nation in Europe, or all Europe combined. If we are separated, and torn asunder, we shall become an easy prey to the weakest of them. In the latter dreadful contingency our country will not be worth preserving.

In one respect there is a remarkable difference between Administration and the Opposition—it is in a sacred regard for personal liberty. When out of power, my political friends opposed the violation of the freedom of the press, in the sedition law; they opposed the more insidious attack upon the freedom of the person, under the imposing garb of an alien law. The party now in opposition, then in power, passed those two laws. True to our principles, we are now struggling for the liberty of our seamen against foreign oppression. True to theirs, they oppose the war for this object. They have indeed lately affected tender solicitude for the liberties of the people, and talk of the danger of standing armies, and the burden of taxes. But it is evident to you, Mr. Chairman, that they speak in a foreign idiom. Their brogue betrays that it is not their vernacular tongue. What! the opposition, who in 1798 and 1799 could raise a useless army to fight an enemy three thousand miles distant from us, alarmed at the existence of one raised for a known specified object—the attack of the adjoining provinces of the enemy? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Quincy], who assisted by his vote to raise the army of twenty-five thousand, alarmed at the danger of our liberties from this very army!

I mean to speak of another subject which I never think of but with the most awful considerations. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Quincy] has entertained us with cabinet plots, presidential plots, which are conjured up in the gentleman's own perturbed imagination. I wish, sir, that another plot of a much more serious kind—a plot that aims at the dismemberment of our Union—had only the same imaginary existence. But no man who had paid any attention to the tone of certain prints, and to transactions in a particular quarter of the Union for several years past, can doubt the existence of such a plot. The project is not brought forward openly, with a direct avowal of the intention. No, the stock of good sense and patriotism in that portion of the country is too great to be undisguisedly encountered. It is assailed from the masked batteries of friendship to peace and commerce on the one side, and by the groundless imputation of opposite propensities on the other. The affections of the people are to be gradually undermined. The project is suggested or withdrawn; the diabolical parties in this criminal tragedy make their appearance or exit as the audience to whom they address themselves are silent, applaud, or hiss.

The war was declared because Great Britain arrogated to herself the pretension of regulating foreign trade, under the delusive name of retaliatory Orders in Council—a pretension by which she undertook to proclaim to American enterprise, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther." Orders which she refused to revoke after the alleged cause of their enactment had ceased; because she persisted in the act of impressing American seamen; because she had instigated the Indians to commit hostilities against us; and because she refused indemnity for her past injuries upon our commerce. I throw out of the question other wrongs. The war in fact was announced, on our part, to meet the war which she was waging on her part. So undeniable were the causes of the war; so powerfully did they address themselves to the feelings of the whole American people, that when the bill was pending before this House gentlemen in the opposition, although provoked to debate, would not, or could not, utter one syllable against it.

I am far from acknowledging that had the Orders in Council been repealed, as they have been, before the war was declared, the declaration would have been prevented. In a body so numerous as this, from which the declaration emanated, it is impossible to say with any degree of certainty what would have been the effect of such a repeal. Each member must answer for himself. I have no hesitation, then, in saying that I have always considered the impressment of American seamen as much the most serious aggression. But, sir, how have those Orders at last been repealed? Great Britain, it is true, has intimated a willingness to suspend their practical operation, but she still arrogates to herself the right to revive them upon certain contingencies, of which she constitutes herself the sole judge. She waives the temporary use of the rod, but she suspends it in terrorem over our heads. Supposing it was conceded to gentlemen than such a repeal of the Orders in Council as took place on the 23d of June last, exceptionable as it is, being known before the war, would have prevented the war, does it follow that it ought to induce us to lay down our arms without the redress of any other injury? Does it follow, in all cases, that that which would have prevented the war in the first instance should terminate the war? By no means. It requires a great struggle for a nation prone to peace as this is to burst through its habits and encounter the difficulties of war. Such a nation ought but seldom to go to war. When it does it should be for clear and essential rights alone, and it should firmly resolve to extort, at all hazards, their recognition. The war of the Revolution is an example of a war begun for one object and prosecuted for another. It was waged in its commencement against the right asserted by the parent country to tax the colonies. Then no one thought of absolute independence. The idea of independence was repelled. But the British Government would have relinquished the principle of taxation. The founders of our liberties saw, however, that there was no security short of independence, and they achieved our independence. When nations are engaged in war those rights in controversy, which are acknowledged by the treaty of peace, are abandoned. And who is prepared to say that American seamen shall be surrendered, the victims to the British principle of impressment? And, sir, what is this principle? She contends that she has a right to the services of her own subjects: that, in the exercise of this right, she may lawfully impress them, even although she finds them in our vessels, upon the high seas, without her jurisdiction. Now, I deny that she has any right, without her jurisdiction, to come on board our vessels on the high seas, for any other purpose but in pursuit of enemies, or their goods, or goods contraband of war. But she further contends that her subjects cannot renounce their allegiance to her and contract a new obligation to other sovereigns. I do not mean to go into the general question of the right of expatriation. If, as is contended, all nations deny it, all nations at the same time admit and practice the right of naturalization. Great Britain, in the very case of foreign seamen, imposes perhaps fewer restraints upon naturalization than any other nation. Then, if subjects cannot break their original allegiance, they may, according to universal usage, contract a new allegiance. What is the effect of this double obligation? Undoubtedly, that the sovereign having possession of the subject would have a right to the services of the subject. If he return within the jurisdiction of his primitive sovereign he may resume his right to his services, of which the subject by his own act could not divest himself. But his primitive sovereign can have no right to go in quest of him, out of his own jurisdiction into the jurisdiction of another sovereign, or upon the high seas, where there exists either no jurisdiction, or it belongs to the nation owning the ship navigating them. But, sir, this discussion is altogether useless. It is not to the British principle, objectionable as it is, that we are alone to look; it is to her practice—no matter what guise she puts on. It is in vain to assert the inviolability of the obligation of allegiance. It is in vain to set up the plea of necessity, and to allege that she cannot exist without the impressment of her seamen. The truth is, she comes, by her press gangs, on board of our vessels, seizes our native seamen, as well as naturalized, and drags them into her service. It is the case, then, of the assertion of an erroneous principle, and a practice not conformable to the principle—a principle which, if it were theoretically right, must be forever practically wrong. If Great Britain desires a mark by which she can know her own subjects, let her give them an ear mark. The colors that float from the mast head should be the credentials of our seamen. There is no safety to us, and the gentlemen have shown it, but in the rule that all who sail under the flag (not being enemies) are protected by the flag. It is impossible that this country should ever abandon the gallant tars who have won for us such splendid trophies. Let me suppose that the Genius of Columbia should visit one of them in his oppressor's prison and attempt to reconcile him to his wretched condition. She would say to him, in the language of the gentlemen on the other side, "Great Britain intends you no harm; she did not mean to impress you, but one of her own subjects; having taken you by mistake, I will remonstrate, and try to prevail upon her by peaceable means to release you, but I cannot, my son, fight for you." If he did not consider this mockery he would address her judgment, and say, "You owe me, my country, protection; I owe you in return obedience. I am no British subject, I am a native of old Massachusetts, where live my aged father, my wife, and my children. I have faithfully discharged my duty. Will you refuse to do yours?" Appealing to her passions, he would continue, "I lost this eye in fighting under Truxton with the Insurgent; I got this scar before Tripoli; I broke this leg on board the Constitution when the Guerrière struck."

I will not imagine the dreadful catastrophe to which he would be driven by an abandonment of him to his oppressor. It will not be, it cannot be, that his country will refuse him protection!

The honorable gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Pearson] supposes that if Congress would pass a law prohibiting the employment of British seamen in our service, upon condition of a like prohibition on their part, and repeal the act of non-importation, peace would immediately follow. Sir, I have no doubt if such a law were passed, with all the requisite solemnities, and the repeal to take place, Lord Castlereagh would laugh at our simplicity. No, sir, Administration has erred in the steps which it has taken to restore peace, but its error has been not in doing too little, but in betraying too great a solicitude for that event. An honorable peace is attainable only by an efficient war. My plan would be to call out the ample resources of the country, give them a judicious direction, prosecute the war with the utmost vigor, strike wherever we can reach the enemy, at sea or on land, and negotiate the terms of a peace at Quebec or Halifax. We are told that England is a proud and lofty nation that, disdaining to wait for danger, meets it half-way. Haughty as she is, we once triumphed over her, and if we do not listen to the counsels of timidity and despair we shall again prevail. In such a cause, with the aid of Providence, we must come out crowned with success; but, if we fail, let us fail like men—lash ourselves to our gallant tars, and expire together in one common struggle, fighting for "seamen's rights and free trade."

Mr. Randolph rose, apparently laboring under the effects of a serious indisposition, and addressed the Chair.

The war in Europe brought to this country, among other birds of passage, a ravenous flock of neutralized carriers, which interposed the flag of neutrality, not only between the property, but even between the persons of the two belligerent powers; and it was their clamor principally, aided by the representations of those of our merchants who saw and wished to participate in the gains of such a commerce, that the first step was taken in that policy of restriction which it was then foreseen would lead to the disastrous condition in which we now find ourselves. Yes, it was then foreseen and foretold. What was then prophesied is now history. It is so. "You," said the prophet, "are prospering beyond all human example. You, favorites of Almighty God, while all the rest of the world are scourged, and ravaged, and desolated by war, are about to enter into a policy called preventive of war; a policy which comes into this House in the garb of peace, but which must end in war." And in war it has ended. Yes, sir, we have been tortured, fretted, goaded, until at last, like some poor man driven from his family by discord at home, who says to himself, "anything, even exile, is better than this," we have said that we will take war; we will take anything for a change. And, when war came, what said the people? They said, "anything for a change!"

Regardless of every consequence, we went into war with England as an inconsiderate couple go into matrimony, without considering whether they have the means of sustaining their own existence, much less that of any unfortunate progeny that should happen to be born of them. The sacrifice was made. The blood of Christians enjoying the privileges of jury trial, of the writ of habeas corpus, of the freedom of conscience, of the blessings of civil liberty, citizens of the last republic that ambition has left upon the face of a desolate earth—the blood of such a people was poured out as an atonement to the Moloch of France. The Juggernaut of India is said to smile when it sees the blood flow from the human sacrifice which its worship exacts; the Emperor of France might now smile upon us. But, no, sir, our miserable offering is spurned. The French monarch turns his nose and his eyes another way. He snuffs on the plains of Moscow a thousand hecatombs, waiting to be sacrificed on the shrine of his ambition; and the city of the Czars, the largest in the world, is to be at once the altar and the fire of sacrifice to his miserable ambition. And what injury has the Emperor of Russia done to him? For what was he contending? For national existence; for a bare existence; for himself and the people who are subject to his sway. And what, sir, are you doing? Virtually fighting the battles of his foes; surrendering yourself to the views of his adversary, without a plea—without anything to justify your becoming the victims of his blasting ambition.

Yes, sir, after having for years attempted to drive us by menace into war with England, when he has seen us fairly embarked in it, and the champions of human rights bleeding in his cause, the ruler of France has turned with contempt from your reclamations. Is there anything yet wanting to fill up the full measure of injustice you have sustained? Gentlemen on all sides are obliged to admit that the provocation which we have received from France is ample; that the cup of it is overflowing. And yet, what is our situation in relation to that destroyer of mankind—him who, devising death to all that live, sits like a cormorant on the tree of life; who cannot be glutted, nor tired, with human carnage; the impersonation of death; himself an incarnate death? At this moment, when it is well known that it would not require one additional man in the army or navy to make good, in the eye of nations, your character as an independent and high-spirited people, you are prostrate at the feet of your's and the world's undoer.

A word, now, on the subject of impressment. Our foreign trade had grown beyond the capacity of either our tonnage or seamen to manage. Our mercantile marine was an infant Hercules; but it was overloaded beyond its strength: the crop was too abundant to be gathered by our hands alone. The consequence was, and a natural one, too, that not only the capitalists flocked into our country from abroad to share in our growing commerce, but the policy also of our Government was adapted to it, and a law was passed to enable us to avail ourselves of the services of British seamen and seamen of other countries. And, in doing this, we availed ourselves of the pretext—which, as long as the countries to which they belonged winked at it, was fair for us to use—of taking these British seamen for Americans. It was in 1796 that commenced the act to which reference has been made, and that system of "protections," as they were called, the very mention of which, at this day, causes a burst of honest indignation in the breast of citizens whose situation enables them to ascertain their true character. If these "protections," so termed, have not been forged all over Europe, it is only for the reason that the notes of a certain bank of which I have heard have not been forged, viz: that, the bank being broke, its notes were so worthless that people would not even steal them. The "protections" are attainable by everybody; by men of all ages, countries, and descriptions. They are a mere farce. The issuing of them has gone far to disgrace the character of the country, and has brought into question and jeopardy the rights of real American citizens. Sir, there is a wide difference between the character of American seamen and seamen of every other country on earth. The American seaman has a home on the land, a domicile, a wife and children, to whom he is attached, to whom he is in the habit of returning after his voyages; with whom he spends, sometimes, a long vacation from the toils of maritime life. It is not so with the seamen of other countries. For the protection of men of the first description I am disposed, if necessary, to use the force of the country, but for no other. I know, indeed, that some gentlemen who have spoken much on the subject of the principle of impressment will tell you that the right to take from a neutral vessel one seaman, if carried to its extent, involves a right to take any or all seamen. Why, sir, in like manner, it might be argued that the taking illegally of one vessel at sea involves the right to take every vessel. And yet, sir, who ever heard of two nations going to war about a single case of capture, though admitted not to be justified by the laws? Such a case never did and never will occur.

Of one thing we are certain: it rests upon no doubtful ground: that Great Britain, rather than surrender the right of impressing her own seamen, will nail her colors to the mast, and go down with them. And she is right, because, when she does surrender it, she is Samson shorn of his strength: the sinews of her power are cut. The right of Great Britain to take her own seamen from your merchant vessels (if it be a right) is one which she has exercised ever since you were a people, wherever occasions for its exercise have occurred. Will you not only go to war, but wage a bellum ad internecinum for it? Will you wage an endless war of extermination for this right which, you have known for two and twenty years of your national existence, she will not relinquish?

But it may be said that the right of search cannot be endured; that the protection of our flag must be held inviolate; that if a search of our ships be permitted for British seamen they may actually take American seamen. Sir, there is no doubt of the fact that by mistake, sometimes perhaps by wilful misconduct, on the part of officers engaged in the search, such a thing may happen. But, should we not think it exceedingly strange that the misconduct of an officer of the American Government, in one case in twenty if you will, should be a cause of war for any nation against us? It is one of those cases which does occur, and will forever occur, to a neutral power, whenever a general war is lighted up. It is one of the prices which this country has to pay for its rapid accession of wealth, such as is unheard of in the annals of any other nation but our own. And this, sir, is the state of things in which we have undertaken, in children's language, to quarrel with our bread and butter; and to identify ourselves with one of the belligerents in a war in which we have no proper concern.

The right of search has been acknowledged by all nations. The President of the United States and his Secretary of State, as great masters of the law of nations, will be among the first to acknowledge it; they have acknowledged it, and by our treaties with foreign powers this country has heretofore acknowledged it, so far as concerns the right to search for contraband goods and enemy's property. There is no doubt that, under the color of the right of search—for I am advocating its lawful purposes only—abuses have been committed on neutrals; and as long as men exist it will be so. The liability to abuse of this right is the price which neutrals pay for the advantages which they derive from their neutrality; and I should like to know whether it would be for me to join in the contest in which these belligerents are engaged for the recovery of my neutral rights. Where are those rights when great maritime powers become belligerent? There are neutral rights undoubtedly, but there are also neutral duties. And shall a neutral nation, a nation which has in that character prospered and flourished more than any people on the face of the globe.

necticut and Massachusetts had refused to contribute their quotas of militia for the service of the United States, characterizing the requisitions of Congress as unconstitutional.

In reference to this refusal President Madison, in his message to Congress on November 4, 1812, said:

This refusal is founded on a novel and unfortunate exposition of the provisions of the Constitution relating to the militia. It is obvious that if the authority of the United States to call into service and command the militia for the public defence can be thus frustrated, even in a state of declared war, and of course under apprehensions of invasion preceding war, they are not one nation for the purpose most of all requiring it; and that the public safety may have no other resource than in those large and permanent military establishments which are forbidden by the principles of our free Government, and against the necessity of which the militia were meant to be a constitutional bulwark.

Among the many New England statesmen antagonistic to the war was Daniel Webster, elected to the House of Representatives from New Hampshire in 1812. Before the close of his term he assumed the position of leader of the anti-war faction.

On January 14, 1814, in the course of a debate on a bill for the encouragement of enlistments, he attacked the Administration for its un-American policy of conducting an offensive war (i. e., for the conquest of Canada) instead of a defensive war (i. e., on the sea). He was replied to on the following day by John C. Calhoun of South Carolina.

OFFENSIVE VS. DEFENSIVE WAR

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 14-15, 1814

MR. WEBSTER.—You have prosecuted this invasion [of Canada] for two campaigns. They have cost you vastly more, upon the average, than the campaigns of the Revolutionary war. The project has already cost the American people nearly half as much as the whole price paid for independence. The result is before us. Who does not see and feel that this result disgraces us? Who does not see in what estimation our martial prowess sacrifice those rights and those advantages, and resort to war against one of those belligerents—and for what? For a point of honor! Yet, while in this Quixotic spirit, we have gone to war with England; although we have been robbed, reviled, contemned throughout by the Emperor of France, we can see no cause of war with him!

What shall we say of the French doctrine in relation to this subject of impressment? That all who spoke the English language should be treated as Englishmen, unless they could give proof to the contrary; the onus probandi lying on those who spoke the language of Locke, and Newton, and Milton, and Shakespeare. Yes, sir, while the English Government establishes no such doctrine, the French Government acts upon the principle that speaking the English language is prima facie evidence of your being a British subject, and would justify their treating you as an enemy, the burden of the proof to the contrary being thrown upon yourself.

Is it fitting that the only two nations among whom the worship of the true God has been maintained with anything like truth and freedom from corruption; that the only two nations among whom this worship has been preserved unstained shall be the two now arrayed against each other in hostile arms in a conflict in which, let who will conquer in the fight, his success in one point, if that be an object, will have been attained: so much of human life, liberty, and happiness will have perished in the affray—in the service of this scourge with which it has pleased God, in his wisdom and justice, not in his mercy, to inflict mankind? Is it fitting that those hands which unite in giving to idolaters and to the heathen the Word of God, the Book of Life—that those hands, and those alone, should be thus drenched in each other's blood? Will you unite as a Christian with your Protestant brother across the Atlantic for these noble purposes, and then plunge the dagger into his breast with whom you are associated in a cause so holy—one so infinitely transcending the low, the little, the dirty business we are called upon here to transact? I hope that the sacrifice may be stopped. Let us join in the worship of the true and living God, instead of spilling the blood of His people on the abominable altar of the French Moloch.

NEW ENGLAND'S OPPOSITION TO THE WAR

From the first outbreak of hostilities with Great Britain the center of opposition to the war had been New England. Indeed, the State governments of Con-must be by this time holden by the enemy and by the world? Administration has made its master effort to subdue a province three thousand miles removed from the mother country; scarcely equal in natural strength to the least of the States of this confederacy, and defended by external aid to a limited extent. It has persisted two campaigns, and it has failed. Let the responsibility rest where it ought. The world will not ascribe the issue to want of spirit or patriotism in the American people. The possession of those qualities, in high and honorable degrees, they have heretofore illustriously evinced, and spread out proof on the record of their Revolution. They will be still true to their character, in any cause which they feel to be their own. In all causes they will defend themselves. The enemy, as we have seen, can make no permanent stand in any populous part of the country. Its citizens will drive back his forces to the line. But at that line, at the point where defence ceases and invasion begins, they stop. They do not pass it because they do not choose to pass it. Offering no serious obstacle to their actual power, it rises, like a Chinese wall, against their sentiments and their feelings.

It is natural, sir, such being my opinion, on the present state of things, that I should be asked what, in my judgment, ought to be done. In the first place, then, I answer, withdraw your invading armies and follow counsels which the national sentiment will support. In the next place, abandon the system of commercial restriction. That system is equally ruinous to the interests and obnoxious to the feelings of whole sections and whole States. They believe you have no constitutional right to establish such systems. They protest to you that such is not, and never was, their understanding of your powers. They are sincere in this opinion, and it is of infinite moment that you duly respect that opinion, although you may deem it to be erroneous. These people, sir, resisted Great Britain, because her minister, under pretence of regulating trade, attempted to put his hand into their pockets and take their money. There is that, sir, which they then valued, and which they still value, more than money. That pretence of regulating trade they believed to be a mere cover for tyranny and oppression. The present embargo, which does not vex and harass and embarrass their commerce, but annihilates it, is also laid by color of a power to regulate trade. For if it be not laid by virtue of this power, it is laid by virtue of no power. It is not wonderful, sir, if this should be viewed by them as a state of things not contemplated when they came into the national compact.

The humble aid which it would be in my power to render to measures of Government shall be given cheerfully if Government will pursue measures which I can conscientiously support. Badly as I think of the original grounds of the war, as well as of the manner in which it has been hitherto conducted, if even now, failing in an honest and sincere attempt to procure just and honorable peace, it will return to measures of defence and protection, such as reason and common sense and the public opinion all call for, my vote shall not be withheld from the means. Give up your futile projects of invasion. Extinguish the fires that blaze on your inland frontiers. Establish perfect safety and defence there, by adequate force. Let every man that sleeps on your soil sleep in security. Stop the blood that flows from the veins of unarmed yeomanry and women and children. Give to the living time to bury and lament their dead, in the quietness of private sorrow.

Having performed this work of beneficence and mercy on your inland border, turn, and look with the eye of justice and compassion on your vast population along the coast. Unclench the iron grasp of your embargo. Take measures for that end before another sun sets upon you. With all the war of the enemy on your commerce, if you would cease to war on it yourselves you would still have some commerce. That commerce would give you some revenue. Apply that revenue to the augmentation of your navy. That navy, in turn, will protect your commerce. Let it no longer be said that not one ship of force, built by your hands since the war, yet floats upon the ocean. Turn the current of your efforts into the channel which national sentiment has already worn broad and deep to receive it. A naval force, competent to defend your coast against considerable armaments, to convoy your trade, and perhaps raise the blockade of your rivers, is not a chimera. It may be realized. If, then, the war must be continued, go to the ocean. If you are seriously contending for maritime rights go to the theater where alone those rights can be defended. Thither every indication of your fortune points you. There the united wishes and exertions of the nation will go with you. Even our party divisions, acrimonious as they are, cease at the water's edge. They are lost in attachment to national character on the element where that character is made respectable. In protecting naval interests by naval means you will arm yourselves with the whole power of national sentiment, and may command the whole abundance of the national resources. In time you may enable yourselves to redress injuries, in the place where they may be offered, and, tween an offensive and defensive war is of the moral kind; and the American sense of justice accounts for their feelings. Their exemption from ambition and love of justice preserve them from the former, while their manly spirit and good sense will always make them cheerfully meet the other whenever it becomes necessary. What, then, is the character of the war in which we are now engaged? Was it dictated by avarice or love of conquest? I appeal to our opponents for a decision. They have already decided. When the resolutions of the gentleman from New Hampshire were under discussion, at the last session, it was repeated till the ear was fatigued by every one on that side of the House who took any part in the debate that if the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees had been communicated in time to the British Government the Orders in Council would have been repealed; and, had the last even happened, the war would not have been declared. They then have acknowledged that the Orders in Council, and not the conquest of Canada, as they now pretend, was the cause of the war; and it would be idle to inquire whether to resist them is in its nature offensive or defensive. It would be to inquire whether they are or are not an injury to our commerce; a point I have never heard denied by the most obstinate debater. It would be equally so to examine whether the cause of continuing the war, to prevent our seamen from impressment, is of an offensive or defensive character.

Very few have the hardihood to deny that it is an injury of the most serious kind, both as it regards the Government and the unhappy subjects of its operations. It involves the most sacred obligation which can bind the body politic to the citizen; I mean that of protection, due alike to all; to the beggar in the street—much more, if susceptible of degrees, to our sailors, that class of the community who have added so much to the wealth and renown of this country. Having thus established the character of the war in its origin and continuance, I would lay down as a rule not less clear that a defensive war does not become offensive by being carried beyond the limits of our territory. The motive and cause will ever give character; all the rest are mere essential incidents. When once declared, the only question, even in a defensive war, is how can it be carried on with the greatest effect. The reverse of this involves the most glaring absurdity. It supposes that we had determined to compel our enemy to respect our rights; and at the same time voluntarily renounced what is acknowledged to be the best and most effectual mode of producing that effect. On this point, as well as the if need be, to accompany your own flag throughout the world with the protection of your own cannon.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Gentlemen contend that this is not a defensive but an offensive war; and under that character undertake its denunciation, without ever condescending to state what in their opinion constitutes the characteristic difference between them. The people of this country have an aversion to an offensive war; which I suppose interprets the meaning of the vehemence of the Opposition on this subject; while they readily acknowledge the possible necessity and justice of one that is defensive. It is therefore proper that our ideas on this point should be fixed with precision and certainty. I would lay it down as a universal criterion that a war is offensive or defensive, not by the mode of carrying it on, which is an immaterial circumstance, but by the motive and cause which led to it. If it has its origin in ambition, avarice, or any of the like passions, then is it offensive; but if, on the contrary, to repel insult, injury, or oppression, it is of an opposite character, and is defensive. In the view which I have presented the difference because of the war, the opinion of our opponents may be arrayed against themselves. What have they advised as to the mode of carrying on the war? Withdraw your troops from Canada, reduce your army, and limit your operations to the ocean. What! to the ocean? Carry the war beyond our own territory! make it offensive! The gentlemen surely do not intend to support an offensive war. To use their own language, it is too immoral for a virtuous and religious people. It is then admitted that it does not cease to be offensive by its being waged at sea; how, then, can the carrying it into Canada change its character?

It now remains to consider the defence which gentlemen have made for their opposition to the war and the policy of their country; a subject which I conceive is of the greatest importance, not only as affecting the result of the present contest, but the lasting peace and prosperity of our country. They assume as a fact that opposition is in its nature harmless; and that the calamities which have afflicted free States have originated in the blunders and folly of the Government, and not from the perverseness of opposition. Opposition simply implies contrariety of opinion; and, when used in the abstract, it admits neither censure nor praise. It cannot be said to be either good or bad; useful or pernicious. It is not from itself, but from the connected circumstances, that it derives its character. When it is simply the result of that diversity in the structure of our intellect which conduces to different conclusions on the same subject, and is confined within those bounds which love of country and political honesty prescribe, it is one of the most useful guardians of liberty. It excites gentle collision, prompts to due vigilance, a quality so indispensable, and at the same time so opposite to our nature, and results in the establishment of an enlightened policy and useful laws. Such are its qualities when united with patriotism and moderation. But in many instances it assumes a far different character. Combined with faction and ambition it bursts those limits within which it may usefully act, and becomes the first of political evils. If, sir, the gentlemen on the other side of the House intend to include this last species of opposition, as I am warranted to infer from their expression, when they spoke of its harmless character, then have they made an assertion in direct contradiction to reason, experience, and all history. A factious opposition is compounded of such elements that no reflecting man will ever consider it as harmless. The fiercest and most ungovernable passions of our nature, ambition, pride, rivalry, and hate, enter into its dangerous composition—made still more so by its power of delusion, by which its projects against government are covered in most instances, even to the eyes of its victims, by the specious show of patriotism. Thus constituted, who can estimate its force? Where can benevolent and social feelings be found sufficiently strong to counteract its progress? Is love of country? Alas! the attachment to a party becomes stronger than that to our country. A factious opposition sickens at the sight of the prosperity and success of the country. Common adversity is its life; general prosperity its death. Nor is it only over our virtuous sentiments that this bane of freedom triumphs. Even the selfish passions of our nature, planted in our bosom for our individual safety, afford no obstacle to its progress. It is this opposition which gentlemen call harmless, and treat with so much respect; it is this moral treason which has in all ages and countries ever proved the most deadly foe to freedom.

Nor is it then only dangerous, when it breaks forth into open treason and rebellion. Without resort to violence it is capable in a thousand ways to counteract and deaden all the motions of Government; to render its policy wavering, and to compel it to submit to schemes of aggrandizement on the part of other governments; or, if resistance is determined on, to render it feeble and ineffectual. Do gentlemen ask for instances? Unhappily, they are but too numerous. Where shall they not be found? Admired and lamented republics of antiquity!—Athens, Carthage, and Rome—you are the victims and witnesses of the fell spirit of factious opposition. Fatal fields of Zama and Cheroinea! you can attest its destructive cruelty. What is the history of Polybius, and that of the other historians of the free states of antiquity? What the political speeches of Cicero, and the orations of Demosthenes, those models of eloquence and wisdom, but volumes of evidence, attesting that an opposition founded in faction, unrestrained by moderation and a regard to the general welfare, is the most dangerous of political evils. Nor does antiquity alone testify. The history of modern times is pregnant with examples. What, I would ask, have become of the free states of modern Italy, which once flourished in wealth and power—Florence, Genoa, Venice, and many others? What of the United Provinces and Switzerland? Gone; perished under the deadly feuds of opposition. Even England, with her deep-rooted and powerful executive, has not been free from its pernicious effect. What arrested the war of Marlborough, when France was so humbled that, had it been continued, Europe might have been free from the danger which she has experienced from that power? What stayed the conquering hand of Chatham, when before his genius and power the throne of the Bourbons trembled to its center? The spirit of factious opposition, that common cause of calamity, that without which liberty might be eternal, and free states irresistible.

THE HARTFORD CONVENTION

In the congressional elections in the autumn of 1814 the opponents of the war elected all the representatives from New England except three. Emboldened thereby the Massachusetts legislature, on October 18, 1814, proposed a convention of the New England States "to lay the foundation of a radical reform in the national compact by inviting to a future convention a deputation from all the other States in the Union."

Agreeably to this proposition delegates from Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and the Federalist counties of New Hampshire and Vermont met at Hartford, Conn., on December 15, 1814. In this convention, which deliberated for three weeks, a report to the legislatures and counties represented was adopted, in which a number of constitutional amendments were proposed; but news of the signing of a treaty of peace with Great Britain was received before any of the recommendations could be acted upon.

[For a discussion of the Hartford convention in its bearing upon the question of secession, see Volume V, Chapter I.]

APPOINTMENT OF PEACE COMMISSIONERS

Early in 1813 the Emperor of Russia offered himself as a mediator in order to facilitate peace between Great Britain and the United States. At the opening of Congress in May, 1813, the President announced that he had appointed James A. Bayard, Henry Clay, and Albert Gallatin as envoys extraordinary to act with John Quincy Adams, minister to Russia, and Jonathan Russell, chargé des affaires of the United States at London, as peace commissioners.

The British Government, on one pretext or another, delayed appointing commissioners to negotiate with the American envoys. Indeed it was not until the summer of 1814 that the British commissioners, Lord Gambier, Henry Goulburn, and William Adams, were appointed. On August 6 the commissioners of both countries met at Ghent, in Belgium, and proceeded to their negotiations, which terminated on December 24, 1814, with the signing of the treaty.

The delay had been profitable to Great Britain. The failure of the military policy of the American Government, the great expense of the war, and the rapidly increasing strength of the opposition made it imperative that peace should be secured as quickly as possible, and, if necessary, at a sacrifice, even of principles. Hence, even before the commissioners met at Ghent, the American Government had instructed its representatives to omit, at their discretion, any stipulation on the subject of impressment which appeared likely to be the point of irreconcilable difference.

The American commissioners therefore, after contending for as long as it seemed wise for the assertion of "sailors' rights," for the maintenance of which the war had really been fought, at last agreed to accept Great Britain's relinquishment of the practice (now that there was peace in Europe) in lieu of her humiliating recantation of the principle. The question of neutral rights also was not pressed by the American commissioners for the same reason.

The main provisions of the treaty were:

1. Restoration to its former ownership of territory captured by either party.
2. Settlement of disputed territory, and establishment of boundary by joint commissions.
3. Suppression by the earnest efforts of both parties of the slave trade, as being a practice "irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice."

Although the objects for which the United States had begun the war were not mentioned in the treaty, they were practically secured by the contest. Thereafter, knowing that such actions would result in war, Great Britain did not attempt to enforce against this country her peculiar construction of neutral rights, the right of search, and the impressment of sailors.

son [La.] and John Floyd [Va.] also spoke in favor of the motion. On March 27 the resolution for prudential reasons was negatived by a vote of 115 to 45.

DURING the first quarter of the nineteenth century there occurred a general revolt under the leadership of General Simon Bolivar against Spanish rule throughout Latin America. Among the first of the former colonies of Spain to establish a fairly stable government under the republican form were the provinces of the River Plata. The question arose in Congress as to the recognition of these governments. The Spanish minister, Señor Onís, opposed this action. On March 24, 1818, Henry Clay [Ky.] proposed in the House of Representatives to appropriate money to send a minister to Buenos Aires, and on the next day supported his resolution by a speech. GREAT AMERICAN DEBATES vantages to our country, however great and certain they may be, as of so much importance as the political and moral effects growing out of a liberal and manly policy toward the South American people. It will have a tendency to give us confidence in the firmness and virtue of Government—it will prove that it is not forgetful of the high character which belongs to us as a powerful and free people—that the reputation we have acquired, at the expense of so much blood and treasure is not to be sacrificed by timidity, or an undue spirit of accommodation toward the monarchs of Europe—that we will do what our principles require, in spite of imaginary terrors, artfully excited by the enemies of freedom—in fine, that, cautious of giving just cause of offence, we will pursue the path of fidelity and honor in defiance of the views and wishes of those whose political institutions make them necessarily hostile to human happiness and human rights—that we dare at least do what we are sustained in by right and truth in favor of the liberties of mankind without being deterred by those who promote, with unhallowed violence, at the expense of every sacred obligation, the dogmas of priest-craft and the doctrines of despotism. And, if we are asked by the officious and intermeddling representatives of kings why it is that we not only feel but manifest sympathy for a people struggling to be free, let us refer them to their own unholy combinations, in support of the execrable principles of their government—let us tell them of their wars for thirty years past against liberty—that if the safety of monarchies in Europe depends on the annihilation of republics, the security of a republic in America will not be injured by other republics growing up by its side.

Mr. FLOYD.—The grand object and advantage of establishing an independent policy for America would be that we might be disenthralled—that we might not feel the effects of that political plexus which has so entangled the nations of Europe, by producing those intimate connections and combinations by which the movements and operations of one power are so felt by all as to influence their councils and produce corresponding motions. When now we negotiate, it is in Europe; when we are inconvenienced here, we send off an ambassador there; they are governed by the principles and policy of continental Europe, and not by anything here. Do difficulties arise in Canada, they are adjusted in London. Do the same difficulties arise in Mexico, the province of Texas, or in Florida, they are settled in Madrid. Thus are we compelled to negotiate all our affairs upon the basis of European policy, because even the best interests of the colonists must give way to the policy of the mother country.

We are the natural head of the American family. I would not intermeddle in the affairs of Europe. We wisely keep aloof from their broils. I would not even intermeddle in those of other parts of America farther than to exert the incontestable rights appertaining to us as a free, sovereign, and independent power; and, I contend, the accrediting of a Minister from the new Republic is such a right. We are bound to receive their Minister, if we mean to be really neutral. If the Royal belligerent were represented and heard at our Government, the Republican belligerent ought also to be heard. Give M. Onís his congé, or receive the Republican Minister. Unless you do so, your neutrality is nominal.

But when the independence of the South Americans shall be acknowledged, and they take their stand among the great nations of the earth, there will then be an American policy, and a European policy, which may, in negotiation upon just and honorable principles, be fairly opposed to each other. Then, if, unhappily, difficulties should arise exclusively on this side the ocean, there will be no European convenience to consult, delay, or obstruct their adjustment in terms of complete reciprocity.

On March 8, 1822, President Monroe in his message expressed it as his opinion that the American provinces of Spain which had declared their independence and were in enjoyment of it should be recognized by the United States as independent nations. On March 28 a motion to extend this recognition was introduced into the House of Representatives. David Trimble [Ky.] made the chief speech in its support. It was passed by a vote of 167 to 1. Robert S. Garnett [Va.] cast the single vote in opposition, and, suffering from odium for his action, on March 30 he asked to have his reasons for dissent to an otherwise unanimous opinion entered on the Journal of Congress. His request was refused by a vote of 49 to 51. On April 1, however, when the feeling of the House was somewhat sobered, the vote was reconsidered and the desired permission was granted, 89 yeas to 71 nays, those who voted in the negative doing so in order not to establish a precedent that might encumber the minutes.

RECOGNITION OF SOUTH AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 28-30, 1822

Mr. TRIMBLE.—The nations of America have suffered more from the severity of commercial interdictions and colonial monopoly, than they have from the cruelty of arbitrary power—that commercial vassalage has been more oppressive to them than political dependence; and that they are as deeply interested in the establishment of free trade as they are of free government. The radical change made in their political condition will necessarily be attended with a corresponding change in their commercial intercourse and maritime relations. Their case, in all its aspects, is similar to that of the United States, and will terminate in similar results. The entire emancipation of the new from the old continent can only be effected by two great revolutions: the one political, the other commercial. Both had commenced in the United States under the most favorable auspices, and are progressing southward in the "full tide of successful experiment." These revolutions have been preceded by a "wide-spread range" of moral reformation. The new hemisphere has produced a new catalog of civil maxims—a new family of political institutions—a new code of commercial regulations. All civilized nations were under the dominion of two great social systems, differing widely from each other. One is established in the Occidental, the other in the Oriental world. The spirit of the age is against the European system. The American system has invaded Europe, and spreads alarm and consternation everywhere among its kings and emperors. A coalition of crowned heads is created to oppose it and two millions of armed men embodied to expel it from that continent.

And what are these systems? What is the American system? Why is it that it agitates two worlds? Why should kings shudder at it, while their subjects bid it welcome? Of what is it composed? What is the element that thus, when unresisted, operates unseen, but, when opposed, launches its thunderbolts at diadems and shakes the nations like an earthquake? It has two aspects, two essential principles—one political, the other commercial. The first is known and distinguished by written constitutions, representative government, religious toleration, freedom of opinion, of speech, and of the press. The second, by sailors' rights, free trade, and freedom of the seas.

Contrast it with the European system. The political character of that system is aristocracy, monarchy, imperial government, arbitrary power, passive obedience, and unconditional submission. Its commercial character is prohibition, restriction, interdiction, impressment, colonial monopoly, and maritime domination. These systems are the antipodes of each other. They are sworn enemies, and cannot harmonize.

The American system is free government and free trade; monarchy and monopoly is that of Europe. But the European system is artificial, and will perish with the spurious causes that produced it. The American system is natural, and, therefore, durable—natural, because it springs from public opinion—from the embodied will of nations acting freely for themselves; durable, because it reposes upon written constitutions.

her love of dominion? Shall we, as a nation, stifle all our sympathies in favor of free governments, to gratify the vain-glorious pride of Spain? If we do, we shall betray the rights and interests of republic. Heaven, in giving freedom to us first, made it our primal eldest duty to go forth first, and acknowledge it in others. Honor and duty call alike upon us to perform the rightful obligation. The same Providence that gave us success in the perils of our Revolutionary struggle is conducting the other nations of America, through bloody wars, to peace and independence. Our approbation may inspire them with fresh confidence, and stimulate their love of liberty. If there are any who have fears that the proposed acknowledgment will produce a war with Spain, let them remember that Cuba is a hostage for her peace. The moment she fires a gun at us, we shall occupy that island and her dominion over it will cease forever. And England, in aiding Spain, would only hasten the downfall of her favorite colonial system—a coalition between Colombia, Mexico, and the United States would convince her of her folly. It would be better for us if our statesmen would look less eastward, and more southward than they do at present.

Some statesmen hold that nations whose political principles and opinions have been formed in the school of despotism must undergo long periods of probationary preparation before they can be qualified to manage the affairs of self-government. This is but a modification of the exploded maxim, "that the people know not how to govern,"—that kings must save them from their worst enemies, themselves. Such opinions, if true, form no argument against the policy or justice of acknowledging the nations of America. If true, in former ages, and on the old continent, they are more than doubtful in modern times, and in the new hemisphere. The fact is that the present and past ages are alike in nothing. The whole civilized world is under the dominion of a different mind. Men and nations are shaking off their mental imbecilities and preparing themselves to regulate their own affairs. It was necessary that moral regeneration should precede political reform; and thus it has happened. A great moral revolution has occurred, and is occurring. The spirit of the age is buoy—reformation is everywhere at work, and upon all subjects. We see the beginning, not the end of revolutions. No statesman, no nation, should mistake the character and fashion of the times. Every thing in fifty years has changed, and every thing is changing. "Nothing of the future will resemble what is past." We live in the crisis of all ages. The whole civilized world is laboring in a crisis—a great its first appearance struck the despots with dismay. Our Revolution gave it birth. Its nativity was cast among these States. It grows with their growth, and strengthens with their strength. The impulse of the age accelerates its motion. Nothing can impede its march because it moves in the majesty of national opinion and public opinion is a power that cannot be resisted. From every zone we hear of congresses, elected by the people, assembled and assembling to establish written constitutions. The system spreads like light—its rays fall everywhere. The nations hail it as the harbinger of peace and happiness. They act wisely in laboring to adopt it, seeing that the people of this Union have prospered under it beyond all former parallel.

The tendency of the American system is manifest to every statesman. Its political progress and extension can be seen by every observer, and time will develop its maritime results. A single instance will explain its commercial operation. The continent is free; not so the Islands. Europe, as to them, will continue its system of colonial monopoly—its system of interdictions, prohibitions, and restrictions. These will act and re-act upon all the Americas, but more especially upon Colombia, Mexico, and the United States. Those powers will retaliate, and unite in their retaliation. The common injury will find a common remedy. They will adopt the counter-check of navigation laws, and, by simultaneously protecting regulations, exclude all foreign tonnage from their ports and harbors. A blow like that would be decisive. It would forever prostrate the colonial system and open a free trade to all the Islands. The measure, when adopted, would finish the commercial revolution. It would subvert the whole system of maritime domination, and restore the freedom of the seas. And thus the Americas, by the reaction of internal laws and regulations, well concerted and well directed, may enforce their system of free trade. Thus, without the waste of blood or treasure, they may sustain the general system, and vindicate the rights and honor of the continent. Hitherto, he said, the American system of free trade had been struggling, single-handed, with the European system of colonial monopoly, and had maintained itself against the fearful odds. Hereafter, all the Americas will coöperate. The subject ought to have their prompt attention. It required a careful examination, because the course of policy to be adopted by them would settle, finally and forever, whether the American system shall prevail, or that of Europe triumph over it.

Shall the people of this continent forego the advantages of free and friendly intercourse, to indulge the mother country in moral crisis—a great political crisis—a great commercial crisis. Nations have changed their moral characters, and political opinions and governments must change their form and purpose. Formerly the sword was umpire of the world; and then the maxim grew that nations were incapable of self-command. Now public opinion is the great chancellor of nations. All tongues and kindreds own its jurisdiction, and kings and subjects are submissive to its rule; none dare oppose its high authority—none with impunity resist its just decrees. Wars were fought formerly for families and dynasties; for the rights of thrones and prerogatives of crowns; and then the people were assuredly their own worst enemies. Now men fight for written constitutions; for the rights of man and prerogatives of nations; and, fighting, learn to govern for themselves. The contest now is not between dynasties and diadems, but between creeds, and principles, and institutions.

Nations formerly had no volition; kings thought and acted for them, rudely pretending that their subjects had no capacity for affairs of state. But now the will of nations has supremacy of rank, and speaks by delegation in assembled Congresses; and now we find more talent—more patriotic feeling—more public virtue—more every thing, that strengthens and improves the social system. Time was when kings held power by arrogation, and used it at their pleasure and discretion; and then the people were denounced as "a many-headed monster." The people now reclaim all power as inherent in themselves, and delegate it only as a trust; and now nations are more peaceful, more prosperous, more happy, and more just than formerly. History speaks only of alliances, or wars, between contemporary despots—now nothing is talked of but congresses, and constitutions, and representative governments. And do we find things changing for the worse? The spirit of the age is, peace and moderation. It is the spirit of free government and written constitutions. Its conservative principles are—widespread knowledge, equality of rights, freedom of opinion, and frequent and free elections.

The spirit of past ages was war and domination. The trade of man, of all the sons of men, was war—from the first conqueror down to '76. It was the storm of empires. It raged unspent and unabated. It swept along the field of time, and all was desolation that was left. It had no limits but the margin of the world. Its stream of blood flowed on from age to age; its sources, like the Nile, unknown, lost in the desert of forgotten years; but still, the stream rolled on, increasing with a thousand tributary torrents, and spreading far and wide its overwhelming floods. Such was the history of past times, and of the olden world. Our continent, on the contrary, is the chosen land of liberty—vineyard of the God of peace; and we, its husbandmen, selected by the unseen will of Providence to till the soil, and feed the famished nations with the food of independence. Let us perform the sacred trust impartially. It is our duty, as a free people, not to sanction but refute the heresies that nations are incapable of managing their own concerns. They have disabused themselves by illustrious examples, and we should be careful not to weaken their effect.

It is the will of Providence that this continent should be the arena of successive revolutions—of moral, and political, and commercial revolutions—the theater of man's political regeneration—the hemisphere in which nations should be reinstated in their rights, and reinvested of their "long-lost liberty." On the 4th of July, 1776, the Congress of the thirteen States declared their independence. On this day (28th March, 1822) the assembled Congress of the Union will announce the independence of all the nations of America. These are glorious epochs. Let history commemorate them as coessential in the works of reformation. Freemen are this day called upon to fraternize with freemen; nations to fraternize with nations. All the Americas are summoned to embrace as friends and equals, and make a lasting covenant of peace. It is not the flight of a false prophet, or the foundation of a city, the birthday of a petty chieftain, or an heir-apparent that we are assembled here to celebrate; no; a continent has disenchained itself, and stands unfettered and erect. It is the birthday of a hemisphere redeemed. It is the jubilee of nations. Let the world rejoice.

If experience and long suffering can create the faculties of self-government, then the people of America are prepared to manage and control their own affairs. For three long centuries they "clanked the chains" of lawless power; for three long lingering ages they felt the "keen lash" and galling yoke of despotism—each generation leaving its manacles to posterity as their only heritage. Continued agonies had worn away the memory of better times. The light of hope had left the Children of the Sun, and dark despair, like soporific drugs, had stupefied the powers of will and faculties of life. They slept to mitigate their pain; for nations sleep and never die. But the day of their deliverance was at hand. The Spirit of God was abroad in the sky. It called, and the slumbering nations awoke. It breathed the electric fire of freedom on the air, and a whole continent ran simultaneously to arms! One great, one godlike purpose animated all—it was death or independence! Like us, they pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, to live as freemen, or die in its defence. They fought from field to field. A thousand battles left the cause in doubt; a thousand passions mingled in the fray; and all that history has told of savage cruelty, ferocious vengeance, rapine, plunder, treachery, cold-blooded massacre, and every violence and every crime that shocks humanity was perpetrated over and over again upon all ages, sexes, and conditions. But the God of Battles fought on freedom's side, and, sickening at the scene of carnage and of desolation, and hastening to end it, he took a Bolivar and consecrated him a Washington, and, putting in his hand a flaming sword, commanded him to go forth to the uttermost ends of the continent, conquering and to conquer, until oppression should surcease, and man learn tyranny no more. And behold the work is finished, and Colombia is free, and all the Americas are free—free as ourselves; for there all power is acknowledged in the people, and vassalage abolished, and unknown; for there all officers are elective, and held by the tenure of the law and the constitution; for there, free in their property, their persons, and religion—

"They own no Lord but Him in heaven,
No power but what consent has given."

Mr. Garnett submitted the following declaration of his reasons for not voting to recognize the republics:

I voted against the recognition of the late American provinces of Spain, not because I am opposed to their independence; on the contrary, I rejoice in its accomplishment, and believe that it would be even better for them to be independent with a worse form of government than to be dependent with a better. But I voted against it because I am of opinion that recognition must be either the mere formal declaration of a fact which will be inoperative, and therefore useless, or it must be substantial, and propose some advantage to one or both of the parties—that, if it be substantial, it must be intended either to impart to the party recognized the physical means, or the moral force, necessary to accomplish their revolution, or to establish relations for the mutual benefit of both the parties concerned—that the idea of assistance, to consummate a revolution, concedes that it is not completed, and is incompatible with the neutral obligations to the country claiming jurisdiction; and that the second alternative of mutual benefit reduces it to a question of policy in which it is only necessary to balance the good with the evil:

That we have no right to recognize nations because they have adopted forms of government congenial with our own, if our recognition would not otherwise be proper; and to maintain this doctrine would be to assert the odious principle of legitimacy, that nations have a right to interfere with the internal concerns of each other, which must be beneficial or injurious accordingly as free principles or despotism happens to prevail in the world; and that, for this reason also, the present is a question of policy, not of principle:

That, the period having past when our recognition of the independent Governments of South America could be of any substantial benefit to them, their independence being already firmly established, it is impolitic in us, for the sake of any advantages which either party is likely to derive from an intercourse at this time, to risk those we already possess.

That, if Spain only, through mistaken pride, resents our act, though perhaps too feeble to carry on a war with us, she may interdict our commerce with her remaining colonies, and thus deprive us of a trade more valuable than any we can expect to substitute, for a long time, with the independent provinces:

That, if the importance of this trade to those colonies should induce them to revolt, or our recognition itself should produce in them revolutionary movements, the island of Cuba, the most valuable to us, will either fall under the dominion of the colored population, or of our jealous and ambitious rival, England, or we must occupy it ourselves, at the expense of a war with that rival, who will certainly seek to prevent that occupation at the same cost:

And, finally, that circumstances do not warrant precipitancy—that the great interests of both parties will be endangered without any adequate motive for the risk; and that the temporary éclat which priority of recognition may obtain for us is not to be put in opposition to the great permanent interests of both countries, which will be best promoted by adhering, on their part, to the sage monitions inculcated in the language of one of their most distinguished patriots, Rivadavia, who declared, as late as September last, "that they did not seek the recognition of other nations, because it must operate, if unsuccessful, to the humiliation of the provinces, and, if successful, to mislead the people, by persuading them that such recognition was all-sufficient to their political existence and happiness; that the most efficacious system would be to establish order and wise institutions of government throughout the provinces, and to show themselves worthy of the fraternity of other nations, when it would be voluntarily offered"; and, on our part, by abstaining to propose that fraternity, until the elements of their political society, purified from the crimes and corruption engendered by former oppression, have settled down into order, and they have fully demonstrated their capacity for self-government, and until we are mutually in a condition to derive advantages from a free intercourse, which will overbalance the considerations of the evil which immediate recognition presents, without a prospect of good.

In his message of December 2, 1823, President Monroe announced the famous doctrine that bears his name. It consisted of two declarations which appeared in widely separated parts of the message:

The first declaration was:

That the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power.

The occasion for this declaration was as follows: Russia claimed the Pacific coast as far southward as 51 degrees north latitude. Great Britain and the United States opposed this claim, from 54 degrees and 40 minutes southward, and disputed between themselves the possession not only of the coast but of the interior Western country, the former claiming that its southern boundary was 46 degrees (the line of the mouth of the Columbian river), and the latter that its northern boundary was 54 degrees and 40 minutes. In 1818 Great Britain and the United States agreed by treaty to a joint occupancy for ten years of the disputed territory. Early in this period Great Britain began to explore the country, presumably preparatory to settling it, and thereby acquiring the "nine points of the law" by the time of adjudicating the ownership.

On July 2, 1823, John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State, wrote to Richard Rush, American Minister to Great Britain, a declaration for Rush to present to the British Government that the continent of America "is occupied by civilized nations and is accessible to Europeans and to each other on that footing alone," meaning by this that no more original titles could be secured by discovery, exploration, or settlement. Five months later, without the knowledge of the rest of the Cabinet, Secretary Adams caused President Monroe to insert the declaration to this effect in his message.

The British Government denied that the declaration was in accord with facts, asserting that there still remained land on the American continent to which no original title had been acquired.

The second declaration of the Monroe Doctrine, as we shall see, was also inspired, and was also in thorough accord with the maxim "America for Americans" which had been and was to continue the guiding principle of the President's foreign policy. It ran:

In the wars of the European powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded, or seriously menaced, that we resent injuries, or make preparation for our defence. With the movements in this hemisphere, we are, of necessity, more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied powers is essentially different, in this respect, from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective Governments. And to the defence of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered, and shall not interfere. But, with the Governments who have declared their independence, and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration, and on just principles,

The South American republics were greatly delighted with the declaration which, their wish being father to the thought, they construed as pledging the United States actively to defend their territories from European colonization, instead of encouraging each country to defend its own integrity. This view was chiefly instrumental in causing the countries, early in 1825, to call a congress of all the American republics, including the United States, to meet in Panama to discuss questions of mutual concern. This broad construction of the Doctrine was from the beginning also the popular one, and has become, by an increasing extension of the principle in such cases as Yucatan (1848), Mexico (1861-65), and Venezuela (1895), the official construction, and as such is acquiesced in even by some European powers. It will be interesting for the reader to note, in the debates upon these cases, the early opposition to the Doctrine, even in its mildest construction, gradually disappearing until the broadest construction is scarcely contested.

THE PANAMA CONGRESS

In his first message to Congress (December 6, 1825) President John Quincy Adams announced that he had accepted an invitation from the South American republics to send delegates to a Pan-American Congress to be held at Panama, these delegates to take part in the deliberations "as far as may be compatible with that neutrality from which it is neither our intention nor the desire of the other American states that we depart." Colombia, the foremost of the republics, had voiced the invitation. Among the subjects for consideration which it suggested for the congress was "the means of making effectual" the Monroe Doctrine.

Great opposition to taking part in this congress as likely to embroil us in foreign disputes at once became apparent, and the President, who was ardently in favor of the project, on December 26 sent a special message on the subject to the Senate, which was intended to allay objections. It said "an agreement between all the acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling, in any other manner, their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States. In the war between those new Governments and Spain, we declared our neutrality at the time of their recognition, and to this we have adhered, and shall continue to adhere, provided no change shall occur, which, in the judgment of the competent authorities of this Government, shall make a corresponding change, on the part of the United States, indispensable to their security.

The occasion of this declaration was the proposition of the Holy Alliance at its congress at Verona in 1822, that the allied European powers should check the spread of republicanism throughout the world by interfering with its greatest source of propagation, namely, America. This portended that the monarchies of Europe would either assist Spain to recover her revolted colonies by force, would seize them for themselves, or would establish them as dependent monarchies, and even that the greatest exemplar of the blessings of popular government, the United States, might be ruined by such means as discriminations in trade, if not actual warfare.

When the declaration of Verona became known the British secretary of foreign affairs, George Canning, wrote to Mr. Rush, the American minister, urging the United States to oppose the proposed European intervention in the affairs of the South American republics. Rush sent the letter to Washington, and the President, after consultation with Thomas Jefferson, followed its advice by the enunciation of his celebrated Doctrine.

The determined attitude of the United States effectively strengthened the British Government in blocking the proposal of European absolutism to destroy republicanism in America, and was the earnest of Canning's famous prophecy that "the New World had been called into existence to redress the balance of the Old, and would in time outweigh and topple over the fabrics of kingcraft upon which so many wise men had labored for thousands of years."

parties represented at the meeting that each will guard by its own means against the establishment of any future European colony within its borders may be advisable."

On March 14, 1826, the Senate began the discussion on the advisability of sending delegates to the congress. The debate was in secret, but with the understanding that each speaker might publish his speech after the question had been decided. Of this privilege several senators availed themselves. Says Senator Thomas H. Benton, in his "Debates of Congress":

It was the principal debate of the session, and entered largely into the contest, then hot, for party supremacy—the Administration staking itself upon the mission, as the opposition did against it. It was carried through both Houses of Congress, but deprived of its prestige under the heavy blows which it received; and became abortive from the failure of the congress ever to meet. Losing, as it has, the hot interest derived from party contention, the debate (stripped of temporary topics) retains a permanent value from the ability which it developed, and the views of national policy which it opened.

The measure was passed by a vote of 24 to 19, and delegates were appointed to the congress. One of these, however, died, and the other failed to reach Panama in time for the first session of the congress. Owing to disappointment of the South American republics at the conservative attitude of the United States a second session was not held.

A leading speaker in support of the measure was Josiah S. Johnston [La.]. It was strenuously opposed by Robert Y. Hayne [S. C.] and Levi Woodbury [N. H.].

THE PANAMA MISSION

SENATE, MARCH 14-16, 1826

SENATOR HAYNE.—No man can deny that the Congress of Panama is to be composed of deputies from belligerent States, and that its objects are essentially belligerent. These objects are not concealed but are publicly avowed, and known to the world. It is to be an assembly of confederates, differing very little from the old Congress under our Articles of Confederation, to which, indeed, it bears a striking resemblance.

The question arises whether a neutral state can join in such a council without violating its neutrality? Can the United States lawfully send deputies to a congress of the confederated Spanish American states—a congress which not only has objects confessedly connected with the prosecution of the war, but when it is notorious that these belligerent objects create the very occasion of its assembling? Can we do so without departing from our neutral relations toward Spain? Is it possible, Mr. President, that this can be seriously questioned. It will not bear an argument. There can be no difference under the law of nations—for there is none in reason or justice—between aiding a belligerent in council or in action—between consulting with him in respect to belligerent measures or furnishing the men and money to accomplish them. A strict and honorable neutrality must keep us out of any meeting not having peaceful objects exclusively. The law of nations in this respect cannot differ from those rules of municipal law founded in the common sense of mankind which involve in a common guilt all who associate with those engaged in any unlawful enterprise. It is not permitted to individuals, nor can it be permitted to nations, to excuse themselves for acting with those engaged in belligerent enterprises by alleging that their own purposes are peaceful. Sir, I hold that, if you go into council at all with such powers, you become answerable for all their acts.

But an attempt is made to remove all our apprehensions on this subject (and it comes from a high quarter, too) by the assurance that Spain is just about to acknowledge the independence of her former colonies, under our mediation. The Secretary of State, in his report which accompanies the President's message of the 9th January, in answer to our call for information, transmits a mass of documents to show that our Government has invoked the aid of Russia; that the emperor has interfered at our request; and that there is a flattering prospect of speedy and entire success. So says Mr. Middleton—so says Mr. Clay. But, Mr. President, it fortunately happens that the Senate, on the 30th January, made another call for information on this point, and the answer of the President, of the 1st of February, dispels the illusion entirely. The three letters of Mr. Everett, there disclosed, demonstrate that there is no hope, whatever, of a peace. The Minister of the Spanish Government (Mr. Zea) declares that the determination of the king, on that subject, is unalterable—he will stand upon his naked right and look to Providence, should all other means fail. But this is not all. The Russian Minister concurs in the views of Mr. Zea, and the British Minister will not interfere.

The first great subject to which our attention at this congress is to be called arises out of the pledge which Mr. Monroe is supposed to have given "not to permit any foreign power to interfere in the war between Spain and her colonies"; and it appears from the correspondence to be the special object of the new states to get us to enter into treaties to redeem that pledge, according to the construction they have chosen to put upon it, and in which, I am sorry to add, the Executive seems to have acquiesced. Mr. Oregon tells us that the United States are only expected to take part in those matters which the "late Administration pointed out as being of general interest, for which reason," says he, "one of the subjects which will occupy the attention of the congress will be the resistance or opposition to the interference of any neutral nation in the question and war of independence between the new powers of the continent and Spain"; and "that, as the powers of America are of accord as to resistance, it behooves them to discuss the means of giving to that resistance all possible force, that the evil may be met, if it cannot be avoided; and the only means of accomplishing this object is by a previous concert as to the mode in which each of them shall lend its coöperation: for, otherwise, resistance would operate partially and in a manner much less certain and effective.

"The opposition to colonization in America by the European powers will be another of the questions which may be discussed, and which is in like predicament with the foregoing."

Mr. Salazar holds language on this subject still more explicit.

Now I do positively deny that Mr. Monroe ever pledged this nation to go to war, or make treaties, to prevent the interference of any European nation in the present contest. I deny that he had a right to make any such pledge; and most of all do I deny that any sanction has been given to such an idea by the Senate, the House of Representatives, by the States, or by the people of the United States. The language of Mr. Monroe is extremely vague and indefinite. That great and good man well knew that he had no power to use any but a moral force on that question; and beyond this moral influence over the councils of the nations of Europe he neither attempted nor desired to go. He well knew—every intelligent man in the United States knows—that this nation is not now and never has been prepared to go to war for the independence of South America. The new states have always carried with them our warmest wishes for their success—but beyond the indulgence of a sincere and friendly sympathy we have never been willing to proceed. Mr. Monroe's declaration, I repeat, was intended to produce a moral effect abroad; he designed it for the atmosphere of Europe, and therefore it was couched in such terms that, while it did not commit us to any overt acts, it left foreign nations under a vague impression of what we might do if the event alluded to should ever happen. The substance of Mr. Monroe's statement was "that he should consider any attempt on their part (the powers of Europe) to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety," and as "the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States." It is obvious that we are left by this pledge altogether free to act in any emergency according to circumstances and a sense of our own interests. We have incurred no obligations to others by the declaration; and it is our policy to incur none. But it now appears that the new states have conceived themselves entitled to our aid whenever foreign interference shall be threatened, and (what is truly unfortunate) it further appears that the new Administration have acknowledged their claims and admitted our obligations; they have acted, and are now about to act, on the presumption that the Spanish American states may rightfully claim, and that we are bound to grant, our assistance against all nations who may "hereafter interfere in any way whatever in the question and war of independence." Nay, so far have our Government gone in this respect that they have actually claimed commercial privileges from these states on the ground that we are to be considered as "one of the American nations," and "within the pale of the great American system"; that we are "prepared to bear the brunt of the contest which will arise should any foreign power attempt to interfere."

To show how far our Government have proceeded in this course I must be permitted to read a few pages from the documents before us. In the letter of our minister to Mexico to the Secretary of State, dated 28th September, 1825, after giving an account of the difficulties which had arisen in making a treaty with Mexico, in consequence of the desire of that government to introduce an article putting it in their power to grant special commercial privileges to the other Spanish American states, he informs us that he insisted that we should be entitled to similar privileges because "we were bound to them by similar fraternal ties." To some objections urged against our claims on the ground that we had not yet taken part in the war, our minister replied in the following words, viz: "To these observations I replied that, against the power of Spain, they had given sufficient proof that they required no assistance, and the United States had pledged themselves not to permit any other power to interfere either with their independence or form of government; and that, as in the event of such an attempt being made by the powers of Europe, we would be compelled to take the most active and efficient part, and to bear the brunt of the contest, it was not just that we should be placed on a less favorable footing than the other republics of America, whose existence we were ready to support at such hazards." The minister then goes on to state that, after explaining what we had already done, he declared "what further we were ready to do in order to defend their rights and liberties; but that this could only be expected from us, and could only be accomplished by a strict union of all the American republics on terms of perfect equality and reciprocity; and repeated that it was the obvious policy of Europe to divide us into small confederacies, with separate and distinct interests, and as manifestly ours to form a single great confederacy, which might oppose one united front to the attacks of our enemies."

And now, sir, I must put the question directly and seriously to the Senate, whether they are prepared to send ministers to the congress of Panama for the purpose of making effectual this pledge of the President of the United States, as construed by the present Administration and understood by the Spanish American states? Whatever may be the opinion of others, I, for one, have no hesitation in declaring that I am not prepared for any such proceeding; I am not ready now to declare that I will involve my country in all the horrors of war for the establishment of South American independence; and even if I were prepared to say that, rather than permit the interference of any foreign nation in the contest, "we must fight," still I should think it wise and prudent not to commit ourselves by treaties or compacts, but to reserve the right to act when the contingency shall happen, as our feelings or interests may then dictate. It is of the last importance that we should reserve this privilege to ourselves; that we should enter into no stipulations whatever with other nations on such a subject. But should we send ministers to Panama for these objects we will not be free to pursue this course. If our ministers go there with our sanction, committed as we know the President to be, we must either sanction the compacts which may be entered into or disappoint the just expectations which we will have raised. In the one case our interests will be sacrificed, and in the other our friendly relations with the new states will be interrupted. Let us, then, avoid this dilemma by not placing ourselves voluntarily in a situation which will leave us only a choice of difficulties and impose upon us the hard necessity of offending our friends or injuring ourselves.

Connected with this object is another bearing a close resemblance to it: "the opposition to colonization in America" by any European power. If by this it is to be understood that we are to interfere to obstruct the settlement of the territories in America owned by Russia or England, it must speedily involve us in an unjust and unnecessary war. But if the design is to enter into compacts with the South American states not to permit any colonization within our respective limits, or if we are to make common cause in resisting all such attempts, then I must boldly declare that the scheme is, in the one case, derogatory to our honor, and, in the other, dangerous to our safety. What! is it come to this, that the United States of America are to come under obligations to others; to bind themselves to nations of yesterday, to preserve their own territories from invasion and their homes and their altars from pollution? Nay, are we, at this period of our history, to enter into solemn vows that we will neither permit ourselves to be conquered nor to be sold? Sir, the idea of treaty stipulations against colonization is degrading and unmeaning, unless it is intended that we shall guarantee to the new states the possession of their territories; and, if that is the plan, it is as unwise as it is dangerous.

I proceed next to consider the great object (which seems to lie so near to the hearts of some of our statesmen) of building up what they are pleased to call "an American system"—terms which, when applied to our domestic policy, mean restriction and monopoly, and, when applied to our foreign policy, mean "entangling alliances," both of them the fruit of that purient spirit which will not suffer the nation to advance gradually in the development of its great resources and the fulfilment of its high destinies, but would accelerate its march by the most unnatural and destructive stimulants. "As Europe (says Mr. Canas) has formed a continental system, America should form a system for herself." "The mere assembling (says Mr. Salazar) of the congress, by showing the ease with which America can combine, will increase our political importance." In plain terms, Mr. President, we are called upon to form a Holy Alliance on this side of the water, as a counterpoise to the Holy Alliance on the other side of it. Are the people of this country prepared for that? What is there in the history or character of the Holy Alliance that makes it a fit subject for our imitation? This combination of nations at peace, to maintain certain principles and institutions, contains the most atrocious violation of the natural and social rights of man that the world has ever seen. It is wrong—most fatally wrong—and it makes no difference, in reason or justice, what the principles to be maintained are. It is of the essence of national independence that every country should be left free to adopt and to change its principles and its policy according to its own views of its own interests; and from the very bottom of my soul I abhor the idea of combinations among sovereign states for any purpose whatever. Great Britain, the only nation in Europe that possesses the shadow of freedom, has refused to join the Holy Alliance. I hope we shall follow her example in having nothing to do with this "great American Confederacy."

I have given to this subject, Mr. President, the most dispassionate consideration, and I am free to confess that, whether I consider the measure itself, the form of the invitation, or the course which has been pursued in relation to it, my mind is filled with the most unqualified astonishment. That the President should have committed himself, committed us, and committed the nation, and that the question should have been brought before us, will form, it appears to me, a curious page in the history of this country, which will hereafter be referred to with peculiar interest.

SENATOR WOODBURY.—The Secretary of State to Mr. Poinsett, October 25, 1825, says, no longer than about three months ago, when an invasion by France of the Island of Cuba was believed at Mexico, the United Mexican Government promptly called on the Government of the United States, through you, to fulfil the memorable pledge of the President of the United States, in his message to Congress, of December, A. D. 1823. What they would have done, had the contingency happened, may be inferred from a dispatch to the American Minister at Paris. Then follows that dispatch, dated October 25, 1825, in which he deliberately avows that "we could not consent to the occupation of those islands by any other European power than Spain under any contingency whatever." The same sentiment is repeated to Mr. Middleton, December 26, 1825, "we cannot allow a transfer of the island (of Cuba) to any European power." Has it indeed come to this, that we are to tell the autocrat of fifty millions he has not the same right to take a transfer of Porto Rico as we had to take a transfer of Florida? Is this republicanism, equal rights, and received national law; or is it some marvelous discovery of the present age? And are we prepared, by this mission, to back up by a war the menace to France, that in no contingency whatever shall she be allowed to occupy Cuba, although she buy it of Spain by as fair and as honest a treaty as that by which we purchased Louisiana of France herself?

Are these the doctrines of the American Congress, or of the American people, or do they savor of the Holy Alliance?

Where, also, is the crisis—where the emergency to justify such an extraordinary measure? "Why quit our own, to stand on foreign ground?" Why join our fortunes in any case, much less in a useless war with powers of another origin—another tongue—another faith? Have we become incompetent to our self-defence? Are we in need of foreign "councils" and foreign "deliberations" to manage our own concerns? Or are we so moonstruck, or so little employed at home as, in the eloquent language of our President on another occasion—when the sentiments expressed found a response in every patriot heart—as to wander abroad in search of foreign monsters to destroy? Speaking of America and her foreign policy, he observed, "she has abstained from interference in the concerns of others even when the conflict has been for principles to which she clings as to the last vital drop which visits the heart." "Whenever the standard of freedom and independence has been or shall be unfurled, there will her heart, her benedictions, and her prayers be. But she goes not abroad in search of monsters to destroy. She is the well-wisher to the freedom and independence of all. She is the champion and vindicator only of her own."—(Adams' Oration, 4th July, 1821.) This is the first time that the legislative department of our Government has ever been distinctly appealed to for its sanction to the new notions thus ably denounced by him; and if we now approve the Panama congress, whose chief object is to enforce them, we at once adopt and approve the principle that Spain has not, by such alliances as national law warrants, and as were formed on both sides in our own Revolution, any right to attempt to reconquer and recolonize South America; and, further, that she has not, by such sales as national law warrants and as we ourselves have partaken, any right to transfer Cuba or Porto Rico to any European power with whom she can agree upon the purchase money; and that these unprecedented and unjust positions we are willing to maintain at any sacrifice of blood and treasure.

SENATOR JOHNSTON.—These Spanish American states have been engaged in a war of revolution. They have achieved their independence; all the force of Spain has been driven from the continent. But, as Spain refuses all terms with them and may renew the war upon either the most exposed or the most feeble; as she will concentrate all her power upon a given point; as the occupation of any position on the continent will form a basis of operations on which to act against all the rest; as it will become the rallying point of all her adherents and enable them to prolong the war—it became necessary to unite for the common defence of all and mutually to guarantee peace, security, and independence.

In such a compact it was not our duty, our policy, or inclination to engage; and, accordingly, we find that no proposition was made to us to become a party, and all the communications speak with the most guarded precautions and the most explicit avowals. To believe that they intended to unite us in their councils or to draw us into their measures would be to arrive at this conclusion not only without evidence but against all evidence and in the face of the most solemn assurances. This alliance of Spanish American states is already formed. The parties that compose it, the principles on which it is based, the obligations it imposes, and the means to be employed are fully set forth in the convention before us; to which I confidently refer.

But suppose we were to take part in the discussion of belligerent measures, what part should we take? It is our interest and our duty to keep Cuba as it is: a movement there would be dangerous to us. The Secretary of State has said we desire to see Cuba remain as it is. The President has, on a memorable occasion, said: "We cannot view with indifference the interposition of any European nation." We should, therefore, advise them to husband their strength and resources—to secure what they have gained. We should dissuade them from striking at that island—a measure, perhaps, fatal to them and injurious to us.

How, then, can we participate in any belligerent measure? or any act prejudicial to Spain? or any act inconsistent with our faith, our honor, or our neutrality?

Mr. President, much has been said about a pledge. It is now the policy to make an impression that some secret understanding has taken place; some unknown and mysterious arrangement, which the Government will now be bound in honor and good faith, if this mission is sent, to carry into effect.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Senator Hayne] intimates strongly that this Government has given a pledge. The declaration of the President admonished neutral nations not to interfere with Spain and her colonies. It was a distinct and positive enunciation of the views of this Government. It was supposed, at the time, to mean something. By some it has been termed a protest; by others a pledge; but more properly designated as the memorable declaration. No other or different assurance has been given to strengthen the connections with these new states. But admit there was: all motive to treat on that subject now has ceased; there is now no danger, or even expectation, that the contingency will ever happen; and, if we cannot rely upon the assurance of the President that no alliance will be formed, we may rely upon the fact that no pledge has been given, by the inference arising from the fact that Mexico refused to place us on the footing of the most favored nations. If we had given the pledge to protect her independence, there would have existed no reason for the distinction taken between us and the other American states.

Among the events of greatest magnitude and most anxious concern to this country is the future condition of Cuba. We know that Colombia and Mexico have long contemplated the independence of that island. It has probably been delayed by want of concert and by our mediation to produce peace. But we now know that the fortune of that island is now to be settled. They have waited for a favorable moment to attack them with a certainty of success by the greater forces which the alliance of all the sections of the South and Mexico will procure. The final decision is now to be made, and the combination of forces and plan of attack to be formed.

With regard to the effect of that mission upon us there is no difference of opinion. It is deprecated by all as equally dangerous to our peace and their safety. What, then, at such a crisis becomes the duty of this Government? Send your ministers instantly to this diplomatic assembly where this measure is maturing. Advise with them—remonstrate—menace them, if necessary, against a step so dangerous to us and perhaps fatal to them. Urge them to be satisfied with what they have achieved—to establish their governments—consolidate their union—improve their resources. Guard them against the madness and folly of this enterprise. Warn them of the danger of provoking the allies to take part with Spain. Admonish them of their duty and obligation they owe to themselves, to us, and to all Europe—not to disturb the peace and repose of the world. Our advice will be respected and the danger averted.

hear a great deal about the infirmity of certain constitutions—not paper constitutions—we hear a great deal of constitutional infirmity. Seven years is too long for some of us to wait; and if the President can be disposed of at the end of three years, then, being extinguished, may they not, by some new turning up of trumps, expect to succeed him? Whatever the motive may have been, the fact is that there is a discrepancy in the communications of the Executive to Congress; and I will state another thing when I come to it. It is that I do believe—though I do not pledge myself to prove—but I will pledge myself to make out a very strong case, such as would satisfy a jury in the county of Charlotte—and I would put myself on that jury, and be tried by God and my country—I then say, sir, that there is strong reason to believe that these South American communications which have been laid before us were manufactured here at Washington, if not by the pens, under the eye of our own ministers, to subserve their purposes. Sir, though in one respect I am like the great Earl of Warwick, the king-maker, and a little unlike him in unmaking one king—though between two hawks I can tell which flies the higher pitch—between two dogs, which has the deeper mouth—between two horses, which bears him best—between two blades, which hath the better temper—between two girls, which hath the merrier eye—yet, in matters of law, I am like the unlearned Earl Goodlack. One thing has my attention been turned to—language—words—the counters of wise men, the money of fools—that machine and material with which the lawyer, the priest, the doctor, the charlatan of every sort and kind pick the pocket and put the fetters upon the planter and upon the slaveholder. It is by a dexterous cutting and shuffling of this pack that the business is done. They who can shuffle the whole pack are often quite ignorant of any foreign language, even of their own, and, in their attempts to write and talk finely, they only betray their poverty, like the fine ladies in the Vicar of Wakefield by their outrageous attempts to be very genteel. The first thing that struck me in these documents was how wonderfully these Spaniards must have improved in English in their short residence in the United States. It reminded me of a remark in one of Scott's novels, in the part about old Elspeth, of the Craighburnfoot: "Aye," says old Edie, "she's ar well educate woman; and an she win to her English, as I ha heard her do at an orra time, she may come to fickle us a'." These Spaniards have got to their English, and we are all fiekled. But I shall be told—not as I have been told—but as I am prepared to be told—because I have kept this thing

I trust I have shown that, if this mission is not due to courtesy, it is due to a just estimate of our essential interests. It is due to friendship, to peace, to commerce, to our principles; it can do no injury—it may do good—it will do good.

It was in connection with the Panama mission that John Randolph made his celebrated attack on the President and Henry Clay, whom Adams had appointed Secretary of State—as the result, many opponents of the Administration claimed, of a "corrupt bargain" whereby Adams had won the presidency.

On March 30, 1826, John Branch [N. C.] introduced a resolution in the Senate protesting against the competency of the President to have appointed ministers to the congress of Panama without the advice and consent of the Senate. It was to this motion that Randolph spoke.

BLIFL AND BLACK GEORGE

ATTACK ON ADAMS AND CLAY BY JOHN RANDOLPH

Sir, in what parliamentary debate was it that, upon a certain union between Lord Sandwich, one of the most corrupt and profligate of men in all the relations of life, and the sanctimonious, puritanical Lord Mansfield, and the other ministerial leaders, that Lord Chatham said that it reminded him of the union between Blifl and Black George? I, who am no professional man, but only a planter: I, whose reading has not gone very deep into black letter, though I do know some little of that, too; I do believe there is more wisdom, after the Bible, Shakespeare, and Milton—I do believe that in Don Quixote, Gil Blas, and Tom Jones there is contained a greater body of wisdom than is to be found in the same number of pages in the whole collection of English and foreign literature.

I will prove, if the Senate will have the patience to listen to me—I will prove to their satisfaction that the President has clapped an extinguisher on himself. If I don't prove it, I will sit down infamous and contented for the rest of my life. And how, sir, has he extinguished himself? He has done it by the aid and instrumentality of this very new ally. I shall not say which is Blifl and which is Black George. I do not draw my pictures in such a way as to render it necessary to write under them, "this is a man, this is a horse." I say this new ally has been the means of extinguishing him, and for what? Sir, we locked up here to bring it out here in this Senate—I shall be told that these English letters were translations from the Spanish, made in the office of the Secretary of State. I hope not—I should be sorry to see any such tokens of affinity, and consanguinity, and good understanding; but they have the footprints and the flesh-marks of the style of that office.

Now, sir, John Quincy Adams coming into power under these inauspicious circumstances, and with these suspicious allies and connections, has determined to become the apostle of liberty, of universal liberty, as his father was, about the time of the formation of the Constitution, known to be the apostle of monarchy. It is no secret—I was in New York when he first took his seat as Vice-President. I recollect—for I was a schoolboy at the time, attending the lobby of Congress when I ought to have been at school—I remember the manner in which my brother was spurned by the coachman of the then Vice-President for coming too near the arms blazoned on the scutcheon of the viceregal carriage. Perhaps I may have some of this old animosity ranking in my heart, and, coming from a race¹ who are known never to forsake a friend or forgive a foe—I am taught to forgive my enemies, and I do from the bottom of my heart, most sincerely, as I hope to be forgiven; but it is my enemies—not the enemies of my country; for, if they come here in the shape of the English, it is my duty to kill them; if they come here in a worse shape—wolves in sheep's clothing—it is my duty and my business to tear the sheepskins from their backs, and, as Windham said to Pitt, open the bosom and expose beneath the ruffled shirt the filthy dowls. Adams determined to take warning by his father's errors, but in attempting the perpendicular he bent as much the other way. Who would believe that Adams, the son of the sedition-law President, who held office under his father—who, up to December 6, 1807, was the undeviating, stanch adherent to the opposition to Jefferson's administration, then almost gone—who would believe he had selected for his pattern the celebrated Anacharsis Cloots, "orator of the human race"?² As Anacharsis was the orator of the human race, so Adams was determined to be the President of the human race. He has come out with a speech and a message, and with a doctrine that goes to take the whole human family under his special protection. Now, sir, who made him his brother's keeper? Who gave him, the President of the United States, the custody of the liberties, or the rights, or the interests of South America, or any other America, save only the United States of America, or any other country under the sun? He has put himself, we know, into the way, and I say God send him a safe deliverance and God send the country a safe deliverance from his policy. I quitted the Senate ten minutes before the vote was taken. After twenty-six hours' exertion it was time to give in. I was defeated, horse, foot, and dragoons—cut up—and clean broke down—by the coalition of Blifl and Black George—by the combination, unheard of till then, of the puritan with the black-leg.

Secretary Clay, understanding from the report of the speech that Randolph had charged him with deliberately forging public documents, challenged him to a duel, which Randolph accepted. Neither contestant was wounded at the first fire, and at the second Randolph discharged his pistol in the air and had the skirt of his coat ripped by Clay's bullet. Randolph then stepped up to Clay and saying, "You owe me a coat, Mr. Clay," he extended his hand, which Clay took, saying "I am glad the debt is no greater"; and so the "high-toned" duel, as Senator Benton, Randolph's second, termed it, ended in good feeling between the duellists.

which have accompanied that struggle, and to the principles which appear to have governed the conduct of the great states of Europe in regard to it; and to the effects and consequences of these principles upon the independence of nations, and especially upon the institutions of free governments. What I have to say of Greece, therefore, concerns the modern, not the ancient; the living, and not the dead. It regards her not as she exists in history, triumphant over time, and tyranny, and ignorance; but as she now is, contending against fearful odds for being and for the common privileges of human nature.

As it is never difficult to recite commonplace remarks and trite aphorisms, so it may be easy, I am aware, on this occasion, to remind me of the wisdom which dictates to men a care of their own affairs, and admonishes them, instead of searching for adventures abroad, to leave other men's concerns in their own hands. It may be easy to call this resolution quixotic, the emanation of a crusading or propagandist spirit. All this, and more, may be readily said; but all this, and more, will not be allowed to fix a character upon this proceeding until that is proved which it takes for granted. Let it first be shown that in this question there is nothing which can affect the interest, the character, or the duty of this country. Let it be proved that we are not called upon, by either of these considerations, to express an opinion on the subject to which the resolution relates. But, in my opinion, this cannot be shown. In my judgment, the subject is interesting to the people and the Government of this country, and we are called upon, by considerations of great weight and moment, to express our opinions upon it. These considerations, I think, spring from a sense of our own duty, our character, and our own interest. I wish to treat the subject on such grounds, exclusively, as are truly American. Let it embrace everything that fairly concerns America. Let it comprehend not merely her present advantage but her permanent interest, her elevated character as one of the free states of the world, and her duty toward those great principles which have hitherto maintained the relative independence of nations, and which have, more especially, made her what she is.

At the commencement of the session the President, in the discharge of the high duties of his office, called our attention to the subject to which this resolution refers. "A strong hope," says that communication, "has been long entertained, founded on the heroic struggle of the Greeks, that they would succeed in their contest and resume their equal station among the nations of the earth. It is believed that the whole civilized world takes

CHAPTER IX

SYMPATHY WITH EUROPEAN REVOLUTIONISTS [GREEK]

Resolution of Daniel Webster [Mass.] in Sympathy with Greek Independence —Debate on the Resolution: in Favor, Daniel Webster; Opposed, John Randolph [Va.].

IN the same message in which he announced his famous Doctrine (December, 1823) President Monroe made the revolution in Greece the subject of a paragraph, and on the 8th of December Daniel Webster [Mass.] moved the following resolution in the House of Representatives:

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for defraying the expense incident to the appointment of an agent or commissioner to Greece, whenever the President shall deem it expedient to make such appointment."

The resolution was brought up for discussion in the House on January 19, 1824, when Mr. Webster spoke upon it. John Randolph [Va.] replied to him on January 24. The resolution never went into effect, although its expression, the first official utterance favorable to the independence of Greece uttered by any of the governments of Christendom, no doubt contributed toward the creation of that feeling throughout the civilized world which eventually led to the battle of Navarino and the liberation of a portion of Greece from the Turkish yoke.

RECOGNITION OF GREEK INDEPENDENCE

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 19-24, 1824

MR. WEBSTER.—I wish to take occasion of the struggle of an interesting and gallant people, in the cause of liberty and Christianity, to draw the attention of the House to the circumstances a deep interest in their welfare. Although no power has declared in their favor, yet none, according to our information, has taken part against them. Their cause and their name have protected them from dangers which might ere this have overwhelmed any other people. The ordinary calculations of interest, and of acquisition with a view to aggrandizement, which mingle so much in the transactions of nations, seem to have had no effect in regard to them. From the facts which have come to our knowledge, there is good cause to believe that their enemy has lost forever all dominion over them; that Greece will become again an independent nation."

If the sentiments of the message in respect to Greece be proper, it is equally proper that this House should reciprocate those sentiments. The present resolution is designed to have that extent, and no more. If it pass, it will leave any future proceeding where it now is, in the discretion of the executive Government.

I take it for granted that the policy of this country, springing from the nature of our Government and the spirit of all our institutions, is, so far as it respects the interesting questions which agitate the present age, on the side of liberty and enlightened sentiments. We are placed, by our good fortune and the wisdom and valor of our ancestors, in a condition in which we can act no obscure part. Be it for honor, or be it for dishonor, whatever we do is sure to attract the observation of the world. As one of the free states among the nations, as a great and rapidly rising republic, it would be impossible for us, if we were so disposed, to prevent our principles, our sentiments, and our example from producing some effect upon the opinions and hopes of society throughout the civilized world. It rests probably with ourselves to determine whether the influence of these shall be salutary or pernicious.

It cannot be denied that the great political question of this age is that between absolute and regulated governments. The substance of the controversy is whether society shall have any part in its own government. Whether the form of government shall be that of limited monarchy, with more or less mixture of hereditary power, or wholly elective or representative, may perhaps be considered as subordinate. The main controversy is between that absolute rule which, while it promises to govern well, means, nevertheless, to govern without control, and that constitutional system which restrains sovereign discretion and asserts that society may claim as matter of right some effective power in the establishment of the laws which are to regulate

it. The spirit of the times sets with a most powerful current in favor of these last-mentioned opinions. It is opposed, however, whenever and wherever it shows itself, by certain of the great potentates of Europe; and it is opposed on grounds as applicable in one civilized nation as in another, and which would justify such opposition in relation to the United States as well as in relation to any other state or nation if time and circumstances should render such opposition expedient.

Our place is on the side of free institutions. From the earliest settlement of these States, their inhabitants were accustomed, in a greater or less degree, to the enjoyment of the powers of self-government; and for the last half-century they have sustained systems of government entirely representative, yielding to themselves the greatest possible prosperity, and not leaving them without distinction and respect among the nations of the earth. This system we are not likely to abandon; and, while we shall no farther recommend its adoption to other nations, in whole or in part, than it may recommend itself by its visible influence on our own growth and prosperity, we are, nevertheless, interested to resist the establishment of doctrines which deny the legality of its foundations. We stand as an equal among nations, claiming the full benefit of the established international law; and it is our duty to oppose, from the earliest to the latest moment, any innovations upon that code which shall bring into doubt or question our own equal and independent rights.

I have a most deep and thorough conviction that a new era has arisen in the world, that new and dangerous combinations are taking place, promulgating doctrines and fraught with consequences wholly subversive in their tendency of the public law of nations and of the general liberties of mankind. Whether this be so or not is the question which I now propose to examine, upon such grounds of information as are afforded by the common and public means of knowledge.

Here Mr. Webster recited the history of the "Holy Alliance."

It is not a little remarkable that a writer of reputation upon the public law described, many years ago, not inaccurately, the character of this alliance. I allude to Puffendorf. "It seems useless," says he, "to frame any pacts or leagues, barely for the defence and support of universal peace; for by such a league nothing is superadded to the obligation of natural law, and no agreement is made for the performance of anything which the parties were not previously bound to perform; nor is the original obligation rendered firmer or stronger by such an addition.

"If one engage to serve another, he does not set it down expressly and particularly among the terms and conditions of the bargain that he will not betray nor murder him, nor pillage nor burn his house. For the same reason, that would be a dishonorable engagement in which men should bind themselves to act properly and decently, and not break the peace."¹

How nearly Puffendorf had anticipated the case of the Holy Alliance will appear from the preamble to that alliance. After stating that the allied sovereigns had become persuaded, by the events of the last three years, that "their relations with each other ought to be regulated exclusively by the sublime truths taught by the eternal religion of God the Savior," they solemnly declare their fixed resolution "to adopt as the sole rule of their conduct, both in the administration of their respective states and in their political relations with every other government, the precepts of that holy religion, namely, the precepts of justice, charity, and peace, which, far from being applicable to private life alone, ought, on the contrary, to have a direct influence upon the counsels of princes, and guide all their steps, as being the only means of consolidating human institutions and remedying their imperfections."

This measure, however, appears principally important as it was the first of a series, and was followed afterward by others of a more marked and practical nature. These measures, taken together, profess to establish two principles which the Allied Powers would introduce as a part of the law of the civilized world; and the establishment of which is to be enforced by a million and a half of bayonets.

The first of these principles is that all popular or constitutional rights are held no otherwise than as grants from the crown. Society, upon this principle, has no rights of its own; it takes good government, when it gets it, as a boon and a concession, but can demand nothing. It is to live by that favor which emanates from royal authority, and, if it have the misfortune to lose that favor, there is nothing to protect it against any degree of injustice and oppression. It can rightfully make no endeavor for a change, by itself; its whole privilege is to receive the favors that may be dispensed by the sovereign power, and all its duty is described in the single word submit.

¹Law of Nature and Nations, Book II., Chap. 2, Sec. 11.

sion. This is the plain result of the principal Continental state papers; indeed, it is nearly the identical text of some of them.

I need not stop to observe, Mr. Chairman, how totally hostile are these doctrines to the fundamental principles of our Government. They are in direct contradiction; the principles of good and evil are hardly more opposite. If these principles of the sovereigns be true, we are but in a state of rebellion or of anarchy, and are only tolerated among civilized states because it has not yet been convenient to reduce us to the true standard.

But the second, and, if possible, the still more objectionable, principle avowed in these papers is the right of forcible interference in the affairs of other states. A right to control nations in their desire to change their own government, wherever it may be conjectured or pretended that such change might furnish an example to the subjects of other states, is plainly and distinctly asserted.

No matter what be the character of the government resisted, no matter with what weight the foot of the oppressor bears on the neck of the oppressed, if he struggle or if he complain he sets a dangerous example of resistance—and from that moment he becomes an object of hostility to the most powerful potentates of the earth. I want words to express my abhorrence of this abominable principle. I trust every enlightened man throughout the world will oppose it, and that, especially, those who, like ourselves, are fortunately out of the reach of the bayonets that enforce it will proclaim their detestation of it in a tone both loud and decisive. What is to be the limit to such a principle, or to the practice growing out of it? What, in any case but sovereign pleasure, is to decide whether the example be good or bad? And what, under the operation of such a rule, may be thought of our example? Why are we not as fair objects for the operation of the new principle as any of those who may attempt a reform of government on the other side of the Atlantic?

M. de Chateaubriand, in his speech in the French Chamber of Deputies, in February last, declared that he had a conference with the Emperor of Russia at Verona, in which that august sovereign uttered sentiments which appeared to him so precious that he immediately hastened home and wrote them down while yet fresh in his recollection. "The Emperor declared," said he, "that there can no longer be such a thing as an English, French, Russian, Prussian, or Austrian policy; there is henceforth but one policy, which, for the safety of all, should be adopted both by people and kings. It was for me first to show myself convinced of the principles upon which I founded the alliance; an occasion offered itself—the rising in Greece. Nothing certainly could occur more for my interests, for the interests of my people; nothing more acceptable to my country, than a religious war in Turkey. But I have thought I perceived in the troubles of the Morea the sign of revolution, and I have held back. Providence has not put under my command eight hundred thousand soldiers to satisfy my ambition, but to protect religion, morality, and justice, and to secure the prevalence of those principles of order on which human society rests. It may well be permitted that kings may have public alliances to defend themselves against secret enemies."

If it be true that there is hereafter to be neither a Russian policy, nor a Prussian policy, nor an Austrian policy, nor a French policy, nor even, which yet I will not believe, an English policy, there will be, I trust in God, an American policy. If the authority of all these governments be hereafter to be mixed and blended, and to flow, in one augmented current of prerogative, over the face of Europe, sweeping away all resistance in its course, it will yet remain for us to secure our own happiness by the preservation of our own principles; which I hope we shall have the manliness to express on all proper occasions, and the spirit to defend in every extremity. Human liberty may yet, perhaps, be obliged to repose its principal hopes on the intelligence and the vigor of the Saxon race.

This asserted right of forcible intervention in the affairs of other nations is in open violation of the public law of the world. On the basis of the independence of nations has been reared the beautiful fabric of international law. On this principle the great commonwealth of civilized states has been hitherto upheld. There have been occasional departures or violations, and always disastrous, as in the case of Poland; but, in general, the harmony of the system has been wonderfully preserved. In the production and preservation of this sense of justice, this predominating principle, the Christian religion has acted a main part. Christianity and civilization have labored together; it seems, indeed, to be a law of our human condition that they can live and flourish only together.

It may now be required of me to show what interest we have in resisting this new system. The thunder, it may be said, rolls at a distance. The wide Atlantic is between us and danger; and, however others may suffer, we shall remain safe.

I think it is a sufficient answer to this to say that we are one of the nations of the earth; that we have an interest, therefore, in the preservation of that system of national law and national intercourse which has heretofore subsisted so beneficially for all. Our system of government, it should also be remembered, is, throughout, founded on principles utterly hostile to the new code; and, if we remain undisturbed by its operation, we shall owe our security either to our situation or our spirit. The enterprising character of the age, our own active, commercial spirit, the great increase which has taken place in the intercourse among civilized and commercial states, have necessarily connected us with other nations, and given us a high concern in the preservation of those salutary principles upon which that intercourse is founded. We have as clear an interest in international law as individuals have in the laws of society.

But apart from the soundness of the policy, on the ground of direct interest, we have, sir, a duty connected with this subject which I trust we are willing to perform. What do we not owe to the cause of civil and religious liberty? to the principle of lawful resistance? to the principle that society has a right to partake in its own government? As the leading republic of the world, living and breathing in these principles, and advanced by their operation with unequalled rapidity in our career, shall we give our consent to bring them into disrepute and disgrace? It is neither ostentation nor boasting to say that there lies before this country, in immediate prospect, a great extent and height of power. We are borne along toward this without effort and not always even with a full knowledge of the rapidity of our own motion. Circumstances which never combined before have cooperated in our favor, and a mighty current is setting us forward which we could not resist even if we would, and which, while we would stop to make an observation, and take the sun, has set us, at the end of the operation, far in advance of the place where we commenced it. Does it not become us, then, is it not a duty imposed on us, to give our weight to the side of liberty and justice, to let mankind know that we are not tired of our own institutions, and to protest against the asserted power of altering at pleasure the law of the civilized world?

It may, in the next place, be asked, perhaps, Supposing all this to be true, what can we do? Are we to go to war, Are we to interfere in the Greek cause, or any other European cause? Are we to endanger our pacific relations? No, certainly not. What, then, the question recurs, remains for us?

Sir, this reasoning mistakes the age. The time has been, in-combinations which had been formed in the eastern parts of Europe." Now it must be remembered that Russia was a leading party in this denunciation, yet it is notorious that within the last half-century she has again and again excited the Greeks to rebellion against the Porte, and that she has constantly kept alive in them the hope that she would one day, by her own great power, break the yoke of their oppressor. The Grecian revolution has been discouraged, discountenanced, and denounced, solely because it is a revolution.

Now it is upon this practical result of the principle of the Continental powers that I wish this House to intimate its opinion. The great question is a question of principle. Greece is only the signal instance of the application of that principle. If the principle be right, if we esteem it conformable to the law of nations, if we have nothing to say against it, or if we deem ourselves unfit to express an opinion on the subject, then, of course, no resolution ought to pass. If, on the other hand, we see in the declarations of the Allied Powers principles not only utterly hostile to our own free institutions, but hostile also to the independence of all nations, and altogether opposed to the improvement of the condition of human nature; if, in the instance before us, we see a most striking exposition and application of those principles, and if we deem our opinions to be entitled to any weight in the estimation of mankind—then I think it is our duty to adopt some such measure as the proposed resolution.

I close, sir, with repeating that the object of this resolution is to avail ourselves of the interesting occasion of the Greek revolution to make our protest against the doctrines of the Allied Powers, both as they are laid down in principle and as they are applied in practice. I think it right, too, sir, not to be unseasonable in the expression of our regard and, as far as that goes, in a manifestation of our sympathy with a long oppressed and now struggling people. I am not of those who would, in the hour of utmost peril, withhold such encouragement as might be properly and lawfully given, and, when the crisis should be past, overwhelm the rescued sufferer with kindness and caresses. The Greeks address the civilized world with a pathos not easy to be resisted. They invoke our favor by more moving considerations than can well belong to the condition of any other people. They stretch out their arms to the Christian communities of the earth, beseeching them, by a generous recollection of their ancestors, by the consideration of their desolated and ruined cities and villages, by their wives and children sold into an deed, when fleets and armies and subsidies were the principal reliances even in the best cause. But, happily for mankind, a great change has taken place in this respect. Moral causes come into consideration, in proportion as the progress of knowledge is advanced; and the public opinion of the civilized world is rapidly gaining an ascendancy over mere brutal force. It is already able to oppose the most formidable obstruction to the progress of injustice and oppression; and as it grows more intelligent and more intense, it will be more and more formidable. It may be silenced by military power, but it cannot be conquered. It is elastic, irrepressible, and invulnerable to the weapons of ordinary warfare. It is that impassible, unextinguishable enemy of mere violence and arbitrary rule, which, like Milton's angels,

"Vital in every part,
Cannot, but by annihilating, die."

Until this be propitiated or satisfied, it is vain for power to talk either of triumphs or of repose. No matter what fields are desolated, what fortresses surrendered, what armies subdued, or what provinces overrun. In the history of the year that has passed by us, and in the instance of unhappy Spain, we have seen the vanity of all triumphs in a cause which violates the general sense of justice of the civilized world. It is nothing that the troops of France have passed from the Pyrenees to Cadiz; it is nothing that an unhappy and prostrate nation has fallen before them; it is nothing that arrests and confiscation and execution sweep away the little remnant of national resistance. There is an enemy that still exists to check the glory of these triumphs. It follows the conqueror back to the very scene of his ovations; it calls upon him to take notice that Europe, though silent, is yet indignant; it shows him that the scepter of his victory is a barren scepter; that it shall confer neither joy nor honor, but shall molder to dry ashes in his grasp. In the midst of his exultation, it pierces his ear with the cry of injured justice; it denounces against him the indignation of an enlightened and civilized age; it turns to bitterness the cup of his rejoicing, and wounds him with the sting which belongs to the consciousness of having outraged the opinion of mankind.

Sir, what has been the conduct pursued by the Allied Powers in regard to the contest in Greece? When the revolution broke out the sovereigns were assembled in congress at Laybach; and the papers of that assembly sufficiently manifest their sentiments. They proclaimed their abhorrence of those "criminal accursed slavery, by their blood, which they seem willing to pour out like water, by the common faith, and in the name which unites all Christians, that they would extend to them at least some token of compassionate regard.

MR. RANDOLPH.—It is with serious concern and alarm that I have heard doctrines broached in this debate fraught with consequences more disastrous to the best interests of this people than any that I ever heard advanced during the five and twenty years since I have been honored with a seat on this floor. They imply, to my apprehension, a total and fundamental change of the policy pursued by this Government, ab urbe condita—from the foundation of the Republic to the present day. Are we, sir, to go on a crusade, in another hemisphere, for the propagation of two objects as dear and delightful to my heart as to that of any gentleman in this or in any other assembly—Liberty and Religion—and in the name of those holy words—by this powerful spell, is this nation to be conjured and beguiled out of the highway of Heaven—out of its present comparatively happy state, into all the disastrous conflicts arising from the policy of European powers, with all the consequences which flow from them? Liberty and Religion, sir!—things that are yet dear, in spite of all the mischief that has been perpetrated in their name. I believe that nothing similar to this proposition is to be found in modern history, unless in the famous decree of the French National Assembly, which brought combined Europe against them, with its united strength, and, after repeated struggles, finally effected the downfall of the French power. Sir, I am wrong—there is another example of like doctrine; and you find it among that strange and peculiar people—in that mysterious book, which is of the highest authority with them (for it is at once their gospel and their law), the Koran, which enjoins it to be the duty of all good Moslems to propagate its doctrines at the point of the sword; by the edge of the scimitar. Sir, these Moslems were encamped, where we now find them, before this country was discovered, and their title to the country which they occupy is at least as good as ours. They hold their possessions there by the same title by which all other countries are held—possession obtained at first by a successful employment of force, confirmed by time, by usage, by prescription—the best of all possible titles. Their policy has been, not tortuous, like that of other states of Europe, but straightforward; they have invariably appealed to the sword, and have held by the sword. And, in consequence of this straightforward policy, this peculiar people could boast of being the only one of all the powers of continental Europe whose capital had never been insulted by the presence of a foreign military force.

I would respectfully ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether in his very able and masterly argument he himself has not furnished an answer to his speech? The gentleman lays down, from Puffendorf, in reference to the honeyed words and pious professions of the Holy Alliance, that these are all surplusage, because nations are always supposed to be ready to do what justice and national law require. Well, sir, if this be so, why may not the Greek presume—why are they not, on this principle, bound to presume that this Government is disposed to do all, in reference to them, that they ought to do, without any formal resolutions to that effect? I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the doctrine of Puffendorf does not apply as strongly to the resolution as to the declaration of the Allies—that is, if there be not something behind this nothing which divides this House into two unequal parts, one the advocate of a splendid system of crusades, the other the friends of peace and harmony, the advocates of a fireside policy; for, as has truly been said, as long as all is right at the fireside, there cannot be much wrong elsewhere?

But, sir, we have already done more than this. The President of the United States, the only organ of communication which the people have seen fit to establish between us and foreign powers, has already expressed all, in reference to Greece, that the resolution goes to express. Actum est—it is done—it is finished—there is an end.

If the great master of the political philosophy could arise from the dead, or had his valuable life been spared till now, he would not only have been relieved from all his terrors on the subject of a regicide peace, but also have witnessed a return of the age of chivalry and the banishment of calculation even from the estimates of statesmen which that great man could never have foreseen; for the proposition now under consideration is that something new under the sun which Solomon himself never dreamed of. Is this all? No, sir; if that was all I should not have thrown myself upon your attention. But this is not all. Cases have already been stated, to which the principle of the resolution equally applies as to that of the Greeks. In addition to those already put, I will take the case of Canada, if you will. It is known to everybody that discontents have for some time existed in the Canadian Provinces with the mother country and the measures of its government. Suppose the people of the British colonies to the north of us undertake to throw off the yoke—I will not put the case of Jamaica, because they, unhappily, are slaveholders. Are you ready to stake the peace and welfare and the resources of this nation in support of Canadian independence? Your doctrine goes that length—you cannot stop short of it. Where, in that case, will be the assistance of Great Britain, already referred to in debate as being the only spot in the world in which liberty resides except our own country? There is another people—in valorous achievements and daring spirit on a footing with these Greeks themselves—who have achieved their independence from a bondage far heavier than that of the Greeks to the Turks. How is it, sir, that we have never sent an envoy to our sister republic of Hayti? Here is a case that fits—a case beyond dispute. It is not that of a people who have “almost” (aye, sir! almost, but not altogether)—who have almost but perfectly achieved their independence. To attempt to show that these cases are equally within the range of the principle of the resolution would be to show a disrespect to the intellects of those around me. The man who cannot pursue the inference would not recognize my picture, though, like the Dutchman’s painting, were written under it, “This is the man, that the horse.”

Among other cases forcibly put by the gentleman from Massachusetts, why he would embark in this incipient crusade against Mussulmen, he stated this as one—that they hold human beings as property. Ah, sir, and what says the Constitution of the United States on this point? Unless, indeed, that instrument is wholly to be excluded from consideration—unless it is to be regarded as a mere useless parchment, worthy to be burned, as was once actually proposed. Does not that Constitution give its sanction to the holding of human beings as property? Sir, I am not going to discuss the abstract question of liberty or slavery, or any other abstract question. I go for matters of fact. But I would ask gentlemen in this House who have the misfortune to reside on the wrong side of a certain mysterious parallel of latitude to take this question seriously into consideration—whether the Government of the United States is prepared to say that the act of holding human beings as property is sufficient to place the party so offending under the ban of its high and mighty displeasure?

Sir, the objections to this resolution accumulate as I proceed—vires acquirit eundo.¹ If I should attempt to go through with a statement of them all, and had strength to sustain me, I should do what I promised I would not do—I should worry and exhaust the patience of this committee.

“‘It gathers powers in its going.’”

Sir, what are we now asked to do? To stimulate the Executive to the creation of embassies. And what then? That we, or our friends, may fill them. Sir, the sending ambassadors abroad is one of the great prerogatives, if you will, of our Executive authority; and we are, I repeat, about to stimulate the President to the creation of a new, and, I must be permitted to say, an unnecessary, embassy—a diplomatic agency to Greece—that we, or our friends, may profit by it. For, sir, it is a matter of notoriety that all these good things are reserved for men who either have been or are de facto members of this or of the other House. No doubt we shall be able to find some learned Theban, or some other Boeotian, willing to undertake this mission—perfectly willing to live upon the resources of the people rather than his own. But then recurs the old-fashioned question, Cui bono? His own, undoubtedly, but surely not that of this nation.

But it is urged that we have sent and received ministers from revolutionary France. True, we have; but what was revolutionary France? Our own ancient and very good ally; a substantive power, if any such exist on the continent of Europe, whose independent existence no one could doubt or dispute, unless, indeed, the disciples of Berkeley, who deny that there is any such thing as matter. Sir, let these Greeks send a minister to us, and then we will deliberate on the question whether we will accredit him or not. If, indeed, there was a minister of Greece knocking at the door of the President’s ante-chamber for admittance, and that admittance was denied, the question of Grecian independence would be more legitimately before us; but I greatly doubt if even that case would be sufficient to call for the interference of this House.

But there is one aspect of this question which ought to be conclusive on the minds of all, viz: That Russia, whose designs on Turkey have been unremittently prosecuted ever since the days of Peter the Great for more than a century; that Russia, allied to the Greeks in religious faith—identified in that respect; that Russia, unassailable territorially, and dividing with us (according to the gentleman from Massachusetts) the dread and apprehension of the Allied Powers—even Russia, in “juxtaposition” (to use the words of the mover of the resolution) to Turkey—even Russia dare not move. But we, who are separated first by the Atlantic Ocean and then have to traverse the Mediterranean Sea to arrive at the seat of conflict—we, at the distance of five thousand miles, are to interfere in this quarrel —to what purpose? To the advantage solely of this very colossal power which has been held up as the great object of our dread, and of whom it is difficult to say whether it is more to be dreaded for its physical force or its detestable principle.

Permit me, sir, to ask why, in the selection of an enemy to the doctrines of our Government, and a party to those advanced by the Holy Alliance, we should fix on Turkey? She, at least, forms no party to that alliance; and I venture to say that, for the last century, her conduct, in reference to her neighbors, has been much more Christian than that of all the “Most Christian,” “Most Catholic,” or “Most Faithful” Majesties of Europe—for she has not interfered, as we propose to do, in the internal affairs of other nations.

But, sir, we have not done. Not satisfied with attempting to support the Greeks, one world, like that of Pyrrhus or Alexander, is not sufficient for us. We have yet another world for exploits: we are to operate in a country distant from us eighty degrees of latitude, and only accessible by a circumnavigation of the globe, and to subdue which we must cover the Pacific with our ships, and the tops of the Andes with our soldiers. Do gentlemen seriously reflect on the work they have cut out for us? Why, sir, these projects of ambition surpass those of Bonaparte himself.

It has once been said of the dominions of the King of Spain—thank God! it can no longer be said—that the sun never set upon them. Sir, the sun never sets on ambition like this: they who have once felt its scorpion sting are never satisfied with a limit less than a circle of our planet. I have heard, sir, the late comuscation in the heavens attempted to be accounted for by the return of the lunar cycle, the moon having got back into the same relative position in which she was nineteen years ago. However this may be, I am afraid, sir, that she exerts too potent an influence over our legislation, or will have done so if we agree to adopt the resolution on your table. I think about once in seven or eight years, for that seems to be the term of our political cycle, we may calculate upon beholding some redoubted champion—like him who prances into Westminster Hall, armed cap-a-pie, like Sir Somebody Dimock, at the coronation of the British king, challenging all who dispute the title of the sovereign to the crown—coming into this House, mounted on some magnificent project such as this. But, sir, I never expected that, of all places in the world (except Salem) a proposition like this should have come from Boston!

Sir, I am afraid that, along with some most excellent attributes and qualities—the love of liberty, jury trial, the writ of habeas corpus, and all the blessings of free government, that we have derived from our Anglo-Saxon ancestors, we have got not a little of their John Bull, or rather John Bull Dog spirit—their readiness to fight for anybody and on any occasion. Sir, England has been for centuries the gamecock of Europe. It is impossible to specify the wars in which she has been engaged for contrary purposes; and she will, with great pleasure, see us take off her shoulders the labor of preserving the balance of power. We find her fighting now for the Queen of Hungary—then for her inveterate foe, the King of Prussia—now at war for the restoration of the Bourbons—and now on the eve of war with them for the liberties of Spain. These lines on the subject were never more applicable than they have now become—

"Now Europe's balanced—neither side prevails;

If we pursue the same policy, we must travel the same road and endure the same burdens under which England now groans. But, glorious as such a design may be, a President of the United States would, in my apprehension, occupy a prouder place in history who, when he retires from office, can say to the people who elected him, I leave you without a debt, than if he had fought as many pitched battles as Cæsar, or achieved as many naval victories as Nelson. No, sir. Let us abandon these projects. Let us say to those seven millions of Greeks: "We defended ourselves when we were but three millions against a power in comparison to which the Turk is but as a lamb. Go and do thou likewise." And so with respect to the governments of South America. If, after having achieved their independence, they have not valor to maintain it, I would not commit the safety and independence of this country in such a cause.

Let us adhere to the policy laid down by the second, as well as the first, founder of our Republic—by him who was the Camillus, as well as the Romulus, of the infant state;—to the policy of peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none: for to entangling alliances we must come if you once embark in projects such as this.

Government had violated no principle of international law, saying: "This sympathy (for nations struggling for institutions like their own), so far from being necessarily a hostile feeling toward any of the parties to these great national struggles, is quite consistent with amicable relations with them all."

He did not forbear gratuitous remarks offensive to the dignity of Austria.

"The power of this Republic, at the present moment, is spread over a region one of the richest and most fertile on the globe, and of an extent in comparison with which the possessions of the house of Hapsburg are but as a patch on the earth's surface."

In a letter to his friend, George Ticknor, Webster gave the following as his reasons for the "high hand" he had taken in the matter:

"If you say that my Hülsemann letter is boastful and rough, I shall own the soft impeachment. My excuse is twofold: 1. I thought it well enough to speak out, and tell the people of Europe who and what we are, and awaken them to a just sense of the unparalleled growth of this country. 2. I wished to write a paper which should touch the national pride, and make a man feel sheepish and look silly who should speak of disunion."

This paper fulfilled both objects, greatly angering Austria and rousing to a high pitch the national pride of the United States. There was a strong desire to bring to America the exiled Hungarian leader, Louis Kossuth. On February 17, 1851, Henry S. Foote [Miss.] moved in the Senate a joint resolution empowering the President to send a ship to Turkey, which was harboring the exiles, in order to fetch Kossuth and his companions to this country. This was adopted on February 26, and concurred in by the House on March 3. Kossuth arrived in New York on the Mississippi in December, and met with an enthusiastic reception from the city.

On the first day of the session of Congress in December Senator Foote offered a joint resolution for the

SYMPATHY WITH EUROPEAN REVOLUTIONISTS [HUNGARIAN AND IRISH]

American Sympathy with the Hungarian Revolutionists—President Taylor Sends Secret Agent to Hungary—His Report; Controversy Over It by Baron Hülsemann, Austrian Chargé d'Affaires, and Daniel Webster, Secretary of State—Government Brings Louis Kossuth, Hungarian Revolutionist, in a War Vessel to America—Henry S. DURING the time when Hungary was striving for independence from Austria many refugee Hungarian patriots had come to America in 1848-49, and their presence and appeals for aid concentrated the sympathy which this country has always felt toward republicans throughout the world into a demand that the Government do what it could in helping the revolutionists. In June, 1849, President Taylor sent a secret agent to Hungary to obtain information of the situation with a view to recognizing the independence of the country. This information Taylor laid before Congress, whereupon the Austrian chargé d'affaires, Baron Hülsemann, entered protest to the State Department. About this time Fillmore succeeded to the Presidency, and Webster to the head of the department. In December, 1850, Webster in an able paper argued that the United States reception of Kossuth by the United States Government. On the next day (December 3, 1851) a debate occurred on the resolution, which is noteworthy because of the manner in which the irrepressible question of slavery was obtruded in a matter with which it had no seeming connection. An amendment offered by John P. Hale [N. H.], apparently innocent of all design to bring forward the burning issue but really intended to do so, precipitated an angry discussion, in which Hale was denounced for his duplicity by Senator Foote and Lewis Cass [Mich.].

William C. Dawson [Ga.] began the debate by opposing official recognition of Kossuth.

THE RECEPTION OF KOSSUTH

SENATE, DECEMBER 3, 1851

SENATOR DAWSON.—I see nothing in the character of this distinguished individual which should make the Government of the United States get up a great pageant on his account, and distinguish him from all other men who have ever lived. Has he ever been connected with our institutions? Has he ever rendered any particular service to this country to entitle him to this mark of distinction? Not at all. It is true he is a great man, but he is not greater than many men who now live, and who have lived. His position is such as to call into exercise our sympathies for him and his associates as men. That sympathy this Government has already shown to an extent almost unparalleled by sending one of the national vessels to receive him and his associates, if they were willing to come to this country. Have we not done enough to show our sympathies and our good feelings? I think we have. Against the man's character and course I utter not a word. The American heart is open for his reception. It is the people who will receive him. It is the people and not the Government that ought to receive him. Lafayette, when he came to this country, was received in a manner which was justifiable on the part of the Government of that day, because he was connected with the Revolution which gave us the liberties which we enjoy.

SENATOR HALE.—I move to amend the resolution by adding the following words:

"And also to assure him and his associates in exile of the sympathy of the Congress and people of the United States with the victims of oppression everywhere, and that their earnest desire is that the time may speedily arrive when the rights of man shall be universally recognized and respected by every people and government of the world."

If this be added to the resolution I think it will obviate the objection of the Senator from Georgia; because then, instead of being personal to Kossuth, it would apply to the victims of oppression everywhere, without any distinction.

SENATOR FOOTE.—Sir, the gentleman from Georgia seems to overlook the fact that there is a great struggle going on at this moment in all parts of the civilized world between the principles of freedom and the principles of slavery. The tyrants of the earth have combined for the overthrow of liberty. In some instances open attempts are made to break down political and religious freedom. In others the means employed by the enemies of freedom are more disguised and insidious, but not at all less dangerous. At such a moment does it behoove the American people to join the side of despotism or to stand by the cause of freedom? We must do one or the other. We cannot avoid the solemn alternative presented. Those who are not for us are against us. Those who are not for freedom are for slavery.

The eminent personage [Louis Kossuth] whose claims upon our respect and sympathy I have endeavored to make manifest has commended himself especially to my regard by the delicate and discreet forbearance which he has elsewhere exercised in avoiding all indecent interference with the domestic institutions of other countries than his own. While in monarchical England he did not hesitate to avow his decided partiality for republican institutions, yet no one can accuse him of uttering a word upon any occasion which was in the least degree calculated to awaken popular discontent or to foment civil discord; and I venture to predict, sir, that if the vicious and contriving factionists who have so fiercely struggled for several years past to disturb the domestic quiet of the Republic should attempt to enlist Louis Kossuth in their unholy designs, they will incur such a withering rebuke from his lips as will make them wish, for a moment, at least, that the Almighty in his providence had never permitted such miscreants to pollute the pure air of heaven with their pestilential breath.

SENATOR HALE.—What is this amendment? Why, that we shall assure to this illustrious man, as dear to my affections as to his—dear to my affections for the principles which he has advocated, and for the maintenance and advocacy of which he is now an exile—that we shall assure him and his associates in exile of the sympathy of the Congress and the people of the United States not only with them but with the victims of oppression everywhere. Is there any intimation there that the honorable Senator means to find fault with? Does he mean to intimate that in this land there is a place where the rights of man are not respected and recognized? If he does, he utters a fouler slander upon the country and upon some of the States of the Confederacy than I would allow myself to utter in this place.

I wish Kossuth to come here, in his very person, a living reproach to despotism of whatever name and wherever it may be. I want him to go about among the people of the land, the living advocate of the rights of man, so that everybody, wherever he may be, who feels in his own breast that he is guilty of any invasion or infraction of these rights when he looks into the face of Kossuth may see there the lineaments that speak out reproach. That is the reason why I honor him, and that is the reason why I wish him to come here.

There are other victims of oppression. There are the victims of English oppression. The people of this country have been moving lately to get the kind offices of this Government to interfere in behalf of O'Brien, Mitchell, and their associates. I want this resolution to reach them. I want to let it go just exactly as far as the history of the United States goes. I want it to go, as was eloquently said by a distinguished orator of this country to Lafayette when he was here, speaking to him of the voice of Washington that was raised in his behalf, that that voice of sympathy could reach him even in the dungeons of Austria. Well, if there are victims of oppression in the dungeons of Austria, or of any other government on earth, I want this expression of the sentiments of the American people to be broad enough to reach them. I want Kossuth, and Mitchell, and O'Brien, and everybody else that is suffering in the great cause of human rights and human liberty, to feel that here, without division and without partiality, there is the entertainment of an honest and earnest and zealous respect for the course they have pursued.

Owing to the opposition which Foote met, both from Southerners and Northerners, he withdrew his resolutions, whereat Kossuth openly expressed his opinion of a Government that had invited him to be its guest and almost immediately afterward had refused him and his cause official recognition.

SYMPATHY WITH IRELAND

The question of extending sympathy to the Irish victims of English oppression, to which Senator John P. Hale [N. H.] referred in the previous debate, had been brought forward in the Senate on December 2, 1851, by Henry S. Foote [Miss.] in a joint resolution "expressive of the sympathy of Congress for the exiled Irish patriots, Smith O'Brien and Thomas F. Meagher, and their associates." This resolution authorized a correspondence in which appeal should be made to the magnanimity of the British Government and people requesting the liberation of these persons from their present confinement and offering to receive them "upon the hospitable shores of the United States."

On January 29 General James Shields [Ill.] offered in the Senate this amendment to the resolution:

"Disclaiming all intention to interfere in the internal affairs of the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, we would regard this act of clemency as a new proof of the friendly disposition of the British Government toward our Republic, and as calculated to strengthen the bonds of affection now happily existing between the people of the United States and of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

On February 7 General Shields supported the motion and his amendment in an eloquent speech. William H. Seward [N. Y.] and Lewis Cass [Mich.] spoke in similar vein in favor of the motion, and George E. Badger [N. C.] opposed it.

LIBERATION OF THE IRISH PATRIOTS

SENATE, FEBRUARY 7-11, 1852

GENERAL SHIELDS.—Mr. President, I have prepared the amendment which I now take the liberty of offering as a substitute for the original resolution offered by a Senator [Mr. Foote], now no longer a member of this body. I am exceedingly anxious for its passage because, as it now stands, I think it preserves the dignity of this Government and can give no reasonable offence to the English Government; and I firmly believe it will effect a humane and Christian object—the liberation of those unfortunate men from captivity. I may as well state that O'Brien, Meagher, and O'Donahoe were convicted of treason and sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered—which sentence was afterward commuted, by virtue of an express statute, into transportation for life. Mitchell, Martin, and O'Dougherty were convicted of sedition—an offence made felony and a species of treason by a statute expressly enacted for the occasion, and they were sentenced to be transported—Mitchell for fourteen years and Martin and O'Dougherty for ten years each. These six persons are now in captivity in Van Diemen's Land. The punishment is not so cruel as it is degrading; but, to men like these, death would be more acceptable than degradation. And what can be more degrading than to confine, and in a measure confound, such noble spirits with the vilest convicted criminals of the British empire? If this resolution has the effect, as I hope it will, of restoring these Irish patriots to liberty, it will be a work of beneficence, and the action of this Government will be to them like the interposition of an angel of mercy. But if it even fails to accomplish this object, it will still be successful in another respect: it will sound like a voice of encouragement to the captives—the voice of a great people. It will give consolation and hope; and, if it waft them nothing but hope, it will lighten their captivity and brighten their dreary existence in that far-distant land. As one of the friends of these Irish exiles, I take this occasion to state to the Senate—and I think I interpret the wishes of all their friends when I make this statement—that if they have the good fortune to ever reach our shores, we have no wish to see them welcomed with any public demonstration or display like that which has been just rendered to the illustrious Kossuth. We ask nothing of that kind. We wish to see them receive no other welcome or reception than that which the generous American heart always renders to the noble unfortunate.

In the passage of this resolution all we declare is that the liberation of these Irish patriots would be gratifying to the people of the United States. Surely there can be no reasonable objection to this. We ask that they be permitted to emigrate to this country—to incorporate themselves with our citizens, and live here quietly and peacefully under the protection of our free Constitution. There are strong natural reasons for the interest which the people of this country take in the fate of Ireland and Irishmen. Not only are millions of native Irishmen citizens of this country at this time, but Irish blood runs warmly in the veins of more than half the people of the United States. There is still another and a higher view of this matter, and one which seems to me to rise above all the etiquette of diplomacy. In one sense the people of this country and of Great Britain and Ireland may be considered as one great distinct family of the human race, connected by strong natural and traditional relations, which exist to the same extent among no other people on earth—blood, language, literature, the memories of the past and the hopes of the future. America may be considered not only the second home but the ultimate home of millions who are born under the British flag. How, then, can it even be suspected that under all these circumstances an application of this kind could offend the British Government? So far from being offensive, sir, in my humble opinion it is complimentary to that Government. The British Government has nothing to gain by continuing these men in confinement, and nothing to risk in their liberation. It has nothing to fear from Irish agitation now. Ireland is at this moment as feeble, helpless, and hopeless as the most anti-Irish heart can desire. Her nationality is gone; her hopes are crushed; her ancient generous race is becoming extinct. She has no future—or, if she has, it is a dark one. At such a time, and under such circumstances, how can any government, great and powerful as the English Government is, retain the last defenders of such a nation in captivity?

At this age of the world I think it is generally admitted that to punish a man for a political offence, without a very strong political necessity, is not an act of justice or self-defence, but, on the contrary, an act of cruel, useless, and impolitic vengeance. The British Government is too proud and powerful to stoop to the wicked weakness of vengeance. I think the present a very favorable time for moving in this affair and for preferring this request. The most friendly relations exist at this time between this country and Great Britain. There is a strong feeling of mutual regard and common interest, and, perhaps I may add, a sense of common danger uniting the people of both countries at this moment in close and intimate connection. The English people, so far as I can observe, are beginning to appreciate the character, resources, and institutions of this country, and to look with something like admiration upon the growth of this continental republic. Not only England but the world begins to see and acknowledge that this nation is destined to future supremacy.

The example of England herself would be, perhaps, the best argument we could use in favor of this resolution, or to enforce this request. Her history, in fact, is full of examples, not only of intercession but of interference in the internal affairs of other nations. England interfered directly in behalf of Kosuth and his companions—while we merely intercede for Smith O'Brien and his associates. She defended these Hungarians against Austria and Russia; we only appeal to her own clemency for the liberation of Irish patriots. She contributed to the liberation of Austrian subjects, although they are, in a certain sense, still dangerous to the Austrian Government. We simply request the liberation of British subjects whose freedom, in my opinion, at this time will serve to strengthen the English Government. We all recollect the universal delight with which the American people witnessed the first interference of England in behalf of the Hungarian exiles. When the British fleet appeared at the mouth of the Dardanelles—when the Red Cross of England joined the Crescent of Mahomet, and blazed in defence of the exile and the unfortunate—all America, with one voice, shouted glory and honor to the flag of Old England. She acted gloriously on that occasion. Her conduct called forth the applause of the liberal world. But now we have to moderate this applause when we think of Van Diemen's Land. We give her credit for her generosity abroad, but we are sorry to be compelled to refuse her equal credit for her clemency at home. Patriotism cannot be a virtue in Hungary and a crime in Ireland. England may be able to make some distinction between the two cases, but the world will refuse to recognize it. She will raise her national character in the estimation of the world—she will establish her disinterestedness before the tribunal of history and posterity—if she follow up her conduct toward the Hungarians with the liberation of the Irish exiles. As it is, her conduct is severely criticized on the continent of Europe. The Austrians and Russians especially accuse her of hypocrisy—of violating the great law of moral and political consistency—of traversing half the globe in defence and support of Hungarian patriots, while at the same time she proscribes, banishes, and imprisons Irish patriots. They say English philanthropy is like the philanthropy of the elder Mirabeau, who was styled "The Friend of Man," for his universal benevolence, while he practiced at the same time, within the bosom of his own family, the most cruel, heartless, and unrelenting tyranny.

This is the kind of indictment the Continent prefers against England at this time. I am not prepared to endorse it. On the contrary, I am thoroughly convinced she will avail herself of the first favorable opportunity to clear her reputation from any such reproach. I am inclined to think she will feel thankful to this Government for supplying her with a fair occasion, a graceful pretext, to perform a humane and politic act. The world will then see that she is not governed, either in her foreign or domestic policy, by jealousy of Russia or hatred of Austria, but by a great principle of philanthropy and humanity.

If we weigh the conduct of these Irish patriots, not in legal but in moral scales, we will find much to justify their attempt. They loved their native country. There is no moral guilt in this. On the contrary, the love of country is one of the noblest sentiments of our nature. When this sentiment fades from the soul, the soul has lost its original brightness. In Ireland, however, this sentiment is almost considered a political offence. There is something so unnatural in this state of things, that what the English law denounces as treason the Irish heart recognizes as patriotism. An Irish patriot hears himself pronounced guilty in what is called the sanctuary of justice, while he feels in the sanctuary of his heart that he stands guiltless before God and his country.

Poor Ireland! Her history is a sad one. It is written in the tears and blood of her children. Her sons have been so long accustomed to injustice that they regard themselves as aliens and outcasts in the very land that God gave them as a heritage. Yet they love their country with all the fervor of the Irish heart. The more she suffers the more they love her. This love has become almost a part of their religion and of their fervent devotion to their God. As her own sweet poet [Thomas Moore] has so truly and beautifully said:

"Her chains as they rankle, her blood as it runs,
But make her more painfully dear to her sons."

Ireland has always been an incorrigible and irreconcilable rebel against power; but when her oppressors became unfortunate she became loyal; when they became friendless and helpless, she drew the sword and poured out her blood for them in the hour of their adversity. The Stuarts at the head of the empire were her cruel and constant oppressors; yet Ireland sacrificed herself for the last monarch of that ungrateful race, when, abandoned by his favorites and betrayed by his family, he fled from his throne—an exile, a wanderer, friendless and unfortunate.

I hope it will be allowable on this occasion to refer to the conduct of the Irish in your own glorious Revolution. History attests that during that whole period of trial and struggle a single Irish Tory was not to be found in the thirteen colonies. Both here and in Ireland, at home and abroad, the Irish heart declared openly and fearlessly in favor of the colonies. Who defended their cause in the British Parliament with more eloquent ability than Edmund Burke? And who defended it in the hour of danger with more unselfish devotion than the brave Montgomery? The Irish were true to this country then, and they are true to it still; they have always proved true, in word and deed, to the republican institutions of this country.

I would appeal to the people of England for justice to Ireland as quickly at this moment as I would to any other people on earth except the American people. Ireland has never been governed by the English people. It has been governed by an Anglo-Irish oligarchy—an oligarchy that has had no instinct but selfishness; no passion but the preservation of its own class. The government of Ireland was the government of a caste,—the very abstraction of an evil government. Such a government would have ruined any other country as well as Ireland. There was certain ruin in the very principle upon which it governed. That principle was to anglicize Ireland—to force an English government on the Irish race, an English church on Irish consciences, and English habits on Irish hearts,—in a word, to transform Irishmen into Englishmen. Of course the experiment has failed.

There is a national as well as a personal individuality. No people can be improved or elevated except through the medium of their own nationality. To develop a people we must respect the scruples of the national conscience—the virtues of the national heart, and the aspirations and even prejudices, of the national mind. National varieties are as necessary to improve and develop the human race as individual varieties. And political systems ought to be as various as the varieties of national character. A political system to improve and develop a people must grow out of the habits and circumstances of that people. It must be the natural product of the country.

The first requirement for Ireland is religious liberty; not toleration, but full, equal, absolute religious liberty. She will never be satisfied until she obtains this boon. There is nothing so dangerous to a government in a perilous crisis as a powerful, dissatisfied religious party, like the Roman Catholic party of the British Empire; and nothing so harmless as religious sects or parties, when a government abolishes all religious distinctions and gives full, perfect, and absolute religious liberty to all. If you want to put down religious agitation and destroy clerical influence, give the people equal and universal religious liberty. This is a truth very well understood in this country, yet, strange to say, it has hitherto escaped the penetration of the first statesmen of Europe.

Ireland also requires political liberty and an equitable share of all the advantages of the British Government and British Empire, and above all, the Irish people require an absolute interest in the soil of their country. As it is, Ireland may be considered a vast warren—a hunting ground for absentee nobility; and, unhappily, the spoils of the chase are the hearts, hopes, and lives of the Irish peasantry. I have long watched and waited to see some great English statesman arise, who could grapple with this monster difficulty.

But, after all, Ireland must be the great agent of her own regeneration; she must not depend upon England, or upon America, or upon the Continent. If she looks to the absolutists of Europe for support, as I apprehend she does at this moment, she will be deceived and disappointed and betrayed. There is not a despot in Europe, large or small, from the Czar of Russia to the King of Naples, who would not, at this moment, sell and sacrifice Ireland and all her hopes to purchase the friendship of the English Government.

I know it is difficult to form a correct judgment of the true policy of a distant nation; but, after long reflection upon this subject, I have arrived at the conclusion that the present policy of Ireland is to abandon all idea of a political separation from England. Her own nationality is gone. She can never recover or restore either her old language or her old nationality. If she were an independent nation this moment, her great effort should be to build up a new nationality conformable to her present moral, social, and political condition. Her policy now is to make the most of her present political connection, and to avail herself of all the political, commercial, industrial, and intellectual advantages of the British Empire. She should cooperate on all occasions with the most liberal English party. She should throw her whole weight into the scale of liberalism. Her movement should be an imperial one; and by acting in this manner she would raise and regenerate herself in contributing to elevate and liberalize the whole empire.

SENATOR SEWARD.—I am told that we may lawfully sympathize, as individuals, in the misfortunes of these unhappy men, and of their more unhappy country; but that to us as a political body—a state or nation—or as the representatives—the government of a nation—such sympathy is forbidden. This seems what is asked, as the British Government is free to reject our application.

Sir, this proposition involves a view of the relations of the parties concerned. The people of Ireland are affiliated to us, as we are to the people of Great Britain. Surely there can be no offence given by a younger member in offering mediation between the elder brethren of the same family upon a point of difference between them.

But what if Great Britain should take offence at this suggestion? What then? Why, then England would be in the wrong, and we in the right. The time has passed when this country can be alarmed by fear of war in such a case. No one will confess that he indulges any such apprehension. Sir, Great Britain will not take offence. She knows that her greatness and her fame are well assured. She has no motive whatever to affect wounded sensibility. She will receive this suggestion in the same fraternal spirit in which it is made. Nor will she refuse the boon. She knows as well as we do that rigor protracted beyond the necessity of security to the state reacts. She knows full well that for the present, at least, sedition sleeps profoundly in Ireland, and that the granting of this appeal will protract its slumbers. Great Britain will be thankful to us for our confidence in her generosity, for her motto is "Parcere subjectis et debellare superbis."

The points of Senator Cass, who followed, will be found as quoted by Senator Badger, the next speaker.

SENATOR BADGER.—After every examination which I have been able to give this subject, I cannot persuade myself that it is proper that the Congress of the United States should pass the resolution in any of the forms in which it has been proposed to our consideration. If I could vote for the resolution in any form, I would undoubtedly vote for it in that which it has assumed upon the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. Shields]; and if anything could persuade me to forego the exercise of my own deliberate judgment and put myself under the mastery of those feelings which are apt to be excited by discussions of this kind, to favor the adoption of the resolution, it would be the speech delivered on last Saturday by the honorable Senator from Illinois, full as it was of everything that can do honor to a man's head and heart.

But whatever my feelings of attachment, consideration, or to me equivalent to saying that we may indulge sentiments of generous compassion, but we shall never carry them into beneficent action. The sympathy of the several members of this Senate, or of this Congress, or of the individual citizens of the United States will be unavailing. If that sympathy is truly felt by the nation, it can only be effectually expressed in the manner in which national sympathies and determinations of the national will are always made effective—by the action of the Government. And, sir, let me say that there is only one code of morals for mankind, and its obligations bind them equally, whether they be individuals, subjects, citizens, states, or nations.

I shall be told that we may not intervene in this which is a domestic affair of a foreign government. It is true that we may not intervene in the affairs of any government for unjust purposes, nor can we intervene by force for even just or benevolent purposes. But this is the only restraint imposed on us by the law of nations. That law, while it declares that every government has the absolute right to deal with its own citizens, according to its own laws, independently of any other, affords a large verge and scope for the exercise of offices of courtesy, kindness, benevolence, and charity. It is Montesquieu who says that "the law of nations is founded upon the principle that every nation is bound in time of peace to do to every other nation all the good it possibly can, and in time of war the least evil it possibly can consistently with its own real interests." It is upon this humane principle that diplomatic intercourse is maintained among the civilized nations of the earth, all of whom are by the law of nations regarded as constituting one great commonwealth.

But, Mr. President, it will be said that, if we adopt this resolution, it will, however harmless it be in itself, furnish a precedent for mischievous intervention, either by ourselves in the affairs of other states or by other states in our affairs hereafter. To admit this argument is to admit distrust of ourselves. We certainly do not distrust our own sense of justice. We do not distrust our own wisdom. So long as we remain here, then, we shall be able to guard against any such abuse of this precedent. Let us also be generous instead of egotistical, and let us believe that neither wisdom nor justice will die with those who occupy these places now, but that our successors will be as just and as wise as we are. So far as the objection anticipates an abuse of this precedent by foreign states, I have only to say that if a foreign state shall ask of us just what we now propose, and no more, we shall have no difficulty and no ground of complaint. If it shall ask more, we shall be free to reject sympathy for the other nations and races of the world—and I trust I am not deficient in those feelings of consideration and sympathy—I must prefer my own country, my own race, the people and institutions among which I was born and in which I have been reared, to all other nations and all other races in the world. I cannot, therefore, consent to give my support to any measure, however commended to us by high considerations of sympathy, which, in my judgment, is capable of having an unjust and injurious operation upon the country to which I belong.

This resolution proposes that the Congress of the United States shall express, and that the Congress of the United States shall declare, and that we feel it our duty to express an earnest desire that the Queen of Great Britain will extend her royal clemency to certain Irish prisoners now confined, under a sentence, to Van Diemen's Land. Now, in the first place, I do not feel myself called upon by my duty as an American Senator to express any sentiment upon that subject. But that would be—that is—the smallest of the difficulties that press upon my mind. Though I cannot recognize the duty, yet if no evil consequences could be readily imagined to result from it, I might, nevertheless, be willing to give expression to the wish. But, sir, I ask you, who have had no little experience in the state and condition of our foreign affairs, and the management of our diplomatic relations with other countries, and the reciprocal operations of proceedings of this kind, whether we can affirm that there is no danger from the precedent which we are now setting?

My honorable friend from Michigan [Mr. Cass], in the remarks which he addressed to the Senate—remarks conceived and expressed, I will not say with a force and clearness that were not usual with him but certainly with great force and clearness—has laid down some propositions to which I wish to invite the attention of the Senate, and to show, if I can, that the mode by which he undertakes to defend the proceedings now recommended to us is one that must, or, at all events, one that may, lead to mischievous counterinterference with our concerns; and that the suggestions which he has thrown out for the purpose of dissipating the fear of such a result, when properly considered, are entitled to no weight.

First, the Senator laid down a proposition in these words: "Mr. President, a great change has taken place in the opinions of the world on the subject of political offences. They nowhere carry with them reproach or shame. They violate, indeed, existing laws; but they generally originate in the most praiseworthy motives, and are pursued at the hazard of every earthly good, as Washington and a host of other industrious men in ancient and modern days pursued their patriotic enterprises."

Again, he says:

"They" (alluding to political offenders) "are recognized as being unfortunate but not vicious. Indeed, they are often noble men, as are those whose case engages our attention, and who deserve the kind interest of the world, both from their motives and their character, and also from the position, once high, but now low, to which they have fallen, and in consequence of an effort, made, not for themselves, but for their country. It cannot be—there is not the slightest danger of it—that such a national application will ever be made, in any case but in one like this, which is as far from moral guilt as innocence is from crime. Let no one fear that this example will ever be used, or abused, for the purpose of intermeddling in the ordinary criminal proceedings of other powers."

Again, the honorable Senator says:

"As to improper interference, it seems to me an entire misconstruction of the term to apply it to a case like this. It is not interference at all; it is intercession. It is a simple request, made from the best motives, in the best spirit, and presented in the most unexceptionable language; and it leaves the British Government free to act its own pleasure, without giving us the slightest offence should the result be unsuccessful."

Now, I wish to say, in the first place, that this is interference. Intercession is one mode of interference. It is not an offensive mode of interference; but it is a mode of interference. He who undertakes to intercede between the judge and the offender—between the sovereign and his convicted subject, undoubtedly interferes. It seems to me that the honorable Senator is entirely mistaken in supposing that intercession is not interference. It is true that all interference is not intercession, because we may interfere by threats, by violence, by blows; but it is no less true that every intercession is an interference. Then I am not exactly prepared to admit the fundamental, the original proposition, from which the argument of the honorable Senator from Michigan starts, which is that political offences, though they violate existing laws, are yet offences accompanied with no moral guilt. I can conceive of such a thing as a political offence which, though violating municipal laws, is not accompanied with moral guilt; but I do not think it is regularly or generally the case, or can be affirmed as a proposition either universal or with but few exceptions. But, assuming it to be so:

treason against the United States, but influenced by high and noble motives, under the full inspiration of the "higher law" enthusiasm, which prompted them to come forward and at every hazard, not for the benefit of themselves, but, as my friend from Michigan said with regard to these gentlemen, for the benefit of their country, to relieve the oppressed, and to prevent the wronged and hunted wayfarer from being dragged back into the captivity from which he had luckily escaped. They would be looked upon as men influenced by a high and lofty spirit of hospitality, who, with outstretched arms, were willing, even at the hazard of destroying the Constitution of their country, to carry into effect the high, noble, and generous purposes and impulses of their nature. If we think that it is our duty to interpose, because we look upon these persons who have been sentenced to this punishment by a foreign nation as meritorious and noble men, entitled to our sympathies and accompanied with no moral blame—how can we resist the right of a foreign state, of a foreign parliament or legislative body, to interfere in precisely the same mode with regard to citizens of ours whom we may think worthy of the extremest punishment, but which they regard as occupying the same relation to moral guilt which we attribute to the persons in whose behalf this resolution is now proposed? We should cut ourselves off, by adopting this proceeding, from any right to object. I see not where the thing would end. Resolutions of the British Parliament may be passed and sent to us, or communicated to us, in a kind of indirect, secret, and unostentatious mode, to which the Senator has referred, through their minister in this country.

Upon this subject I wish to practice upon the old-fashioned morality of doing as I would be done by. I want no interference of foreign states or governments in our internal affairs anywhere, and therefore I am not willing to set a practical example of such an interference on our behalf with their internal concerns. I know that this resolution springs from the highest and best motives. I know that my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. Shields], who has moved it, has, at least in my judgment, no superior in the honorable, the fine, and elevated sentiments that belong to the human heart. But it was well remarked, as I think Sallust or some of those old Roman writers told us, that Caesar once said in the Roman Senate that there was never any course of measures which had brought ruin upon a country which, at the first outset, did not spring from some good motive, and in the initiative were intended to accomplish some good end.

then the honorable Senator says we come forward and do not interfere, but intercede for these political offenders upon the ground that they are persons free from moral guilt; that they are noble patriots who have been condemned to a grievous imprisonment—originally condemned to the forfeiture of life—for the discharge of high acts of patriotic duty to their country; and that the noblest motives influenced them in what they had done; and that they are not to be considered as affected with any species of moral guilt.

Now, be it so. Assume that it is so, and that we wish it to be so. How was the transaction viewed by the British Government? That Government prosecuted these men as traitors—for an attempt to overturn the existing government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. For this offence they were convicted. For this offence they received the sentence of death; but the sentence was afterward commuted to an expatriation or exile in Van Diemen's Land. It seems to me that the English Government will scarcely think that when they have prosecuted these men for an offence of this kind, pronounced by their laws to be capital, when after conviction and judgment they have not thought proper to pardon the convicts but have exchanged the sentence of death to that of banishment from the realm, that they are honorable and noble men, who have been influenced by high and patriotic motives in what they have done. The British Government looks upon them in a far different light and description. Well, that being the case, how does it follow that we have no reason to fear that if we set this example, we shall not have it followed with a very unpleasant and disagreeable interference in the administration of our own laws?

Now, let us suppose for one moment that some of the actors in the Christiana riot [for the liberation of fugitive slave] had been found guilty of high treason. They were indicted for that crime. High treason is a political offence. I pray you, sir, if that case would not in a few sympathizing minds, on the other side of the water, have presented a case with all the claims which the honorable Senator from Michigan brings forward in behalf of these Irish exiles, for the interference of the masses, or the governments, or the parliaments, or the other legislative assemblies on the other side of the water, under the strong feelings of modern humanity and general sympathy for the oppressed everywhere? Why, to those people these Christiana rioters would have appeared noble men—guilty, it is true, of committing the little technical offence of violating the municipal laws of the country, convicted, to be sure, of what was called

The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. Seward] in the remarks which he submitted to the Senate this morning, after reassuring us that there was no danger that Great Britain would take any offence at this proceeding, became exceedingly bold, and held in very slight regard and estimation any, even the most serious, displeasure of that power. I am not a very valiant man, and I confess myself to have a pretty large share of that extreme reluctance as well to cutting the throats of other people as to having my own cut which is denominated by the word fear. And I go one step further. In my representative capacity I have a great deal of fear of involving this country in collisions with the great powers of the earth. Who should not fear it? Is not war a dreadful evil? Is not a war with the greatest naval and commercial power of the earth a fearful evil?

I fear putting ourselves wrong in the outset of such a proceeding. If we must have a conflict with Great Britain, or any other nation, let us be right in the commencement, in the prosecution, and throughout the whole conflict. And rely upon it, sir, that when such a conflict comes, if come it must, which God forbid, those who have some little salutary fear beforehand of the coming emergency will not be found the least resolute to do what that emergency may require.

I have, however, an objection to this resolution of another and different kind from that suggested by the Senator from New York. It has been said by the Senator from Michigan that Great Britain will not regard this in the light of an officious intermeddling with her concerns. We hear from various quarters that the probability is that the British Government, acting upon this intimation of the wishes of the American people, will gladly interpose and discharge these gentlemen from their hard captivity. For one, I should be sorry that the British Government should, at our interposition, and as a favor to us, set these gentlemen at liberty. And why? Because it is very obvious that that places us under an obligation to the British Government. It not only entitles them to interfere, by way of interceding in behalf of our people, if any of them should be convicted of offences similar to that to which I have referred, but it also entitles them to come with a claim upon us that they should be heard. I, for one, am not willing that this country should lay itself under any such obligation to the clemency, or courteousness, or kindness of the British Queen.

Let us have a little common sense in the regulation of our concerns. Do not let us be carried away captive with emotions which, however generous and noble in themselves, do not furnish the proper guides for representative conduct. A man, in the private transactions of life, may allow a profuse generosity and inability to refuse any applicants for help to exhaust his purse and beggar himself for life; and when this is done, however severely we may disapprove of it, we are obliged to have a sympathy for him who, under such generous impulses, has sacrificed himself; but representatives and nations are bound, in my judgment, to have all their sympathies and feelings under thorough and complete control—to regulate themselves by understanding—to let common sense weigh, in all their deliberations, because they are not like a generous man who squanders his own, for, if they yield themselves up to these unguided impulses, they squander what is not their own—the wealth, the power, the resources of the state of which they are only the representatives. They sacrifice not themselves, but their country.

NON-INTERVENTION IN FOREIGN AFFAIRS

As a result of the debates on the Kossuth reception and the resolution of sympathy with the Irish patriots, John H. Clarke [R. I.], on January 19, 1852, introduced in the Senate the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Congress recognizes and reaffirms these manifest truths: "That governments are instituted among men to secure the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation upon such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

Resolved, That while we claim for ourselves these comprehensive rights of self-government, and also, as a consequence of sovereignty, the right to be exempt from the coercion, control, or interference of others in the management of our internal affairs, we concede to others the same measure of right, the same unqualified independence.

Resolved, That it is upon the sacred principle of independent sovereignty that we recognize, in our intercourse with other nations, governments de facto, without inquiring by what means they have been established, or in what manner they exercise their powers.

consent of any people by usurpation or by armed intervention of foreign states or nations.

Resolved, That, considering that the people of Hungary, in the exercise of the right secured to them by the laws of nations, in a solemn and legitimate manner asserted their national independence, and established a government by their own voluntary act, and successfully maintained it against all opposition by parties lawfully interested in the question; and that the Emperor of Russia, without just or lawful right, invaded Hungary and, by fraud and armed force, subverted the national independence and political constitution thus established, and thereby reduced that country to the condition of a province ruled by a foreign and absolute power: the United States, in defence of their own interests, and of the common interests of mankind, do solemnly protest against the conduct of Russia on that occasion as a wanton and tyrannical infraction of the laws of nations; and the United States do further declare that they will not hereafter be indifferent to similar acts of national injustice, oppression, and usurpation, whenever or wherever they may occur.

Lewis Cass [Mich.] also offered the following substitute for Senator Clarke's resolutions:

Resolved, That while the people of the United States sympathize with all nations who are striving to establish free governments, yet they recognize the great principle of the law of nations which assures to each of them the right to manage its own internal affairs in its own way, and to establish, alter, or abolish its government at pleasure, without the interference of any other Power; and they have not seen, nor could they again see, without deep concern, the violation of this principle of national independence.

On February 9 Senator Clarke spoke upon his resolutions and Senator Cass's substitute. Reply was made on February 10 by Senator Cass, and on March 9 by Senator Seward.

NON-INTERVENTION

SENATE, FEBRUARY 9-MARCH 9, 1852

SENATOR CLARKE.—These resolutions affirm the true doctrines of self-government, as set forth in the Declaration of our

Resolved, That this Government has solemnly adopted, and will perseveringly adhere to, as a principle of international action, the advice given by Washington in his Farewell Address: "Observe good faith and justice toward all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all." "Give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel an example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence." "Sympathy for a favorite nation betrays itself into a participation in the quarrels and wars of another, without adequate inducement or justification." "Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; for foreign influence is the most baneful foe of republican governments." "The true rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible." "Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice?"

Resolved, That, while we cherish the liveliest sympathy toward all who strive for freedom of opinion and for free institutions, yet we recognize our true policy in the great fundamental principles given to us by Jefferson: "Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political; peace, commerce, and honest friendship, with all nations, entangling alliances with none."

Resolved, That, although we adhere to these essential principles of non-intervention, as forming the true and lasting foundation of our prosperity and happiness, yet whenever a provident foresight shall warn us that our own liberties and institutions are threatened, then a just regard to our own safety will require us to advance to the conflict rather than await the approach of the foes of our constitutional freedom and of human liberty.

To these resolutions William H. Seward [N. Y.] offered the following amendment:

Strike out all after the second resolution and insert the following:

Resolved, That while the United States, in consideration of the exigencies of society, habitually recognize governments de facto in other states, yet that they are, nevertheless, by no means indifferent when such a government is established against the Independence. They take the farewell advice of the great and good Washington for our political chart, and they reiterate the wise declarations of Jefferson, whose precepts are oftener upon the lips than in the hearts of those who claim to be his peculiar disciples. His conservative principles, by no means extreme, are cast aside as the dogmas of a bygone age. Sir, it is time that we recur to our ancient political landmarks. As the mariner consults his chart, and takes by day the altitude of the sun, and at night his observations are directed to the stars, so, sir, it is healthful for us to go back to the principles and the policy of our Government—break upon the altar of our faith the sacramental bread, and renew our fidelity to the maxims which our fathers established, and which have borne them and us from feeble infancy to a high and vigorous and unsullied manhood.

Senator Clarke then recounted the events which had led up to Washington's Proclamation of Neutrality in the French-British War of 1793 [see Chapter I], and read the proclamation.

John Marshall, in his "Life of Washington," speaking of this proclamation, says:

"This measure derives importance from the consideration that it was the commencement of that system to which the American Government afterward inflexibly adhered, and to which much of the national prosperity is to be ascribed."

Mr. President, the policy of our Government, thus settled by Washington, has been confirmed and reaffirmed by succeeding statesmen from that to the present day, and can hardly be obliterated from the faith of either of the great parties of the country.

The Senator from Michigan has offered a substitute for the resolution which I propose—repudiating the Farewell Address of Washington.

Gently and tenderly he tells us that the interference of one nation in the affairs of another cannot be seen without "deep concern." But he proposes no definite action.

The substitute assumes "that the people of the United States sympathize with all nations who are striving to establish free governments," which is palpable, and to its utmost extent true. But the Senator from New York, in the amendment offered by him, goes more boldly to his purpose. In the first place, he would "protest" against national intervention, and afterward "would not be indifferent to similar acts of national injustice."

In a quarrel between the retainers of the rival houses of Montague and Capulet we have a fair example of this mode of warfare by protest. "Deep concern" and not being "indifferent to national injustice" (preceded by an avowal that no force is contemplated) is here well illustrated in the quarrel between the retainers of the houses.

"Abram. Do you bite your thumb at us, sir?

"Sampson. Is the law on our side if I say aye?

"Gregory. No.

"Sampson. I do not bite my thumb at you, sir; but I bite my thumb, sir.

"Gregory. Do you quarrel, sir?

"Abram. Quarrel, sir? No, sir."

The doctrine of non-intervention in the internal affairs of other nations has been the settled and reiterated policy of our country. A departure from these established truths can lead only to a resort to the strong arm, and put at hazard the rich inheritance of freedom which we enjoy, and the rich fruits which a benign Providence has mercifully bestowed upon us.

Far more are we doing for the liberation of man by our quiet and peaceful example than could possibly be effected by wasting our energies in a conflict of opinion with the despots of the world, and in favor of a people unsuited, by intelligence and education, to appreciate blessings prematurely forced upon them by even a Christian charity, which would waste itself and do them no good.

The liberty and happiness of our country, now and forever, may be in our keeping, and the solemn trust should be executed with judgment, with caution, and with prudence. The vast and incomprehensible influence of such a people will silently but surely work its way among the nations of the earth, and our institutions will shed a mild and gentle light upon degraded and oppressed humanity. It is our solemn duty carefully to cherish and preserve the rich blessings we enjoy, and which have never before been given to man, and not venture them upon the sea of every nation's disquietude. As that duty is performed, so will God and our own right arm protect us.

SENATOR CASS.—My objections to the original proposition are not to the great truths it enunciates—truths drawn from our own State papers, of the best days of the Republic, for to their eternal justice I yield a cheerful acquiescence—but to the narrow application it is designed to make of them. They met, and were intended to meet, the circumstances of the country, connected with our right to the new position we had assumed as a member of the family of nations, and with occurrences which took place not long afterward, but they went no further. The obligations which subsequent events might impose upon us in relation to ambitious pretensions, incompatible with the public law and the independence of nations, they neither foresaw nor defined. And thus is it that we must push our inquiry beyond these limits before we reach the great question of our true duty and policy now in face of us.

In the brief examination I propose to give to the subject before us, with a view to practical results rather than to profitless speculations, I have no intention of entering into the vexed question of the origin of international law, nor into the true grounds of the obligations by which civilized communities are required to submit to it. I assume at once the duty of all Christian people to recognize its binding force, and to aid its operations so far as they can properly do it. Certainly we cannot trace back this code to a universal legislative origin as we can trace back a municipal statute to its local source. It grew out of the necessity of regulating the intercourse between independent countries, in peace and in war; and traces of its existence may be found in the earliest recorded annals of nations. It began by assuaging the horrors of war, and by restraining the cruelties of barbarous conquerors; and by degrees, from a few simple maxims, it has become an elaborate system, coextensive with civilization, and appealing not less to the sense of interest than to that of morality by substituting fixed and just principles for those wayward passions which, without such an arbiter, would make the world one vast theater of carnage.

The elementary commentaries of wise and learned men, the decisions of enlightened jurists, and the discussions of able statesmen have built up the system, and it is a beautiful monument of the progress and improved condition of society. For it has not been a fixed and immutable code, but has accommodated itself to the advancing opinions and necessities of the world. Few and meager were at first its provisions, like the wants it was designed to meet; but, as these increased, it increased with them, till it has become one of the most useful, if not one of the proudest, works of the human intellect.

And let no one reproach it with inutilty or imbecility, because it is not always a barrier against interest and ambition; but rather let us be thankful that it is so often appealed to and so often effectual in restraining the turbulent passions of our nature. And such is the force of public opinion, in this the days of its strength, that, even when the provisions of international law are evaded or neglected, its obligations are rarely, never indeed, denied, but constructions for selfish purposes are put upon it, forced and false it is true, but a tribute to its worth, even while its injunctions are practically disregarded.

It well becomes us and the principles of our institutions to profess our fealty to this great code of public morality; and not merely to profess it, but prove it, by our acts and declarations, and labor to enforce its obligations and its observance. It is a curious subject to trace the changes it has undergone, even in very late years, almost all marked by the progress of just opinions and by meliorations honorable to the spirit of the age. It is a great engine for good, but powerless for evil—a barrier against injustice and oppression, asserting the empire of reason over that of force.

The time has come when we have as much right and as much power to speak authoritatively on this subject as any other nation on the face of the globe. All we want, while professing the duty of obedience, is that other nations should equally obey it. There is none so high as to be above its obligations; none so low as to be beneath its protection.

We believe in the right and in the capacity of man for self-government—not that he is everywhere prepared for institutions like ours. We know, while we regret, that he is not. But we believe that he is everywhere fitted even now for taking some part in the administration of political affairs, greater or less, in proportion to his experience and condition; and that everywhere, with time and practice, he may improve himself and his government till both become as free as the state of society will permit. And certainly the expression of the warm hope that this time will come and come speedily is consistent with every respect for other powers.

We claim no right to interfere in their internal concerns. While we are firm believers in our own political faith, we enter into no crusade to establish it elsewhere. Propagandism is no part of our creed, unless it be that propagandism which works its own way by the force of example, thus inviting the oppressed nations of the earth to do as we have done, and to be as free and happy as we are. But we cannot be indifferent to the condition of the human race, however widely scattered. A desire for its improvement, morally and materially, is a sentiment natural to man. And an American can hardly shut himself up in his own selfish egotism, thanking God, in the spirit of the Pharisee, that his country is better off than any other, and indifferent to the oppression, and degradation, and misery which centuries of bad government have entailed upon so large a portion of the earth. Unless the many were made for the few, the governed for the governors, our sympathies should be excited, as were those of Washington, for every people unfurling the banner of freedom, and a God-speed them be uttered, not only in the effort to improve their political system, but in the greater effort to maintain it by improving the condition of the great body of those for whom governments are instituted. And may we not say, as an English parliamentary orator said very recently for his country, "that the spirit of our people is for freedom everywhere?" And may we not echo his sentiment and declare "that they would not rest satisfied with seeing the ultima ratio of European policy lodged in the bayonet of the barbarian?"

Now, sir, what we want is that freedom should have a fair battlefield. That whenever a struggle is commenced to overthrow an arbitrary government, other despotic powers should not be permitted to take part in the contest and with foreign bayonets decide the issue.

Such is our desire, and this principle of non-interference is well established in the code of public law. It lies at the very foundation of national independence. I need not multiply proofs or illustrations of the truth of this doctrine. It was well laid down by Mr. Roebuck in the English House of Commons, when he said: "The important principle with which we have to deal was that in the internal affairs of any country there should be no external force or pressure." Its recognition goes back to the time of the Romans, for we are told that, when certain Carthaginians preferred charges against Hannibal, Scipio declared that the Roman senate would not be justified in intermeddling in the affairs of Carthage.

There is one highly respectable authority—and I know of no other—Vattel, who holds that, in a state of civil war, any other power may assist the party which it believes to be just. But it is obvious that such a principle would open every case to direct armed intervention at the will of any foreign government; which has only to say, such a party has justice on its side and I will aid it. Now, sir, this doctrine is contradicted as well by reason as by the whole current of authorities. Wildman, one of the most recent as well as one of the most able commentators on the law of nations, condemns the position of Vattel, into which he says he was led by "a misconstruction of a passage of Grotius," and "that it is as little reconcilable with reason as it is with precedent." He examines the cases fully and shows how erroneous is this doctrine, and announces the result thus:

"But this restriction of interference in favor of the cause of justice is an absolute prohibition of interference on the part of those who have no jurisdiction to determine the justice of the cause. Hence it follows that no foreign power has any right to interfere in the internal affairs of an independent state."

Establish this doctrine of Vattel, and the Emperor Nicholas, who no doubt believes every despotic cause a just one, would have a right to send his armies everywhere to repress the efforts of freedom.

The system of international law would not be worth the paper on which it is written if such examples of contempt for the feelings and rights of mankind as Russia has exhibited in the case of Hungary admitted neither resistance nor remonstrance. "Concession," says Bentham, in his forcible language, "Concession to notorious injustice invites fresh injustice"; and this is nowhere more true than in the career and conduct of nations. And we find that the right of independent powers to express their opinions upon grave questions of public law, when that law has been violated, has been so often and so openly exercised that no doubt can exist of the right and indeed of the duty of thus acting, when the nature and the gravity of the circumstances require such a measure.

It is the interest of each nation that the rights of all should be respected, because the spectator of injustice to-day may be its victim to-morrow; and none of the barriers against ambition and tyranny can be broken down without danger to the civilized world. Every power must judge for itself how far its own interests may be touched by the pretensions advanced, and what course true policy requires it should take. It is not necessary that the evil day should be upon it before it makes known its disapprobation, for, in that case, aggressions would be eternal, or war the only remedy to resist them.

We have a direct interest, a material interest, if you disclaim every principle of action but the utilitarian principle, in the benefits of commercial intercourse, and in the prosperity and stability and independence of nations, by which the resources and commerce of a country are increased, and in the maintenance of those great principles which protect these rights.

by other states or by both. It is an appeal to them. It calls for their opinion." A new school of expounders has arisen which denounces them as appeals to force.

Our own history presents a memorable example of the exercise of this right to declare a principle of national law. Mr. Monroe's views on a similar question, solemnly announced to Congress and the world, form a well-known part of our political history. And, though his doctrine has not been wholly efficacious, it has, no doubt, contributed, with other causes, to the stability of the independence of the American States, and to check the spirit of colonization.

Certainly solemn public declarations of this nature should not, would not indeed, often be made, for their frequent occurrence would impair, if not destroy, their moral effect. They should be reserved for those extraordinary events, affecting the honor and stability of all nations, which stand prominently forward in the history of the world; characteristics, indeed, of the age in which they occur. Let no man, therefore, object that such a conservative remedy, for once the epithet is a just one, will lead to abuse or will destroy itself by too frequent application.

We ought neither to mistake our position nor neglect the obligations it brings with it. We have at length reached the condition of one of the great powers of the earth, and yet we are but in the infancy of our career. The man is now living who will live to see one hundred and fifty millions of people, free, prosperous, and intelligent, swaying the destinies of this country, and exerting a mighty influence upon those of the world. And why not, Mr. President? Is it not likely to be more beneficially exerted than the influence now exercised by the despotic powers of the earth? No one can doubt this. Why, sir, even Vattel, enlightened as he was, tells us that "the law of nations is the law of sovereigns. It is principally for them and for their ministers, that it ought to be written," etc. The age has got far beyond this degrading doctrine. That law was made for the great civilized community of the world, and its obligations and their violations will be judged by this high tribunal, and its voice will become, from day to day, louder and more efficacious. Let us aid it by the expression of our views, whenever questions arise interesting to all the members of the great commonwealth of nations. There are no considerations of right or expediency to restrain us from such a course; for, as I have shown, we are just as free to act or forbear, after such a declaration, as before. But, it has been asked, why pro-

But I agree with one of the most independent of the public men of England, Mr. Roebuck, that higher considerations may justly influence our actions, and that "we should not bind up all our feelings in the interchange of commodities, or the sordid question of profit or loss. He believed there was something more in the souls of the people than that." And the sentiment, advanced by Lord Palmerston, that a great country should not "be a passive and mute spectator of everything that goes on around" deserves our commendation and concurrence.

There is not a page of modern diplomatic history in which may not be read the outlines I have already referred to of national conduct. But a strange error seems to prevail respecting one branch of this subject which it is necessary to examine, not from the support it derives from reason or authority, but from the confidence with which it is urged, and because, if not corrected, it may paralyze the national action in all time to come.

This erroneous doctrine has been widely and confidently spread and seeks to deter us from expressing any opinion upon the law of nations by an apprehension of the consequences. It is maintained that in all cases where a nation makes such a declaration it is bound to support its views by war if these are not acquiesced in, or it will lose its own self-respect and subject itself to the contumely of the world. There is not the least foundation in reason or authority or precedent, for such an assumption. It is gratuitous as it is untenable.

Mr. President, the particular form in which a nation makes known its views, from the most common diplomatic note to the most solemn protests, neither adds to nor takes from its responsibility or obligation. It appears to be assumed that there is some peculiar pugnacious quality attached to a protest which necessarily leads to armed action. This is not so. A public declaration in that form no more imposes on the nation making it the duty of vindicating it by arms than the every day representations which the usual diplomatic intercourse renders necessary. To be sure, the proceeding is more solemn, as the subjects generally are more grave; and it goes forth to the world under circumstances of deliberation which give to such declarations more than usual importance. But that they are necessarily followed by war whenever they fail in the result is contradicted by all the diplomatic experience of modern times.

"Manifestoes," says Bentham, and such declarations are a kind of protest, "are in common usage. A manifesto is designed to be read either by the subjects of the state complained of or claim your opinion unless you mean to maintain it by the strong hand? For the same reason that countless representations and remonstrances have been made by independent powers when they had reason to apprehend the adoption of measures hostile to the just principles of national intercommunication. To mark their disapprobation of the act and of the doctrine, that their silence might not be construed into acquiescence, and that, when, in the mutation of political affairs, the proper time should come they might interpose effectually, if they should desire it, not concluded by the success of violence nor by the lapse of time; that the power itself, contemplating the step, might pause and review its position and its pretensions and the consequences to which it might be led; not knowing, of course, what measures might follow these appeals to its sense of right should they fail to be effectual; and, above all, that the public opinion of the world should be rightly instructed and brought to aid these peaceful efforts to preserve the rights of mankind.

It has been said, in condemnation or in reproach of this effort, that there are many other suffering people and violated principles calling equally for the assertion of this right, and why, it is asked sneeringly, if not triumphantly, why do you not extend your regards and your action to all such cases? And as that is impossible with any useful result, as every one knows, we are, therefore, to sit still and do nothing because we cannot do everything. Such is no dictate of wisdom or duty, either in political or ethical philosophy. The prudent statesman looks to what is practicable, as well as what is right.

Many objections, more or less plausible, have been presented to deter us from any action in this matter, but not one of them with more confidence of pertinacity, nor with less regard to the true circumstances of our position, than that which warns us that by such a proceeding we should violate alike the traditions of our policy and the advice of our wisest statesmen, and especially the injunctions of Washington and Jefferson. Never were just recommendations more inappropriately applied than in this attempt to apply the views of those great men to the circumstances in which we are placed.

Non-intervention, it is said, was the policy they maintained and the legacy they bequeathed to us; but is it possible that a single American can be found who believes that either of those patriots would condemn the declaration of his country's opinion upon a great question of public law because they condemned its interference with the affairs of other nations? Why, this is our affair, sir; an affair as interesting to us as to any other community on the face of the globe; one which involves the safety of independent states, and the true intent and obligation of the code that regulates their intercourse.

What did Washington say on this subject? These are his words:

"It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world."

"Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her [European] politics, or the ordinary circumstances or collisions of her friendships and enmities."

These sentiments speak for themselves and are commended no less by the authority that uttered them than by their own justice to the American people. Ingenuity itself cannot torture them into the service of the opposition to the present proposition, one which seeks no "alliances" and asks for no "artificial ties." It limits itself to a simple declaration of opinion.

And the authority of Mr. Jefferson has been invoked with as little reason in condemnation of this measure. "Peace," said that Patriarch of the Democratic faith, "Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations; entangling alliances with none." Why, sir, there is no room for argument between the man who gives to this language of Mr. Jefferson its true and natural import and him who applies it to the assertion of a great national right. They have no common ground to stand upon. When the declaration of an important principle, common to all nations and made in connection with none, is shown to be an entangling alliance with one of them, then may this sentiment be appealed to and the people warned against its violation.

Mr. President, the wonderful advance of skill and science has brought Europe nearer to us now than was Savannah to Philadelphia at the adoption of the Constitution. And similar causes are probably destined yet more to diminish the distance; and the increase of the moral and material interchange consequent upon the progress of the age has not been less remarkable than the increase in the facilities of intercourse. We cannot be insensible to the onward march of events in the old hemisphere, nor indifferent to their operation upon the great mass of the people. Undoubtedly Europe, to some extent, has peculiar interests and a peculiar policy, with which we have no concern. Dynastic laws, the balance of power, the influence claimed by five great states—these and other maxims of policy give rise to questions with which we have no desire to intermeddle. But, war is nevertheless to come, it must come in retaliation of the protest, and by the act of Russia, or of Austria, or of both. Assume, now, that it shall so come, will it be just? The protest is a remonstrance addressed to the conscience of Russia, and, passing beyond her, carries an appeal to the reason and justice of mankind. As by the municipal law no remonstrance or complaint justifies a blow, so by the law of nations no remonstrance or complaint justifies war. The war then would be unjust, and so the protest would be not a cause, but a pretext. But a nation that will declare war on a pretext will either fabricate one or declare war without any.

And now, honorable Senators, I ask, if we are to shrink from this duty through fear of unjust retaliation, what duty shall we not shrink from under the same motive? And what will be the principle of our policy when thus shrinking from obligations but fear instead of duty?

And who are we, and who are Austria and Russia, that we should fear them when on the defence against an unjust war? I admit, and I hope all my countrymen will learn it without a trial, that we are not constituted for maintaining long, distant wars of conquest or of aggression. But, in a defensive war levied against us on such a pretext, the reason and the sympathies of mankind would be on our side, cooperating with our own instincts of patriotism and self-preservation. Our enemies would be powerless to harm us, and we should be unconquerable.

Why, then, I ask, shall we refrain from the protest? The answer comes up on all sides: Since, then, the measure is pacific, Russia will disregard it, and so it will be useless. Well, what if it should? It will at least be harmless. But Russia will not disregard it. It is true that we once interpleaded between the belligerents of Europe twenty-five years by protests and remonstrances in defence of our neutral rights, and vindicated them at last by resistance against one party, and open, direct war against the other. But all that is changed now. Our flag was then a stranger on the seas; our principles were then unknown. Now, both are regarded with respect and affection by the people of Europe. And that people, too, are changed. They are no longer debased and hopeless of freedom, but, on the contrary, are waiting impatiently for it, and ready to second our expressions of interest in their cause. The British nation is not without jealousy of us. Let us only speak out. Do you think that they would be silent? No, sir. And when the United States and Great Britain should once speak, the ever-fraternizing bayonets of the army of France, if need were, would open a mouth besides these, there are great principles of the laws of national intercommunication often coming up for discussion and decision in Europe, and which affect the interest and the safety of all the independent states of the world. The former we may regard merely with the natural interest which is felt in passing events; but the latter we should watch with sleepless vigilance, taking care that no innovation be established in the public laws without our consent, to which we should be called upon to submit hereafter on the ground of its having been sanctioned by time and acquiescence; as the right to search our vessels would have been established had we not resisted the claim at its very inception.

Mr. President, it has often been said that we have a mission to fulfill, and so, indeed, has every nation; and the first mission of each is to conduct its own affairs honestly and fairly, for its own benefit; but after that its position and institutions may give to it peculiar influence in the prevailing moral and political controversies of the world which it is bound to exert for the welfare of all. While we disclaim any crusading spirit against the political institutions of other countries, we may well regard with deep interest the struggling efforts of the oppressed through the world, and deplore their defeat, and rejoice in their success. And can any one doubt that the evidences of sympathy which are borne to Europe from this great Republic will cheer the hearts, even when they do not aid the purposes, of the down-trodden masses to raise themselves, if not to power, at least to protection? Whatever duties may be ultimately imposed on us by that dark future which overshadows Europe, and which we cannot foresee, and ought not to undertake to define, circumstances point out our present policy, while at the same time they call upon us to exert our moral influence in support of the existing principles of public law, placed in danger not merely by the ambition but still more by the fear of powerful monarchs—the fear lest the contagion of liberty should spread over their dominions, carrying destruction to the established systems of oppression.

Our present duty and policy are to place our views upon record, thus avoiding conclusions against us and reserving all our rights and all our remedies, whatever these may be, for future consideration, when the proper exigency may arise.

SENATOR SEWARD.—If war is to follow this protest, then it must come in some way, and by the act of either ourselves or our enemy. But the protest is not a declaration, nor a menace, nor even a pledge of war in any contingency. War, then, will not come in that way, nor by or in consequence of our act. If for the voice of that impulsive and generous nation. Who believes that Russia, despotic as she is, would brave the remonstrances of these three great powers, sustained as they would be by the voice of Christendom? Sir, I do not know that this protest will do Hungary or European democracy any good. It is enough for me that, like our first of orators (Mr. Webster) in a similar case, I can say, "I hope it may."

And now, sir, why must we go to war to sustain our protest? You may say, because we should be dishonored by abandoning an interest so solemnly asserted. Sir, those who oppose the protest are willing to forsake the cause of Hungary now. Will it be more dishonorable to relinquish it after an earnest effort than to abandon it without any effort at all in its behalf? Sir, if it be mere honor that is then to prick us on, let the timid give over their fears. A really great, enlightened, and Christian nation has just as much need to make war on a false point of honor as a really great, enlightened, and Christian man has need to engage in a personal contest in the same case; and that is no necessity at all. Nor shall we be reduced to the alternative of war. If Hungary shall never rise, there will be no casus belli. If she shall rise, we shall have right to choose the time when to recognize her as a nation. That recognition, with its political influence and commercial benefits, will be adequate to prevent or counterbalance Russian intervention. But I am answered that we shall unnecessarily offend powers whom it is unwise to provoke. I reply that it is not enough for a nation that it has no enemies. Japan and China are in that happy condition. It is necessary that a state should have some friends. To us, exemption from hatred obtained by insensibility to crime is of no value; still less is the security obtained by selfishness and isolation. Only generosity ever makes friends, and those that it does bring are grateful and enduring.

There remains the objection that flows so readily from all conservative pens and tongues on this side of the Atlantic, and still more freely from the stipendiary presses of Paris and Vienna, that a protest would be a departure from the traditional policy of our country and from the precepts of Washington. It is passing strange, sir, that Louis Napoleon and Francis Joseph should take so deep an interest in our adherence to our principles, and in our reverence of the memory of him who inculcated them, not for the immunity of tyrants, but for the security of our own welfare.

Sir, granting for a moment that Washington inculcated just such a policy as is claimed by my opponents, is it so entirely certain that it ought always and under all circumstances to be pursued? Here is a message of his in 1792 that illustrates the policy he adopted toward, not one only, but all the Barbary Powers, and it received, I think, the unanimous and favorable response of the Senate of the United States.

Here the Senator read Washington's proposition to ransom American captives in Algiers, and pay tribute to the Berber Government.

Sir, you and I and all of us would have answered in the affirmative to these questions, had we lived and occupied these places in the last century. I desire to ascertain how many votes such a treaty would receive here now? And I address myself to the honorable Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Clarke], who moved resolutions against any departure from the policy of Washington. Would you, sir, pay a Barbary pirate $40,000 to ransom thirteen captives, and $25,000 bonus, and $25,000 annually, for exemption from his depredations. He looks dissentingly. I demand from the honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Stockton], who in the triple character of Senator, Commodore, and General, presided at the Birthday Congressional Banquet in honor of Washington, and dishonor of his Hungarian disciple, Kossuth, would you, sir? No, not he. All who are in favor of such a treaty, let them say aye. What, sir, not one vote in the Senate of the United States for the continuance of what was in its time a wise and prudent as well as humane policy of Washington? No, not one. And why, sir? The answer is easy: The times have changed, and we have changed with them.

I will not venture on such a question as whether humanity and justice may not in some contingencies require that we should afford substantial aid to nations as weak as we were in our revolutionary contest.

It is clear enough, however, that we distrust our strength seldom except when such diffidence will serve as a plea for the non-performance of some obligation of justice or of humanity. But it is not necessary to press such inquiries. What is demanded here is not any part of our fifty millions of annual revenue, nor any use of our credit, nor any employment of our Army or of our Navy, but simply the exercise of our free right of speech. If we are not strong enough now to speak, when shall we be stronger? If we are never to speak out, for what were national lungs given us?

Senators and Representatives of America, if I may borrow the tone of that sturdy republican, John Milton, I would have you consider what nation it is of which you are governors—a nation quick and vigorous of thought, free and bold in speech, prompt and resolute in action, and just and generous in purpose—a nation existing for something, and designed for something more than indifference and inertness in times of universal speculation and activity. Why else was this nation chosen, that "out of her, as out of Sinai, should be proclaimed and sounded forth the first tidings and trumpet" of political reformation to all nations? I would have you remember that the love of liberty is a public affection which this nation has deeply imbibed and has effectually diffused throughout the world; and that she cannot now suppress it, nor smother her desires to promote that glorious cause, for it is her own cause.

Let others employ themselves in devising new ligaments to bind these States together. For myself, I am content with the old ones just as I find them. I believe that the Union is founded in physical, moral, and political necessities, which demand one Government and would endure no divided States. I believe, also, that it is righteousness, not greatness, that exalteth a nation, and that it is liberty, not repose, that renders national existence worth possessing.

It has already come to this, that whenever in any country an advocate of freedom, by the changes of fortune, is driven into exile, he hastens to seek an asylum here; that whenever a hero falls in the cause of freedom on any of her battlefields, his eyes involuntarily turn toward us, and he commits that cause with a confiding trust to our sympathy and our care. Never, sir, as we value the security of our own freedom, or the welfare and happiness of mankind, or the favor of Heaven that has enabled us to protect both, let that exile be inhospitably repulsed. Never let the prayer of that dying hero fall on ears unused to hear, or spend itself upon hearts that refuse to be moved.

CHAPTER XI

"FIFTY-FOUR FORTY OR FIGHT"

[THE OREGON BOUNDARY]

Lewis F. Linn [Mo.] Introduces in Senate Bill to Assert Claims to the Territory of Oregon Against Great Britain—Debate: in Favor, Thomas H. Benton [Mo.], Levi Woodbury [N. H.]; Opposed, John C. Calhoun [S. C.], George McDuffie [S. C.]; Carried—Bill Is Reported Adversely in the House—Abortive Negotiations with the British Minister—President James K. Polk Asserts "Our Title to the Whole of Oregon" (54° 40')—Resolutions to This Effect Are Introduced in the Senate by Edward A. Hannegan [Ind.]—Debate: in Favor, Hannegan, William Allen [O.], Lewis Cass [Mich.], Sydney Breese [Ill.]; Opposed, John C. Calhoun [S. C.], Thomas H. Benton [Mo.], John J. Crittenden [Ky.], Daniel Webster [Mass.], William L. Dayton [N. J.], William H. Haywood [N. C.]—Charles J. Ingersoll [Pa.] Introduces Resolutions in the House to Give Notice to Great Britain Terminating Joint Occupancy of Oregon—Debate: in Favor, Henry W. Hilliard [Ala.], Howell Cobb [Ga.], Stephen A. Douglas [Ill.]; Opposed, William L. Yancey [Ala.], Robert M. T. Hunter [Va.], Jefferson Davis [Miss.]—New Resolutions Are Passed Authorizing the President to Continue Negotiations—Treaty Is Signed Fixing the Boundary at 49° N. L.

WHILE a treaty, completed with Great Britain in August, 1842 (the Webster-Ashburton Treaty), had fixed the northeastern boundary of the United States, the northwestern boundary remained in dispute. Several thousand Americans had permanently settled in the Oregon region, entering chiefly into the fur trade, and there arose a strong patriotic sentiment in the Northern and Western States to secure the entire Pacific region northward to the Russian occupation (54 degrees and forty minutes north latitude).¹ They viewed with anxiety the subsequent encroachments of the Hudson Bay Company in introducing British immigrants into the region, shepherds and farmers, and erecting forts there, pushing southward as far as California, and eastward to the Rocky Mountains, as well as the decree of Parliament which extended the criminal laws of Great Britain to the very confines of Arkansas and Missouri.

As early as December 29, 1839, Lewis F. Linn (Missouri) had introduced in the Senate resolutions declaring that the title of the United States to the Territory of Oregon was indisputable and would never be abandoned; that the laws of the United States should be extended over the Territory; that regular troops should be sent there for the protection of the settlers against the Indians and any foreign force which might seize the country, and that land be freely offered to settlers. He did not press the resolutions, being dissuaded by other Congressmen who feared that the negotiations with Great Britain over the northeastern boundary would thereby be embarrassed. Therefore they did not come up for discussion until January 9, 1843.

The bill was passed on February 3 by a vote of 24 to 22. The chief speakers in its behalf were Thomas H. Benton (Missouri) and Levi Woodbury (New Hampshire). Its leading opponents were John C. Calhoun (South Carolina) and George McDuffie (South Carolina).

THE OREGON BILL

SENATE, JANUARY 9-FEBRUARY 3, 1843

SENATOR BENTON.—British interests have grown up on the Columbia; and the British Government owes protection to these interests, and will give it! This is now the language of British ministers; and this is what we have got for forty years' forbearance to assert our title! The nest-egg laid by British diplomacy has undergone incubation, and has hatched, and has produced a full-grown bird—a game cock—which has clapped his wings and crowed defiance in the face of the American eagle! and this poor eagle, if a view could be got of him as he stood during the "informal conferences" between Mr. Webster and Lord Ashburton, would be found (no doubt) to have stuck his head under his wing, and hung out the white and craven feather.

British interests have grown up on both sides of the Columbia—to the south as well as to the north of the river—and it is the intention of the British Government to protect the whole. So say Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Addington. But this is diplomacy—modern diplomacy—equivalent to finesse. The south of the Columbia has not been seized to be retained, but to be given up! The north is to be retained, for that is the commanding bank. The south is only seized to be given up as an equivalent, according to the modern system of compromising so successfully introduced in the case of Maine. Seize all! then give back half! call this a compromise! and there will be people (for the minds of men are various)—there will be people to applaud the fine arrangement, and to thank God for such a happy deliverance from war. No, sir; no. This is a joke about holding on to the south bank. The settlements made there are for surrender, not for retention. They are made there to be given up as equivalents for what is taken from us on the north; and thus settle the Columbia question according to the precedent of Maine.

But the settlements on the north bank—there protection is no joke. The British mean to hold on to them, for they command the remainder. And, after the experiment which the British have just made of our peace-loving temper, it is not to be supposed that we shall get out of this scrape without seeing the match applied to the priming, or having the cup of dishonor held to our lips until we drink it to the dregs.

SENATOR WOODBURY.—I am glad to find that there is not a single member of the Senate who seems to entertain the slightest doubt of our just title to the entire territory. All contend that our right to all we claim is indefeasible. Why, then, should there be any hesitation about exercising our ownership over the territory?

Our citizens, who have cast their fortunes in the territory, claim our protection, and it is our duty to grant it. It is the duty of the United States to protect our citizens in their lawful pursuits on every portion of our territory, no matter how remote or inconvenient from the nucleus of Government. It is the duty of Congress to extend its territorial laws for the benefit of those remotely settled citizens.

Senator Calhoun opposed the bill on the ground that in the existing "imbecile condition of the Government" the worthy Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. Woodbury) seems to have discovered a principle much more potent than the representative principle. He refers you to steam, as far more potent. I should doubt very much whether the elements, or powers, or organization of the principles of government, will ever be changed by steam. Steam! How are we to apply steam in this case? Has the Senator examined the character of the country? What is the character of the country? Why, about seven hundred miles this side of the Rocky Mountains is uninhabitable, where rain scarcely ever falls—a barren sandy soil.¹ On the other side—we have it from a very intelligent gentleman, sent to explore that country by the State Department, that there are three successive ridges of mountains extending toward the Pacific, and running nearly parallel; which mountains are totally impassable, except in certain parts, where there are gaps or depressions, to be reached only by going some hundred of miles out of the direct course. Well, now, what are we to do in such a case as this? How are you going to apply steam? Have you made anything like an estimate of the cost of a railroad running from here to the mouth of the Columbia? Why, the wealth of the Indies would be insufficient. You would have to tunnel through mountains five or six hundred miles in extent.² It is true, they have constructed a tunnel beneath the Thames; but at a vast expenditure of capital. With a bankrupt treasury, and a depressed and suffering people, to talk about constructing a railroad to the western shore of this continent manifests a wild spirit of adventure which I never expected to hear broached in the Senate of the United States. And is the Senate of the United States to be the last intrenchment where we are to find this wild spirit of adventure which has involved this country in ruin? I believe that the farmers, the honest cultivators of the soil, look now only to God, in His mercy, and their own labor to relieve them from the wretchedness in which the wild and visionary schemes of adventure have involved them.

The bill went to the House, where it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The committee on February 16, 1843, reported against its adoption and no action upon it was taken during the session.

¹ This region was known at the time and for many years afterward as "The Great American Desert." It was so designated in the school geographies.

² The Senator evidently thought that the tunneling would be lengthwise under the ridges!

it would be impolitic to risk war with so great a naval power as Great Britain over a region which it would be almost impossible for us to occupy with forces sent overland. It was because he wished to retain the Territory that he advised that events be allowed to take their natural course.

There is only one means by which it can be preserved, but that, fortunately, is the most powerful of all—time. Time is acting for us; and, if we shall have the wisdom to trust to its operation, it will assert and maintain our right with resistless force, without costing a cent of money, or a drop of blood. There is often, in the affairs of government, more efficiency and wisdom in non-action, than in action. All we want to effect our object in this case, is "a wise and masterly inactivity." Our population is rolling toward the shores of the Pacific, with an impetus greater than we realize. As the region west of Arkansas and the State of Missouri, and south of the Missouri River, is occupied by half-civilized tribes, who have their lands secured to them by treaty, the spread of population is prevented in that direction, causing this great and increasing tide to take the comparatively narrow channel to the north of that river and south of our northern boundary. Some conception may thus be formed of the strength with which the current will run in that direction, and how soon it will reach the eastern gorges of the Rocky Mountains. I say some conception; for I feel assured that the reality will outrun the anticipation.

SENATOR McDUFFIE.—What do we want with this territory? What are we to do with it? What is to be the consequence of our taking possession of it? What is the act we are called on now to do? Why, it is neither more nor less than an act of colonization, for the first time proposed since the foundation of this Government. If this were a question of gradual, and continuous, and progressive settlement—if the territory, to which our citizens are invited, were really to become a part of this Union, it would present a very different question. But, sir, does any man seriously suppose that any State which can be formed at the mouth of the Columbia River, or any of the inhabitable parts of that territory, would ever become one of the States of this Union? I have great faith in the power of the representative principle to extend the sphere of government; but I confess that, even in the most sanguine days of my youth, I never conceived the possibility of embracing within the same government people living five thousand miles apart. But, sir,

DECLARATION OF PRESIDENT POLK

Early in 1844 Senator Calhoun was appointed Secretary of State by President Tyler. From July, 1844, until January, 1845, he conducted negotiations in the Oregon Territory with the British minister, Richard Pakenham, but these proved abortive, Pakenham demanding as the boundary the line of 49 degrees north latitude as far westward as the crossing of the Columbia river, and, from this point onward, the river, but agreeing to have the question arbitrated, and Calhoun, while receding from the contention that 54 degrees and 40 minutes north latitude was the proper boundary, insisting on the line of 49 degrees westward from its crossing with the Columbia river to the Pacific Ocean, and refusing to consider arbitration.

This refusal, followed, as it shortly was, by the bold declaration, in his inaugural address, of President Polk, that "our title to the whole of Oregon" was indisputable, and must be maintained, raised a strong feeling in Great Britain and Canada for war with the United States.

It was clearly seen that assertion of the claim of the Territory as far north as the line of Russian occupation—54 degrees and 40 minutes north latitude—would precipitate hostilities with the greatest naval power in the world, the outcome of which would probably be the loss of the territory between the mouth of the Columbia River and 49 degrees north latitude, if not of all the American possessions on the Pacific coast.

Accordingly, after consultation with Senator Thomas H. Benton, the Secretary of State, James Buchanan, proposed to the British Government that the boundary be fixed at 49 degrees. This was refused. The knowledge of the offer leaked out, and the extremists in the Democratic party were greatly incensed at this recession from the claim in the Democratic platform upon which the President had been elected, and from the declaration of his inaugural address. To appease them, Secretary Buchanan formally withdrew his offer, and in his annual message on December 2, 1845, the President again assented "our title to the whole of Oregon," and also advised that notice be given to Great Britain that the United States would terminate the joint occupancy of the territory agreed upon in 1827.

In the Senate on December 18 William Allen (Ohio) introduced a resolution authorizing the President to give such notice, and on December 30 Edward A. Hannegan (Indiana) introduced resolutions that "the whole" of Oregon belonged to the United States; that there was no power in the Government to alienate any part of the national domain, nor to transfer to another government the allegiance of its citizens, and that the surrender of Oregon in particular would be an "abandonment of the honor, character, and the best interests of the American people." To these latter resolutions John C. Calhoun (South Carolina) opposed others, declaring that the President and Senate had the constitutional power to make treaties, which included the adjustment of contested boundaries, and accordingly that the President, in proposing the line of 49 degrees north latitude, did not exceed his power, nor "abandon the honor, the character, or the best interests of the American people." In the interest of peace, Calhoun proposed resumption of negotiations with Great Britain, and therefore a continuance of the joint occupancy of Oregon. Senators Allen and Hannegan then urged a resolution directing the President to give Great Britain the twelve months' notice designated in the convention for terminating this occupancy.

In the debate which ensued leading speakers who demanded that there be no recession from the claim of the whole of the territory in dispute, and who therefore opposed Senator Calhoun's motion were Hannegan, Allen, Lewis Cass (Michigan) and Sydney Breese (Illinois); the speakers who were willing to compromise on the line of 49 degrees north latitude were Calhoun, Thomas H. Benton (Missouri), John J. Crittenden (Kentucky), Daniel Webster (Massachusetts), William L. Dayton (New Jersey) and William H. Haywood (North Carolina).

SENATOR CALHOUN.—The Senator from Indiana [Mr. Hannegan] has endeavored to draw a contrast between my course upon the Texas question and his course upon this. The views which governed me upon that question govern me also upon this. I pursued in reference to Texas what I conceived to be the best course. If I acted boldly and promptly on that occasion, it was because boldness and promptness were necessary to success. It was the golden opportunity; and one year's delay would have lost Texas to us forever. If I am for more deliberate measures on this occasion, it is not because I am not a friend to Oregon. I believe that precipitancy will lose you Oregon forever—no, not forever; but it will lose you Oregon in the first struggle, and then it will require another struggle hereafter, when we become stronger, to regain it.

If you institute a comparison between Oregon and Texas, I would say that the former is as valuable to us as the latter, and I would as manfully defend it. If the Senator and myself disagree, we disagree only as to the means of securing Oregon and not as to its importance. I do not suppose that the Senator intends to reflect upon the President; but there can be no difference, as far as the principle involved in this question is concerned, between the circumstances when the proposition for a division at the forty-ninth parallel was made and now. It was as sensible then to make the offer as it would be now.

SENATOR ALLEN.—In the assertion of her claims, Great Britain has not been influenced so much by her actual right to what she claims as by her own imaginary superiority over us in strength. And this view has entered into the arguments of those among ourselves who are opposed to a proper vindication of our rights; who maintain that we ought to surrender them because we are not in a condition to resist the power of Great Britain, and because, owing to her vast superiority, she will obtain what she claims at the point of the sword. We are therefore not only compelled to receive the tone of our thoughts and feelings from her but also her mandates. All this was made well understood in England; and, in all the Parliamentary speeches, we never heard of any one who asserted that she is not able to carry her purposes through, or that her power is even likely to be weakened in a contest with our Democracy. No one there urged timid counsels in order to paralyze her arm. She tells us that she has rights in Oregon which she will cause to be respected; and that if we adopt certain measures she will consider the act as cause of war. There is no crouching there, by declarations that she is not prepared. Had it been with

THE OREGON COMPROMISE

SENATE, DECEMBER 30, 1845-MARCH 31, 1846

SENATOR HANNEGAN.—The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Calhoun] will not deny that the whole aspect of the question has been changed since the proposition of the President, by the peremptory and almost contemptuous refusal of the British minister. If it were not so, I am a freeman as well as the President of the United States; and although I have ever been his political friend, and ever expect to be so, yet, if the President on any occasion or occasions assume a position which I can not endorse, I have the right, and will maintain it—as well here as at home—to express my sentiments without intending, desiring, or wishing to convey any censure. I represent the same people that the President does, and, as such representative, I have a right to express my views on all questions pertaining to the Government. If the adoption of my resolutions, which contain the immutable principles of truth, shall bring war on us, let war come! What American is there who, through fear of war, would hesitate to declare the truth in this Chamber?

There has been a singular course pursued on this Oregon question contrasting strangely with a precisely similar question—the annexation of Texas. Texas and Oregon were born the same instant, nursed and cradled in the same cradle—the Baltimore Convention—and they were at the same instant adopted by the democracy throughout the land. There was not a moment's hesitation, until Texas was admitted, but, the moment she was admitted, the peculiar friends of Texas turned, and were doing all they could to strangle Oregon! But the country were not blind or deaf. The people see, they comprehend, and I trust they will speak. It is a most singular state of things. We were told that we must be careful not to involve ourselves in a war with England on a question of disputed boundary. There was a question of disputed boundary between us and Mexico; but did we hear, from the same quarter, any warnings against a collision with Mexico when we were about to consummate the annexation of Texas?

Senator Hannegan closed by saying that he never would consent to a surrender of any portion of the country north of 49 degrees, nor one foot by treaty or otherwise under the line of 54 degrees 40 minutes north latitude.

Mexico instead of Great Britain that we had had to deal, we should have given this notice and been in possession of the territory fifteen years ago.

Great Britain will calculate the effect of the measure on her own interests, and, if she finds they are not likely to be benefited, she will find a way to evade a contest. She has colonies which she cannot afford to lose, while our possessions lie contiguous, and are confined to our soil. And even could she obtain Oregon, she would not be able to retain it twenty-five years before it would be reached and occupied by an advancing population which is doubling every few years. The first act of our Government, in case of war, would be to expel the British power from all her possessions on this continent. Knowing this, she will count the cost before she goes into a war. Before she could assail us, she would have to cross three thousand miles of the Atlantic. All the armed navies she could collect could not subjugate this country.

Of all the five allied Powers of Europe, England is the weakest. A single defeat ensures her fall.

During the wars of the close of the last century she was compelled to incur her heavy debt in order to pay the foreign navies which she subsidized, taxing her people to the amount of sixty-five millions of pounds annually for twelve years. And notwithstanding she has enjoyed thirty years of peace, this enormous debt still remains unreduced, and her taxes amount now to fifty-two millions of pounds per annum—little less than when she had all the navies of Europe in her pay. She is at this moment a pauper; for in one year, when her taxes amounted to fifty-two millions, the total value of her exports reached only fifty-one millions. Yet in this condition of weakness and poverty she is held up to us as a power from which we are to turn and run. Our Government is strong enough for all the purposes of our destiny, and nothing is required but to expel the delusion which has been thrown about the public mind as to the power of Great Britain. All we have to do is, to do as her statesmen do—not to depreciate our own power while we exaggerate hers.

We have existed more than half a century, unstained by the blood of a single individual for political offences. With twenty millions of people, powerful enough to do wrong, and five thousand prisons, there is not one of these twenty millions incarcerated in one of these prisons on any political charge. A short time since there was one imprisoned for a political offence,¹ but so strong was the force of public sympathy in his favor that even they who imprisoned him opened the prison doors and invited and urged and coaxed him to accept of his liberty. Throughout the remoter sections of our country, a magistrate is mounted on his horse, travels to a distant courthouse, holds his court, pronounces judgment, and secures the execution without the aid of a sword or even a cudgel. And this because the hearts of the people vindicate the supremacy of the laws. It is thus that we possess all the elements of the strongest government by which mankind was ever banded together. We then can have no fears of Great Britain.

All this arises from the fact that, instead of being in the rear of our institutions, the people are always in advance of those who are in power. The people have no fears of Great Britain; and if in our national councils is to be found something like timidity, it is owing to the fact that delegated power is always more fearful of responsibility than that which is primitive. It is the policy of Great Britain boldly to assert a claim, and then, by giving us the alternative of yielding or fighting, to obtain the surrender of a part of it. It is our duty to exhibit no symptoms of quailing to Great Britain, but to treat her as she has treated us. When she talks of power, let us talk back to her of power. When she strips for a fight, let us strip. With the bravest people in the world, what cause have we for fear? Let this resolution pass—and I know this body well enough to be sure that it will pass easily, and that all the other measures to which it will lead will also pass—and we shall hear no more of war.

Senator Benton spoke against the continuance of the joint-use convention.

Abram and Lot, although they were brethren, and sent to the chosen spot by the Deity himself, could not live together in the wilderness without strife. They had to separate to avoid contention. It must be so with the British and Americans on the Columbia, and worse. The two people can neither live together without law and government nor with double law and government. The condition is impossible. Collisions, violence, bloodshed must ensue if we leave the people as they are. It is our duty to prevent these mischiefs, and we become responsible for all that may happen if we do not prevent them.

The first step is to terminate the joint convention, and to recover our right to the complete possession of the Columbia under the Ghent treaty. We have a right to the possession acter should influence those who are intrusted with a nation's destiny. No hasty conclusions between individual negotiators; no little pouting and fretting, or strutting upon the stage, can be any justification to the American people, or before the world at large, that out of these cabinet squabbles or diplomatic quarrels two nations and the world shall be set to war and to cut each other's throats. A great majority of the Senate is anxious—we are all anxious for peace. A majority is decidedly in favor of preserving the peace of the country honorably, and of settling this question peaceably and honorably, by compromise, negotiation, arbitration, or by some other mode known and recognized among nations as a suitable and proper and honorable mode of settling national questions.

SENATOR WEBSTER.—The President can expect nothing but a continuance of this dispute or its settlement by negotiation. I am bound to suppose that he expects its settlement by negotiation. What terms of negotiation? What basis of negotiation? What grounds of negotiation? Every thing that we hear from the Executive department is "the whole or none"; and yet negotiation! Sir, it is in vain to conceal from ourselves, from the country, or from the world, the gross inconsistency of this course of conduct. I say I do not understand the position in which the Executive Government has placed itself: in favor of negotiation all the time; but all the time refusing to take any thing less than the whole! What consideration—what compromise—what basis—what grounds, therefore, for negotiation? If the Government of the United States has made up its mind—I speak of the Executive Government—that, so far as it is concerned, it will not treat for anything less than the whole of Oregon, then it should say so, and throw itself on the two Houses of Congress, and on the country.

If we will not recede, and England will not give up the whole of her claims, what is more natural than that war is likely to happen?

I am desirous of expressing my judgment on this subject, whenever I can do so without embarrassing the Administration. If negotiations be pending, I wish to hold my tongue. It shall be blistered before I would say anything derogatory to the title of the United States while the Government of the United States was engaged in negotiating for that territory on the strength of our title. Gentlemen see the embarrassment in which we stand. I will aid the Administration in all honorable efforts to obtain all that belongs to us, and all that we can rightfully and honorably acquire with all my heart—with all my heart. But, of that river and its valley under the treaty of Ghent. We hold a treaty with the British for our right of possession, and we have the amplest admission of a British minister, Lord Castlereagh, of our right to be the party in possession while treating of the title, and until the title is decided. Let us resume these great rights, so improvidently lost for thirty years by the delusive convention of 1818. The notice is necessary to this resumption, and I rejoice that the moment is at hand for giving it.

The notice is a peace measure, and can operate no way but beneficially. It will give us the immediate and exclusive possession of one-half the contested country, with the right of possession until the title to the whole is decided. This will separate the people, and keep peace among them, and will bring to conclusion this aged and barren negotiation which has produced no fruit in thirty years. It will change the condition of parties and make the British themselves desire negotiation. As long as things remain as they are, they are content. They have the exclusive possession of three-fourths of the country, and the joint use of the remaining fourth: this is all they ask, and more than they ask, in the way of territory. They have the free use of the river and its harbor, for the export of their furs and the importation of goods from Europe and Asia, without paying of duties: this is all they could ask in the way of navigation. They have law for the government of their people: we have none. And, more than all, they have an excuse for not complying with the Ghent treaty—an excuse which must fail them as soon as the notice takes effect, and leave them under the necessity of evacuating the country or violating a treaty for the execution of which we hold their order. As things are, the British are content. They want no change. The joint convention, while it stands, gives them all they ask, and more too. They fear its termination: they fear the notice! But they are not going to make war for the notice. It will make them treat, not fight.

SENATOR CRITTENDEN.—They who should involve this country in a needless war will bear responsibility heavy enough to sink a navy, sir. Let them be warned. To defend the rights of their country is one great duty. To protect the interests of their country is their duty; and of those interests peace is the greatest and mightiest of all. These duties are not inconsistent. It is no vaunting spirit that is to be acted on here. No fanaticism in politics must be suffered to guide the counsels of a great nation upon so solemn and serious a question. Considerations of a much more profound, of a higher and nobler charthen, as a citizen of the country, I claim a right to know something of the views, purposes, expectations, and objects of the Administration. I cannot reconcile myself to be much longer kept in a posture of things in which no preparations are made to defend the country—in which negotiation is held out every day as that course of proceeding which is expected to bring the question to a settlement, and to settle the question by England giving up the whole matter in dispute. In my opinion, it is not the judgment of this country that, at the hazard of a war, we shall now reject as no longer proper for our consideration propositions made and repeated twenty years ago. Compromise I can understand—arbitration I can comprehend—but negotiation, with a resolution to take and not to give—negotiation, with a resolution not to settle unless we obtain the whole of our demands, is what I do not comprehend in diplomacy or matters of government.

Senator Cass opposed reopening negotiations with Great Britain.

Mr. President, what right have you to suppose that the British government, under any circumstances, will be influenced in their conduct by your offer to compromise? I do not say they will not; but, without retracing their steps before the world, without gainsaying much they have said, without relinquishing much that they have claimed, without abandoning much that they have demanded, without retracing their steps before the world, and doing what a proud nation does with great reluctance, I cannot see how the difficulty is to be avoided.

Senator Breese belittled the power of Great Britain and prophesied that in the event of war with her our damage would be limited to the loss of a few merchant ships.

The Senator from New Jersey replied to him:

SENATOR DAYTON.—The Senator from Illinois [Mr. Breese] takes no account of the oceans of blood to be spilled in case of a war in this controversy; he takes no account of the wretchedness in every form which is to tread in the track of this war; he makes no account of the taxes that will harass the people; he forgets the fact that war has retrograded the position of the world; that it would stop at one blow all our internal improvements; diminish the wealth and cripple the resources of the country; he forgets that it is peace that makes our railroads, peoples our hill-sides, and plows our prairies. He takes no account of all this. He thinks, upon a point like this, when all are united and so very desirous for 54° 40', if we only wake up we will astonish ourselves! Why, if such language as this were to come from some persons who stood backside of the Allegheny mountains, I should think it was irony—the very bitterness of irony; but coming from my friend from Illinois, distinguished for his courtesy, I know that it is nothing but—54° 40'!

I cannot but feel that all this argument in reference to the relative power of our adversary, rating or berating her, is in very questionable taste in existing circumstances. If we are forced to touch her shield with the point of the lance, let us do it with the chivalrous feeling and dignity of a high-toned nation. Then let each wheel into position, and God defend the right. I am willing to go to the American people on principles of compromise. I am persuaded that the people will sustain the man and the Administration that settle this question on that basis. It is a common notion that the war party of this country must be the popular party of the country. I do not believe it. It is an error; and it is an error which tends to produce the very mischief that would have no existence without it. There is always to be found a class of men who prefer arranging themselves with that party which is supposed to be a popular party in the country. Now it would be a great public benefit to explode the error that a war party would be popular in all circumstances. Heretofore our wars have been popular because they have been wars for great principles, and not wars for mere property. The Revolutionary War, I need not say, was not a war about three cents on a pound of tea. It involved the rights of man—the great principles of free government. The late war was not a war about property; it was about principles all over—the freedom of the seas—the honor of our flag. Like causes will produce like effects; and, in the same, or like, circumstances, war would be popular again. But think you that a war about the pine logs of Maine would have been a popular war? Think you that a war about Oregon, or rather a part of Oregon above 49°, would be a popular war? It might be so at the beginning with certain classes; but the brunt of the war—the taxes to carry it on—would fall upon a different class of men altogether—on honorable, prudent, thinking men; on your merchants and mechanics. These are the men who would be necessarily compelled to bear the brunt of the war. As long as your war is a war of principles these men will stand by you; as soon as it becomes simply a war of property they will count the cost.

The intelligence, the prudence, the thought of this country must govern the country at last. Unless it be so, your institutions, which place the power in the hands of the people are an empty name. Public men are sometimes too apt to distrust the capacity of the people to govern themselves; they are too apt to draw back from the control of public opinion. But we need never despair of the people, when a man can stand on this floor and speak in a voice that shall reach every hamlet beyond the mountains—never, never. Let the public men of this country, of both sides of this Chamber, stand up to their responsibilities and the people will stand by them. Popular sentiment is not always right. The needle itself is not forever constant to the pole. But the hidden influence is there. Remove extraneous and disturbing causes—give the public mind fair play; it may vibrate for a time, but at last it settles—tremulously perhaps, but faithfully—to the north. Let the public men of this country who believe that a war for 54° 40' would be wrong but do their duty, neither the present Administration nor any other Administration dare involve the country in such a war. If they do, whatever may be their purity, their patriotism, a political blunder of that magnitude would inevitably bring any Administration, and all its aiders and abettors, to the block.

SENATOR HAYWOOD.—This question of Oregon had been turned into a party question, for the purpose of president-making. I repudiate any submission to the commands of factious meetings, got up by demagogues, for the purpose of dictating to the Senate how to make a treaty. I do not regard such proceedings as indicative of that true Democracy, which, like a potato, grew at the root, and did not, like the spurious Democracy, show itself from the blossom. The creed of the Baltimore convention directs the party to reannex Texas and to reoccupy Oregon. Texas has been reannexed, and now we are to go for the reoccupation of Oregon. Now, Old Oregon, embracing all the territory on which American foot ever trod, comprised merely the valley of Willamette, which did not extend above 49°; and, consequently, this portion was all which could be contemplated in the expression "reoccupation," as it would involve an absurdity to speak of reoccupying what we had never occupied.

GREAT AMERICAN DEBATES

Senator Hannegan denied that the resolution of the Baltimore convention referred merely to "Old Oregon," and asserted that, by the expression "the whole of Oregon," they claimed the entire territory in dispute.

The Democratic party is thus bound to the whole of Oregon—every foot of it; and let the Senator rise in his place who will tell me in what quarter of this Union—in what assembly of Democrats in this Union, pending the Presidential election, the names of Texas and Oregon did not fly together, side by side, on the Democratic banners. Everywhere they were twins—everywhere they were united. "Texas and Oregon" cannot be divided; they dwell together in the American heart. Even in Texas I have been told the flag of the lone star has inscribed on it the name of Oregon. Then it was all Oregon. Now when you have got Texas, it means just so much of Oregon as you, in your kindness and condescension, think proper to give us. You little know us if you think the mighty West will be trodden on in this way. Let gentlemen look at their own recorded votes in favor of taking up the Oregon bill at the close of the last session, and then let them look at the language of that bill and see if it did not propose to take possession of Oregon up to 54° 40', after giving unqualified notice to Great Britain that the convention must cease.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Haywood], in his defence of the President, put language into his mouth which I undertake to say the President will repudiate, and I am not the President's champion. I would not be the champion of power. I defend the right, and the right only. But, for the President, I deny the intentions which the Senator from North Carolina attributes to him—intentions which, if really entertained by him, would make him an infamous man—aye, an infamous man. He (Mr. Haywood) told the Senate yesterday—unless I grossly misunderstood him, along with several friends around me—"that the President had occasionally stickings-in, parenthetically, to gratify—what?—the ultraisms of the country and of party; while he reposed in the White House with no intentions of carrying out these parenthetical stickings-in." In plain words, he represents the President as parenthetically sticking in a few hollow and false words to cajole the "ultraisms of the country." What is this, need I ask, but charging upon the President conduct the most vile and infamous? If this allegation be true, these intentions of the President must sooner or later come to light, and when brought to light, what must follow but irretrievable disgrace? So long as one human eye remains, to linger on the page of history, the story of his abasement will be read, sending him and his name together to an infamy so profound, a damnation so deep, that the hand of resurrection will never be able to drag him forth. He who is the traitor to his country can never have forgiveness of God, and cannot ask mercy of man.

The last steamer from Europe, it is said, puts this question in such a position that for Oregon we can get free trade. Free trade I love dearly; but never will it be bought by me by the territory of my country. He who would entertain such an idea is a traitor to his country. I speak for myself, and my own section of the country. Free trade for a surrender of the ports and harbors on the Pacific? Never, sir; never. Whence this movement for free trade on the part of England? Does not everyone know that she has been driven into this course by the outcries of starving millions? That she has been forced into this policy by the land owners, to save their lives from the knife of the midnight assassin, and their palaces from the torch of the prowling incendiary? But the West is to be provided for; it is to have a new and most profitable market. Some of us know that from the Baltic England would get her wheat long before we could send a ton into her market. I advert to this simply because I do not know that I shall have another opportunity to do so. I have only to add that, so far as the whole tone, spirit, and meaning of the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina are concerned, if they speak the language of James K. Polk, James K. Polk has spoken words of falsehood, and with the tongue of a serpent.

SENATOR CALHOUN.—Peace is preëminently our policy. There are nations in the world who may resort to war for the settlement of their differences, and still grow great; but that nation is not ours. Providence has cast our happy inheritance where its frontier extends for twenty-three degrees of latitude along the Atlantic coast. It has given us a land which in natural advantages is perhaps unequaled by any other. Abundant in all resources; excellent in climate; fertile and exuberant in soil; capable of sustaining, in the plentiful enjoyment of all the necessities of life, a population of two hundred millions of souls. Our great mission as a people is to occupy this vast domain—there to fulfil the primeval command to increase and multiply, and replenish the land with an industrious and virtuous population; to level the forests, and let in upon their solitude the light of day; to clear the swamps and morasses and redeem common sense—if we succeed in preserving our constitutional liberty, we shall then exhibit a spectacle such as the world never saw. I know that this one great mission is encompassed with difficulties; but such is the inherent energy of our political system and such its expansive capability that it may be made to govern the widest space. If by war we become great, we cannot be free; if we will be both great and free, our policy is peace.

PRESIDENT CASS BEGINNING OPERATIONS, LOSING NO TIME
From the collection of the New York Historical Society

SENATOR CASS.—I am a firm believer in the sure and mighty efficacy of the great agent Time, but I believe that Great Britain will not herself permit this state of things to continue. "Whoever has Oregon will command the North Pacific" is the language which has been used in England; and it is to be expected that she will quietly witness the occupation of that country by a dense population of American citizens? If she will ever abandon the country, she will do it now, when there can be no dishonor in giving it up; not when there has grown up there a great power capable of resisting her.

The evils of war have, in my opinion, been too gloomily represented by the Senator from South Carolina. Admitting that a war of ten—of five—years will be disastrous to us; it cannot exist without bringing into collision the great questions of our day—the right to govern and to obey. But, if it were to be them to the plow and sickle; to spread over hill and dale the echoes of human labor and human happiness and contentment; to fill the land with cities, and towns, and villages; to unite its opposite extremities by turnpikes and railroads, to scoop out canals for the transmission of its products, and open rivers for its internal trade. War can only impede the fulfillment of this high mission of Heaven; it absorbs the wealth and diverts the energy which might be so much better devoted to the improvement of our country. All we want is peace—established peace; and then time, under the guidance of a wise and cautious policy, will soon effect for us all the rest.

I say time will do it, under the influence of a wise and masterly inactivity—a phrase than which none other has been less understood or more grossly misrepresented. By some who should have known better it has been construed to mean inaction. But mere inertness and what is meant by a wise inactivity are things wide apart as the poles. The one is the offspring of ignorance and of indolence; the other is the result of the profoundest wisdom—a wisdom which looks into the nature and bearing of things; which sees how conspiring causes work out their effects, and shape and change the condition of man. Where we find that natural causes will of themselves work out our good, our wisdom is to let them work; and all our task is to remove impediments. In the present case, one of the greatest of these impediments is found in our impatience.

He who cannot understand the difference between an inactivity like this and mere stupid inaction and the doing of nothing is as yet but in the horn book of political science. Yes, time—ever-laboring time—will effect everything for us. Our population is now increasing at the annual average of six hundred thousand. Let the next twenty-five years elapse, and our average increase will have reached a million a year, and, before many of the younger Senators here shall have become as gray-headed as I am, we shall count a population of forty-five millions. Before that day, it will have spread from ocean to ocean. The coasts of the Pacific will then be as densely populated and as thickly settled with villages and towns as the coast of the Atlantic is now. In another generation we shall have reached eighty millions of people, and, if we can preserve peace, who shall set bounds to our prosperity, or our success? With one foot planted on the Atlantic and the other on the Pacific, we shall occupy a position between the two old continents of the world—a position eminently calculated to secure to us the commerce and the influence of both. If we abide by the counsels of even more disastrous than he represented, was it right for the Senator to make the prediction that such a war would produce the overthrow of this Government? In that view, a war would at once be a signal of destruction, and we have nothing left but, when smitten on the one cheek, to turn the other. I believe that, although we should suffer severely, we should come out from another conflict with many glorious wreaths on our brows.

Many a raven has croaked in the last war. Many a Cassandra has foretold the ruin of the country. But nothing has come of their forebodings. I regard our country as the strongest for good, and the weakest for evil, in the world. Resting on public opinion, it is the only Government in which there can be no revolution.

Similar resolutions to those of Senator Allen were introduced in the House by Charles J. Ingersoll (Pennsylvania) on January 5, 1846, who on February 9 also introduced a joint resolution of the House and Senate to give Great Britain notice of the termination of the convention. The joint resolution passed on the same day by a vote of 163 to 54. It passed the Senate on March 31 by a vote of 40 to 14.

THE OREGON COMPROMISE

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 5-FEBRUARY 9, 1846

Speakers in the House in favor of insisting on "the whole of Oregon" were Henry W. Hilliard (Alabama), Howell Cobb (Georgia), Stephen A. Douglas (Illinois); those opposed to it were William L. Yancey (Alabama), Robert M. T. Hunter (Virginia) and Jefferson Davis (Mississippi).

MR. HILLIARD.—England and the United States are the only competitors for the trade of Southern China. England imports every year four hundred and fifty thousand chests of tea, while we import two hundred thousand, besides muslins and silks and other commodities of great value. In this gainful traffic, England regards us as a rival power, and she is by no means disposed to give it up. The coast of Oregon fronts that of China, and presents great facilities for carrying on this important branch of our commerce. Fully to avail ourselves, however, of these advantages, we ought to connect Oregon with the State of Missouri by the construction of a railroad. This is not so wild and visionary a scheme as at the first view some gentlemen might be disposed to consider it. Let them reflect that it is but fifteen years since Mr. Huskisson lost his life between Liverpool and Manchester, in an experimental trip over the first railroad ever constructed in England. And what was she doing in that system now? And then look on the Continent, and see one continuous line of railroad, extending twenty-seven hundred miles, entirely across Europe, from Odessa to Bremen, while another line extends from the Adriatic for near a thousand miles. And yet gentlemen stand here and look agast when anyone speaks of a railroad across our continent, as if it were something wondrous and altogether unheard of before.

Should such a road be constructed, it will become the great highway of the world; we shall before long monopolize the trade of the eastern coasts of Asia. At present the shortest possible voyage from London to Canton occupies seventy days; but by such a railroad a traveler might pass from London to Canton in forty days. There is no wildness, no extravagance in the idea; but it is a matter of sober sense and plain calculation. What a magnificent idea does it present to the mind, and who could calculate the results to which it would lead? With a route so short and so direct as this, may we not reasonably hope, in a great measure, to command both the trade and the travel of the world? Engrafted on this plan, and as its natural adjunct is the extension of a magnetic telegraph, which should follow the course of the road; unite the two, and where is the imagination which can grasp the consequences?

When Oregon shall be fully in our possession, when we shall have established a profitable trade with China through her ports, when our sails traverse the Pacific as they now cross the Atlantic, and all the countless consequences of such a state of things begin to flow in upon us, then will be fulfilled that vision which wrapt and filled the mind of Nuñez as he gazed over the placid waves of the Pacific.

MR. YANCEY.—We are now on the very portals of success in carrying out those noble principles of government which our fathers bequeathed to us, and which, if once wholly in operation, will do more than anything else to advance the cause of liberty and happiness. We have just purged the old Republican party of that system of bastard Republicanism which the war of 1812 bequeathed to the country, and have infused into it a new life and energy. We are on the point, too, of purchasing the magnificent territory of California, which, with Oregon, would ing possession of that disputed land is far preferable to any more bloody issue.

I would go a step further than the notice, and extend the protection of our laws over our citizens in Oregon. If we do not, we shall fall short of our duty. After doing this, I would go still further, and create those bands of iron which were to bind indissolubly together in one union the people of the Atlantic and the people of the Pacific. I would go for a railroad across the Rocky Mountains—for annihilating time and space between us and the inhabitants of the Pacific coast. In a military point of view, this railroad will be necessary. We shall be obliged, for the protection and defence of the country, to establish this mode of communication. While it will afford military protection for the defence of the country, it will be the means of creating a vast trade between the Eastern and Western portions of the continent. The immediate consequence of such a trade will be to open a traffic in our manufactures with the people of the East Indies; next, we shall be able to drive out all competition on the part of the British fabrics in that lucrative and important trade. We will, by means of this overland communication, be soon able to create immense commercial depots on the coast of the Pacific. We can make voyages to the East Indies in half the time that Great Britain can. Our manufactures will thus compete in that important and increasing market with those of Great Britain, and, indeed, drive out all competition; and thus they will become established on a firm foundation, without the aid of a black tariff to maintain them. I have always opposed internal improvements by the general Government; but I would adopt this improvement as a military work—one necessary for the public defence, though it would be used for civil and commercial purposes.

MR. DOUGLAS (chairman of the Committee on Territories).—We propose, on the part of the United States, to give notice for the termination of that treaty of 1827 which continued in force the convention of 1818; and we are met by the declaration that this notice is a hostile movement—that it is a war measure—that it is equivalent to a declaration of war by this country against Great Britain; and hence we are called upon to pause and reflect before we make this movement, which may bring the thunders of the British fleet and of the British army to our shores; and appeals are made to our fears in order to deter us from adopting this measure. Sir, I know not whether the giving this notice and the annulment of the treaty may lead to war or not; I know not whether war will be the result. But, give us a breadth of Pacific coast suited to the grandeur and commercial importance of our Republic.

All this would be blighted by war. California would be lost to us; Oregon would be lost to us. A debt of five hundred millions would be imposed upon the country. The paper system, in its worst form, will necessarily have been imposed upon us. The pension list—that spring of life and immortality to patriotic valor—would be almost indefinitely increased. The Government will have become centralized; its checks weakened; its administration federalized in all its tendencies. The fabric of State rights will have been swept away, and remain only as a glorious dream; and a strong military bias will have been given to the future career of our country, which, while it may be splendid in appearance, will bear within itself the certain elements of destruction.

I have endeavored, Mr. Chairman, to demonstrate that giving to England notice that we design to take exclusive possession of Oregon will produce a war; that war will either terminate in the loss of Oregon or in effecting nothing toward perfecting possession in us; that England will not give the notice, and that neither the honor nor the wants of the country require us to do so.

I now propose to show, sir, that a system of peaceful measures will tend much more effectually to give us "all of Oregon" than warlike movements will.

I am willing to raise mounted regiments sufficient to protect emigration to Oregon over our vast Western plains.

I am ready to build such a station at the South Pass as will enable the emigrants, as they reach a point from which they can look upon the vast Atlantic slope on the one hand, and that of the Pacific on the other, to recruit and refit there.

I am ready to cover our people there with the ægis of our laws to the extent that England has protected her subjects.

I am ready to offer such other and more tempting inducements to its settlement as gentlemen may devise, in order that, in five years' time, one hundred thousand men may be thrown in the vales and amidst the hills of this disputed land.

It would then be a part and parcel of our Union. As such, it never could be conquered. I sincerely believe what was the wish at the time of Lord Castlereagh, expressed twenty years ago to our minister—"Why are you Americans so anxious to push this negotiation? In a short time you would conquer Oregon in your bed-chambers." And most assuredly this will not be deemed treason in me, if I say that such a mode of perfect-sir, there is one thing which I do know—and a thing which is far more important in the decision of this question than the other—and that one thing is this: that the giving of this notice will afford no just cause of war. It is immaterial with reference to influencing our decision of this question whether war is to be the consequence or not; but it is important for us to inquire whether the act we are about to perform will give good ground of offence—just cause of war. If it will, we ought to pause and consider well before we proceed. But if it give no just cause of war, it is no argument that Great Britain will choose to make it a cause of war.

If gentlemen will reflect a moment on the history of this question, they will find that, at the breaking out of the late war, the valley of the Columbia river was in the possession of citizens of the United States; that, during that war, it was captured by Great Britain; and that by the treaty of peace it was provided that all countries captured by Great Britain should be restored to us. I hold in my hand the first article of the treaty of Ghent. In it, it was agreed that "all territory, places, and possessions, whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing the treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned [in the Bay of Fundy], shall be restored without delay."

The treaty of peace then provided for the restoration of all places, possessions, or territories captured by either party. Sir, as quick as that treaty was ratified and published to the world, the American Government demanded of Great Britain the restoration of the valley of the Columbia river in pursuance of the treaty. What did Great Britain do? She objected; she set up a claim to that country; she said it was a part of the British empire. But, sir, you find by examining the negotiation at that time that, notwithstanding all her objections, when Mr. Rush replied to them, that by the treaty we were entitled to the full possession, or repossession (in his own language), she admitted that right, and she acknowledged that the United States under the treaty of Ghent were entitled to the actual, the full repossession of the valley of the Columbia, and that we had the right to remain in possession while negotiating of the title.

Then, Great Britain, in pursuance of that treaty, did surrender the settlement of Fort George in the Columbia valley. That settlement was not merely a fort; not merely a fort was surrendered, but the settlement comprising Astoria and several other posts, and that settlement commanding the whole valley of the Columbia river. It was, then, the valley of the Columbia that was surrendered by the British Government, which government then acknowledged the right of the American Government "to be reinstated, and to be the party in possession while treating on the question of title."

That was the relative position of the two parties prior to entering into the treaty of joint occupation—the United States in possession, Great Britain setting up a claim, but acknowledging our right to the possession while adjudicating the claims of the respective parties. That would have been our right had it not been for that treaty. That treaty suspends that right; but it provides that nothing in it shall be construed to impair or affect the rights of either party. Hence, if you terminate the treaty, if you annul the treaty, the right of the United States to exclusive possession under the treaty of Ghent is revived, and Great Britain cannot—dare not—resist the restitution of the Columbia valley. It is no cause of war—no war movement. It is carrying into effect our treaty stipulations; and the effect of giving this notice will be to suspend the joint occupancy, to restore possession to us; and, when in possession, we will be ready to treat upon the title, and not till then. Is it, then, a matter of no consequence which party is in possession while treating upon the title? Carry on the negotiation now, leave the treaty of joint occupation in force, and Great Britain is the party in possession; but give this notice, terminate the treaty, and the United States will be the party in possession. But gentlemen may say that Great Britain will never acknowledge this exclusive right of the United States to the possession of the valley of the Columbia before the question is settled. In reply to this, I say that Great Britain has acknowledged that right; and that she has not only acknowledged it in words, but by a solemn act that must stand prominent in the history of that government; so long as that history shall exist, she has estopped herself from denying our right to the possession. She has once acknowledged it, and has once restored possession under that acknowledgment. Can she refuse again to make a similar restoration when the parties in respect of their rights are similarly situated? If she does refuse to make that restoration when the notice shall have been given and shall have expired, she will have to violate her solemn treaty stipulations; she will become the aggressor; she will be violating her plighted faith in the eyes of the civilized world; and she dare not take the responsibility of such an act of perfidy and bad faith after she herself has once acknowledged her obligations by performing the same act of surrender.

Gentlemen who oppose giving the notice say that they are bloody and destructive war. Nor am I prepared, on the other hand, to go with those who fearlessly assert that there is no danger to result from our action in reference to Oregon. I plant myself on this ground that the prosecution of the just rights of my Government is the course called for by the national faith and honor of my country. If peace be the result, I shall gladly welcome it. If war be the consequence, we must meet it. It is a crisis not to be avoided, not to be evaded, but to be met with boldness, firmness, and decision. When we have discharged our duties, then, sir, it will be for another department of our Government, and for the government with whom we are in collision upon this subject, to do what they may conceive to be their duty. That we should suffer from a war I do not pretend to deny; that we shall lose the Oregon Territory by resorting to war, I utterly but respectfully repudiate the idea. Whenever this Government shall be engaged in a conflict of this kind with the British Government or with any other government on earth, peace will never be declared upon terms leaving one foot of territory which has ever been consecrated to American freedom and American principles afterward to be profaned by monarchical or despotic principles. No; Canada may be acquired; I do not dispute that position of gentlemen who have argued this proposition before the House; but that Oregon will ever be abandoned peacefully, or in the struggle of war, my mind has never been brought to that conclusion, nor will it be. Sir, upon this day, this memorable, glorious 8th of January,¹ let it not be said by American statesmen, in an American Congress, that this Government can be injured, can be deprived, can be weakened in her just and unquestionable rights by a conflict with Great Britain, or with any other government. If war come, I venture the prediction that when it terminates we will have the consolation of knowing that not a British flag floats on an American breeze; that not a British subject treads on American soil. There is where war ought to terminate, if come it must; there is where I believe and trust in Heaven it will terminate.

MR. HUNTER.—Mr. Chairman, I appeal to all candid and reflecting men from the West—to those who go for Oregon and the whole of Oregon—to those who might desire war for Oregon, but who do not desire Oregon for war—I appeal to these men to let this controversy remain as it is. Let us not renew the negotiation; make no more offers to Great Britain; but let us trust to the process of colonization now so rapidly in prog-for getting possession. But how getting possession? Why, they are for continuing the treaty of joint occupation in force, and then for stealing possession in violation of that treaty of joint occupation. Yes; they are for adopting the high, the chivalrous course of stealing into that country under a treaty of joint occupation, and then seizing it in violation of the treaty itself. Will that not lead to war? Is that the peaceful remedy? Will not that wound the pride of the British Government? Sir, I aver that the attempt to carry that policy out leads inevitably to war; and not only to war, but it puts us on the wrong side. It convicts our Government of an act of duplicity and perfidy. It arrays the whole civilized world against us, and renders us subject to the charge that we are faithless and dishonorable. But if we rely on the treaty stipulations of the country—if we stand high on our undeniable rights, and give the notice according to the treaty, and demand possession under the treaty of Ghent, and insist upon it—if we require the surrender, as we have done once before—then, sir, we get peaceful possession of that country; and, when in peaceful possession, we can then stand on high ground and say to Great Britain: "Certainly we deprecate war; we are ready to negotiate, and are willing you should take your own time to bring that negotiation to a determination. You may do it with all the care, with all the deliberation you may desire; and you can take your own time to terminate it." But, in the mean time, we are in possession, with the acknowledged right of possession, until we arrive at an amicable adjustment.

For one, I never will be satisfied with the valley of the Columbia, nor with 49°, nor with 54° 40'; nor will I be, while Great Britain shall hold possession of one acre on the northwest coast of America. And, sir, I will never agree to any arrangement that shall recognize her right to one inch of soil upon the northwest coast; and for this simple reason: Great Britain never did own, she never did have a valid title to, one inch of that country. The question was only one of dispute between Russia, Spain, and the United States. England never had a title to any part of the country. Our Government has always held that England had no title to it. In 1826 Mr. Clay, in his dispatches to Mr. Gallatin, said: "It is not conceived that the British Government can make out even a colorable title to any part of the northwest coast."

MR. COBB.—Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to go to the full extent with some who declare that the inevitable result of the passage of this notice will be to involve this country in a ress, and we shall quietly, peaceably, and certainly obtain the whole of what we claim. I care not how glorious the war may be, it would be better to avoid it; for it is in this way alone that we may reasonably hope to obtain what gentlemen so ardently desire—"the whole of Oregon."

Sir, the making of any treaty fixing a boundary would be a palpable violation of the very principle the President has put forth in his message. Bearing this point in mind, gentlemen will easily understand the meaning of the President in all his recommendations—when he said that no compromise of this question could be made which the United States ought to accept—when he said that he reasserted our claim to the whole continent, and maintained it by irrefragable facts and arguments—when he said that the notice must be given and the exclusive possession regained—when he said our laws must be extended there—when he said that at the end of the year the time would have arrived when we must either maintain our claim or abandon the whole of it.

But gentlemen say we must not assert this broad doctrine—this principle of American independence of all European crowns—because they say it will lead to war. Well, sir, I know not nor care whether it will produce war or not; although I am not for war, I prefer war to the abandonment of duty and honor. Did our forefathers abandon their resistance to the Stamp Act because it would lead to war? There was a panic party in the country then as now—a peace party; but the patriots did not abandon their resistance. They stopped only to inquire as to the question of right: "Does our duty to ourselves and to our country require us to do it? and, if so, we will do it at the hazard of life, property, and sacred honor." That was the principle that animated them.

Sir, at a later period the States of this country did not abandon the embargo because it would lead to war. They did not relinquish their opposition to the impressment of American seamen because it would lead to war. At a later date they did not falter on the French indemnity because it would lead to war; nor upon the right of search, nor at a still later day on the Texas annexation. Sir, the war argument, the war panic—that stereotyped argument of all men that predicate their action upon the timidity of the people—their war argument was used then as it is now. The only question, then, for us to determine is, as our forefathers did, Is this policy right, Have we the right to maintain it? If we have the right, it is our duty to maintain it at the hazard of war: First, sir, in demanding and obtaining exclusive possession of the valley of the Columbia river, as a peace measure under the treaty of Ghent; second, in refraining from all and any negotiation about title until our possession shall be restored; and, thirdly, in maintaining this position of undying, unyielding opposition to any future European colonization on the American continent. Do this firmly, boldly, unitedly, and let the consequences, sir, take care of themselves.

MR. DAVIS.—It is as the representative of a high-spirited and patriotic people that I am called on to resist this war clamor. My constituents need no such excitements to prepare their hearts for all that patriotism demands. Whenever the honor of the country demands redress, whenever its territory is invaded, if then it shall be sought to intimidate by the fiery cross of St. George—if then we are threatened with the unfolding of English banners if we resent or resist, from the gulf shore to the banks of that great river throughout the length and breadth, Mississippi will come down to the foe like a stream from the rock. And whether the question be one of Northern or Southern, of Eastern or Western aggression, we will not stop to count the cost, but act as becomes the descendants of those who, in the war of the Revolution, engaged in unequal strife to aid our brethren of the North in redressing their injuries.

Sir, when ignorance and fanatic hatred assail our domestic institutions, we try to forgive them for the sake of the righteous among the wicked—our natural allies, the Democracy of the North. We turn from present hostility to former friendship—from recent defection to the time when Massachusetts and Virginia, the stronger brothers of our family, stood foremost and united to defend our common rights. From sire to son has descended the love of our Union in our hearts, as in our history are mingled the names of Concord and Camden, of Yorktown and Saratoga, of Moultrie and Plattsburg, of Chippewa and Erie, of Bowyer and Guilford, and New Orleans and Bunker Hill. Grouped together, they form a monument to the common glory of our common country. And where is the Southern man who would wish that monument were less by one of the Northern names that constitute the mass? Who, standing on the ground made sacred by the blood of Warren, could allow sectional feeling to curb his enthusiasm as he looked upon that obelisk,¹ which rises a monument to freedom's and his country's triumph, and stands a type of the time, the men, and the event

EVER since the treaty with Spain, whereby the United States had acquired ownership of Florida at the cost, among other considerations, of foregoing all disputed claims to Texas arising from the Louisiana Purchase, this country had looked with covetous eyes upon the relinquished territory. In 1827 and 1829 the Secretaries of State, Henry Clay and that it commemorates, built of material that mocks the waves of time, without niche or molding for parasite or creeping thing to rest on, and pointing like a finger to the sky to raise man's thoughts to philanthropic and noble deeds.

On April 23, 1846, both Houses agreed to a new resolution (which was inspired by the Executive Department) authorizing the President, while giving the notice, to continue negotiations. The reason for this amendment transpired on June 6, 1846, when the British Ambassador, Richard Pakenham, offered to accept the line of 49 degrees north latitude clear to salt water. The President, desirous of accepting this offer, but unwilling to take the responsibility for receding from his demand of 54 degrees 40 minutes as the boundary, left the decision to the Senate, the majority in which was Whig. To the credit of the opposition it must be said that, while realizing the purpose of the President, they acted as patriots rather than partisans, and advised acceptance. The treaty was ratified accordingly at London on July 17, 1846.

Martin Van Buren respectively, had made cash offers for it to Mexico, $1,000,000 in the former case, and $5,000,000 in the latter, but these were refused. All the while the province was being settled by Americans who were desirous of its annexation to this country. Owing to their agitation, Texas, on March 4, 1836, declared its independence from Mexico, and virtually achieved it in a brief war ending with the battle of San Jacinto, April 10, in which General Samuel Houston, leader of the revolutionists, defeated and captured Santa Anna, the Mexican general, who obtained his freedom by signing a treaty acknowledging the independence—a convention, however, which the Mexican Government repudiated. The United States recognized the new republic in March, 1837, thus giving Mexico a cause of grievance against this country.

In August, 1837, Texas applied for admission into the Union, and during the special session beginning in the following month William C. Preston (South Carolina) introduced in the Senate a resolution to this effect which was tabled by a vote of 24 to 14. From this time until the annexation was accomplished in December, 1845, the subject became a political issue, and a disturbing one in that it was connected with the agitation on the slavery question, since the South desired the annexation, and the North opposed it because it would greatly increase the extent of slave territory, Texas having permitted slavery within its borders, from which it had been excluded while the country was a part of Mexico.

An annexation treaty was concluded on April 12, 1844, by John C. Calhoun, Secretary of State, but it was rejected by the Senate, 16 ayes to 35 nays. The adoption of this treaty would have precipitated war with Mexico for the same reason that the subsequent annexation did so, namely, because it fixed the southwestern boundary of Texas at the Rio Grande del Norte instead of at the Rio Nueces, Mexico claiming the intervening region.

While the question was in suspense the Texan authorities, in order to promote an early and favorable decision, distributed throughout the Southern States a vast number of land warrants which converted their recipients into ardent annexationists. The Southern politicians were appealed to on the ground that a number of new States could be carved out of the territory, all of which would naturally enter the Union with slavery, and so preserve between the sections the balance of power which was in danger of inclining toward the North in the admission of free States.

During the Presidential campaign of 1844, while the Democrats minimized in the North the issue of Texan annexation, and strove to outbid the Whigs in a demand for the assertion of the Oregon claims, in the South annexation was the sole issue, and the now familiar threat of "Disunion" if the demands of the section were not granted was again raised.

The Northern statesmen were afraid of annexation, fearing that it would bring forward slavery as a paramount issue and cause a new political alignment in which other men than themselves would make themselves provided for a division of the acquired territory with four States, two in the South to enter the Union with slavery, and two in the North without it. It also provided for a conference with Mexico on the subject of the boundary, although, if this could not be amicably adjusted, Congress, and not the President, was empowered to annex Texas without Mexico's assent. By such a course, said Benton, "if the solution of the question brings war, we shall at least have the consolation to know that it comes constitutionally; that it is brought upon us by the authority that has the constitutional right to make war, and not by the unconstitutional act of the President and Senate, or President alone."

THE MEXICAN WAR

This bill had been introduced with no hope of its passage, but for the purpose of providing material in the pending presidential campaign.

Soon after the opening of the next session of Congress, Senator Benton reintroduced his annexation bill in the Senate, and Charles J. Ingersoll (Pennsylvania) introduced in the House a joint resolution of the Senate and House for the annexation of Texas, and its admission into the Union "as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution."

This superseded the Benton bill in the Senate, and on February 26, 1845, was passed there by a vote of 27 to 25. On February 28 the House passed the joint resolution by a vote of 132 to 76. The President signed the act on March 1.

In December, 1845, Texas was formally admitted into the Union.

PEACE BY NON-RESISTANCE

In the debate in the Senate the discussion hinged largely on the question of the power of Congress to declare war or make peace, since the passage of the joint resolution would almost certainly lead to war with Mexico. George McDuffie (South Carolina) asserted that Congress had this power, and John J. Crittenden (Kentucky) denied that it had, saying that this was a part of the treaty-making power which vested in the leaders. Accordingly, when the question was put directly to them, Martin Van Buren and Henry Clay, the leading aspirants of the Democratic and Whig parties respectively, for the nomination for the presidency, declared themselves against the annexation. This rendered certain the nomination of Clay, since a majority of the Whigs were opposed to the admission of more slave States, and it laid the basis for the loss of the nomination to Van Buren, since his Southern opponents, preliminary to the ballot in the Democratic convention held May 17, 1844, secured the passage of the two-thirds rule (which has been maintained ever since in Democratic conventions), and thus, although in the minority, by uniting on a Southern annexationist, James K. Polk of Tennessee, and standing resolutely for him, finally secured his nomination. For Vice-President the Whigs nominated Frederick T. Freylinghuysen (New Jersey), and the Democrats George M. Dallas (Pennsylvania). Both parties declared for asserting the Oregon claims. Polk and Dallas were elected over Clay and Frelinghuysen by a vote of 170 to 105. The Whig candidate would have been victorious had it not been for the increase in strength of the "Liberty Party," an Abolition party which had come into existence in the preceding presidential campaign, casting a negligible vote of 7,059 for James G. Birney of Kentucky and Francis J. Lemoyne of Pennsylvania (both of whom had declined the nomination). It now, however, cast a vote of 62,300 for Birney and Thomas Morris (Ohio), drawn almost wholly from the Whigs, and decided the electoral vote of New York (36) and Michigan (5) in favor of Polk and Dallas, who otherwise would have received 129 to 146 votes cast for Clay and Frelinghuysen. The annexation of Texas, which quickly followed the election, forced the restriction of slavery in front of its abolition as a practical question, and gave rise to a Free Soil party, with which the Abolitionists thereafter wisely coöperated, voting for its tickets in the next two presidential elections.

On June 10, 1844, Thomas H. Benton (Missouri) introduced in the Senate a bill to annex Texas, which Executive and the Senate jointly. An amusing colloquy occurred between the two on this point.

SENATOR CRITTENDEN asked: Where was the power of making peace given to Congress by the Constitution? Would the Senator from South Carolina tell him how Congress could make peace?

MR. McDUFFIE.—Yes, sir: by disbanding the army and navy. [Laughter.]

MR. CRITTENDEN.—That would not stop the war.

MR. McDUFFIE.—I do not presume the Executive and Senate would undertake to carry on the war after Congress disbanded the army and navy.

MR. CRITTENDEN.—No, sir; but it would be a very good time for the enemy to carry on the war. [Great laughter.]

A few days later Senator McDuffie, who, it would seem, had an overweening sense of personal dignity and a lamentable lack of the sense of humor, wrote to the editor of the (Washington) Globe, which had reported the colloquy, a long letter, intended for publication, in which he attempted to set himself right in the matter.

In the debate in the House the chief speakers in favor of annexation were Mr. Ingersoll, the mover of the resolutions, and Stephen A. Douglas (Illinois); and the chief opponents, Robert C. Winthrop (Massachusetts) and John Quincy Adams (Massachusetts).

THE ANNEXATION OF TEXAS

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 3-FEBRUARY 28, 1845

MR. INGERSOLL.—Like that of Maine, the Texas question is national; and national considerations should prevail in the latter as they did in the former, when the Union, south, and west, and central, sustained the Northeast in its plan of settlement. It is undeniable, however, that Southern interests, Southern frontiers, Southern institutions—I mean slavery and all—are to be primarily regarded in settling the restoration of Texas. It is a Texas question and a Southern question. If Southern Secretaries of State—one of whom originated and another is striving to consummate the affair—betray Southern partialities which many of us may deem not quite national, that is no reason why a great national measure should not be effected on great national considerations. So, if our minister to Mexico discuss the matter with the Mexican authorities in a tone or temper which we may not approve, that is no sufficient reason why the affair itself should be frustrated. We must regard the merits and substance of the measure, and negotiation concerning it, without being prejudiced or prevented by the mere manner of dealing with them.

MR. WINTHROP said: One of the greatest complaints made by our fathers of the Revolution against the British Government was that it considered slavery a good and a blessing; that it had refused its assent to acts of the Colonies for its suppression; that it reprimanded the Governor of South Carolina for having given his assent to one of those acts. It seemed to him that arguments on this question more particularly belonged to those who maintained the affirmative of the proposition, and not to those who were opposed to it. It was for those who contemplated so momentous a change in our system—who were for running off for foreign lands and foreign alliances—it was for those who sought to jeopard the peace and union of the country, in order to find a more ample theater for their transcendental patriotism, to furnish arguments to sustain them. It was for them to make out their case. It was for them to show the policy of the act, and to point out the precise terms in which it was to be consummated. For us (said Mr. W.), who desire no change, who are content with the country as it is, and with the Constitution as it is—whose whole policy looked to the aggrandizement of the country by internal developments, and not by foreign acquisitions, we want no arguments. It is only necessary for us to content ourselves by sitting quietly in our seats and answer, as the old barons of England did, nolumus leges Angliæ mutari.¹ Sir (said Mr. W.) we have the Constitution. That Constitution is one of limited powers and of specific grants of power. That Constitution contains the clause that the powers therein enumerated shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people; and it also contained the clause that the powers not thereby granted are reserved to the States or to the people.

Now it was for those who contended for the annexation of a foreign territory to show that the power they attempt to exercise is contained in the grant. He was not at all astonished that the friends of this measure should have desired to throw little consideration as was ordinarily bestowed on an act to grant a salary or create an office.

¹“We are unwilling that the laws of England be changed.”

THE MEXICAN WAR

The whole of the scheme was unconstitutional in substance and in form; it was contrary to the law of nations, and was a violation of the good faith of our own country; and, in his judgment, it was eminently calculated to involve this country in an unjust and dishonorable war. He also objected to it on account of its relation with domestic slavery. He was one of those who utterly denied the authority of this Government to annex a foreign State to this Government by any process short of an appeal to the people in the form which the Constitution prescribed for its amendment.

MR. DOUGLAS.—The gentleman from Massachusetts had been pleased to tell them that it had been devised by a President of the United States not elected by the people. Mr. D. denied that the accidental President of the United States had the credit of originating the project of the annexation of Texas to the Union. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] could assert a claim to that honor, founded on the fact that when President of the United States, in 1825, he and his secretary [Mr. Clay] proposed to annex Texas to this Union, and offered millions of dollars in order to secure this valuable acquisition. It was possible, inasmuch as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] did originate the measure, that his colleague [Mr. Winthrop] had referred to him [laughter] when he had said that the scheme was originated by a President not elected by the people. [Renewed laughter.]¹ Those who were opposed to the annexation of Texas seemed to have adopted the plan of raising up objections, of suggesting difficulties, and of keeping the friends of the measure employed in removing them, so that they would be prevented from going into the main question. They had found that the people were against them on that subject and that they had expressed their will more unequivocally in favor of the annexation of Texas than on any of the issues that were presented for their consideration. They therefore were reluctant to argue the question on its merits, and preferred a discussion on collateral issues.

He agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts that, if we annexed Texas to the Union, it must be done consistently with the Constitution, and he was satisfied that Congress had the constitutional power to do it. In regard to the power to off the load of argument from their own shoulders and impose it on their opponents. Having tried all the means in their power of reconciling the difficulties among themselves in regard to the accomplishment of this measure; having tried the *ultima ratio*¹ of a letter from the Hermitage in vain, the old Roman cement having lost its binding force, their last hopes were that the blows of their enemies might, more successfully than the love pats of their friends, knock their project into some shape that would render it acceptable to all. It seemed to be supposed by them that some anti-slavery feeling would manifest itself in the course of the debate, in such sudden and violent outbursts as to compel certain Southern members to give their votes for this measure, or their States to send other members here in their places next session who would be more complaisant. For himself, he was not disposed to minister to this feeling. Though he had no hesitation in saying that one of the grounds of his opposition to the annexation of Texas was that it would result in the extension of slavery, and, if his hour held out, he should treat it in connection with the question of slavery, yet he would do it in entire deference to the Constitution of the United States, which he was sworn to support. He should do it with the entire admission, which no Northern statesman has ever withheld, that so far as slavery exists in the States of the Union, this Government had no right whatever to interfere.

It was impossible for him to realize the fact that this subject was actually before the House for discussion. The introduction of a vast foreign nation into our boundaries—the naturalization of some thousands of Texans, as well as Mexicans—the introduction of 25,000 slaves into the Union in defiance of the Constitution, which prohibits it—the admission of a territory not only of a size sufficient to create two or three new States, but of a capacity to disturb the orbits of all the other stars and drive them into a new center toward other suns, and all this, too, by one simple act of legislation, was a thing so monstrous as almost to exceed belief. What was it? It was a measure devised by a Chief Magistrate² who was not the choice of the people, but who was the Chief Magistrate by accident, for his own ambitious views. It was rejected by the Senate, after mature deliberation and a thorough discussion; and it was now brought forward, after an hour's consultation in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and was to be passed with as

342

annex foreign territory to the Union, he had only to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that, in the articles of the old confederation, there was a proviso that Canada might be admitted into the Union as a matter of right, whenever she asked it, and that any other colony might be admitted with the consent of nine States. What other colonies were alluded to? The old thirteen States were included in the confederacy, and therefore none of them could have been alluded to. But gentlemen said that the colonies of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were alluded to, but he would ask if Florida could not have been admitted under that article. It certainly was the intention of the framers of the confederacy to admit foreign states into the Union if they could get nine States to vote for it. Mr. Douglas went on to show that, after the confederacy, the power of admitting foreign states into the Union was not restricted by the Constitution, but enlarged by it. Propositions to restrict the admission of foreign states into the Union were made in the convention which framed the Constitution, and were rejected; after which the convention adopted the clause giving Congress the power of admitting new States into the Union. What else did they do? They struck out the proviso requiring the assent of nine States for the admission of new states, and inserted the proviso that Congress might do it. They also voted down the proviso requiring two-thirds, and provided that Congress might do it by the votes of a majority. Mr. D. then referred to the treaties of Louisiana and Florida to show the power of Congress to acquire foreign territory, and to the admission of Louisiana, Missouri, etc., into the Union, to show the power of Congress to admit territory so acquired into the Union as States. Mr. D. then went into an explanation of the powers of Congress to pass such laws as are necessary to carry the powers given by the Constitution into effect, drawing a distinction between the grounds of indispensable necessity, as held by the Democratic party, and the latitudinarian doctrine of convenience and expediency, as held by their opponents. It was on the former grounds, he said, that he contended for the constitutionality of the admission of Texas.

MR. ADAMS referred to the argument that Texas was comprehended in the territory ceded by the Louisiana treaty, and therefore the United States were bound by the terms of that treaty to admit them into the Union, contending that Texas was not included in that territory. He also referred to the assertion that he was the first who originated the idea of annexing Texas to the United States, for that in 1825, during his presidency, he made overtures to Mexico for the acquisition of that territory. He admitted this to be true. He did make overtures to Mexico for the acquisition of Texas; but there was a slight difference between his action on that subject and that now contemplated, which the gentleman from Illinois had overlooked. He had proposed to purchase Texas with the consent of its owner; but the gentleman and his friends proposed now to take it without the owner's consent. There was the same difference between his action and that now contemplated as there was between purchase and burglary. Further, when he proposed to purchase Texas of Mexico, slavery did not exist there, and he proposed to take it without slavery, which he was willing to do now, with the consent of Mexico.

In all the treaties for the acquisition of territory it was not the acquisition of territory which constituted the power not within the Constitution, it was the bearing on the people of the territory acquired. We could acquire territory; territory was inanimate—it was matter. Man was an immortal soul; man had rights peculiar to himself; and they could not, without his consent, transfer man from one country to another. There was no such power; it could not be conferred. That was his opinion, and he expressed it in the case of the Louisiana treaty. He maintained it then; he conversed particularly with Mr. Madison on the subject. He [Mr. M.] agreed with him on that point. He [Mr. A.] showed Mr. Madison a proposition of amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and a paper in order to take the vote of the people of Louisiana on that treaty. When they annexed foreign territory to this country they dissolved our Union; the Union was dissolved. We might form another; but the people of a nation, the immortal mind, could not form a political union with another people without their own consent. This was his doctrine then; it was his doctrine now; and nothing on earth but the precedent which was settled against him could be adduced against it. If a man had rights, what were they? Were they not to live under the government of his own choice, and to refuse or consent to the terms by which he was made a part of a community to which he did not belong? In the acquisition of territory was included the disposal of human rights. It was not a subject of treaty; or, if it was a subject of treaty, it was between the sovereign powers who were the first principals, viz., between the people; and that was what he had proposed in the case of Louisiana.

THE MEXICAN WAR

On May 11 President Polk sent to Congress a war message in which he enumerated various wrongs committed by Mexico against the United States and its citizens during the period of differences between Mexico and Texas and, ignoring Mexico's reasonable claim to the territory invaded by General Taylor, asserted that "Mexico had passed the boundary of the United States and shed American blood on American soil." On the following day the Senate passed an act "providing for the prosecution of the existing war between the United States and Mexico," the preamble of which asserted, as the title assumed, that a state of war obtained between the two countries. On the question of whether this was in accordance with fact, and the proper attitude for the United States Government to assume, or the situation required that a formal declaration of war be made, a spirited debate took place in the Senate in which the supporters of the resolution were General Samuel Houston (Texas) and Lewis Cass (Michigan), and its opponents were John C. Calhoun (South Carolina), John M. Berrien (Georgia), James D. Wescott (Florida), and John J. Crittenden (Kentucky).

THE ACT OF WAR

SENATE, MAY 12, 1846

SENATOR CALHOUN said that he was prepared to vote the supplies on the spot and without an hour's delay; but it was just as impossible for him to vote for that preamble as it was for him to plunge a dagger into his own heart, and more so. He could not; he was not prepared to affirm that war existed between the United States and Mexico, and that it existed by the act of that government.

As to what might be said on such a course, and all that was called popularity, he did not care the snap of his fingers. If he could not stand and brave so small a danger, he should be but little worthy of what small amount of reputation he might have earned. He could not agree to make war on Mexico by making war on the Constitution; and the Senate would make war on the Constitution by declaring war to exist between the two governments when no war had been declared, and nothing

OUTBREAK OF HOSTILITIES

President Polk, in his first message to Congress (December, 1845), had announced that the "accession (of Texas) to our territory has been a bloodless achievement." But it was not to remain so long. On March 12, 1846, General Zachary Taylor, in command of regular troops stationed on the border of the territory between the Rio Nueces and Rio Grande del Norte, advanced under orders into this disputed region. On April 25 a reconnoitering squadron of American dragoons was surrounded and captured by a superior force of Mexican cavalry, one officer and eight men of the Americans being killed. On May 8 General Taylor, with his entire force (2,300), met the Mexican General, Arista, with 6,000 men and defeated him at Palo Alto; following after the retreating foe on the next day Taylor completely routed him at Resaca de la Palma, and drove him across the Rio Grande.

had occurred but a slight military conflict between a portion of two armies. Yet he was asked to affirm, in the very face of the Constitution, that a local recontre, not authorized by the act of either government, constituted a state of war between the Government of Mexico and the Government of the United States—to say that, by a certain military movement of General Taylor and General Arista, every citizen of the United States was made the enemy of every man in Mexico. It was monstrous. It stripped Congress of the power of making war; and, what was more and worse, it gave that power to every officer, nay, to every subaltern commanding a corporal's guard. He therefore moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Senate, by a vote of 20 yeas to 26 nays, refused the reference.

GENERAL HOUSTON.—Was not the crossing of the Rio Grande by the Mexican forces of itself an act of war? Was not the entering our territory by an armed force an act of war? However the decision might hereafter be in regard to the precise extent of our territory, the Mexicans knew full well that the river had been assumed as the boundary. Up to the time of annexation it had been so considered, and, more than that, the Mexicans had never once established a military encampment on the east side of the river; it had never been held, even by themselves, to be within the limits of Mexico, otherwise than upon the ridiculous ground of claiming the whole of Texas to be theirs.

They had marched across the river in military array—they had entered upon American soil with hostile design. Was this not war? And now were Senators prepared to temporize and to predicate the action of this Government upon that of the Mexican Government, as if the latter was a systematic, regular, and orderly government? He, for one, was not prepared to do so. How many revolutions had that government undergone within the last three years? Not less than three, with another now in embryo. Perhaps the next arrival might bring us news of another change, and that the American army on the Rio del Norte had been destroyed while awaiting the action of the Mexican Government, in the supposition that it was a regularly constituted government, instead of being a government of brigands and despots, ruling with a rod of iron, and keeping faith with no other nation, and heaping indignities upon the American flag. A state of war now existed as perfect as it could be after a formal declaration or recognition of a state of war by the Congress of the United States. Their action had been continually indicative of a state of war, and the question now was, whether the Government of the United States would respond to that action and visit the aggressors with punishment.

CARICATURE OF LEWIS CASS

[1848]

From the collection of the New York Historical Society

SENATOR CASS.—It is true, sir, that there may be accidental or unauthorized recontres which do not therefore constitute war. But the nature and circumstances of an aggression sufficiently indicate its true character and consequences. A Mexican army invades our territory. How far may the invaders march before we are satisfied that we are at war with Mexico? Why, sir, such a state of things must be judged by moral evidence, by the circumstances attending it. It might be enough to say that the invasion itself throws the responsibility upon the Mexican Government, and is a sufficient justification for us in holding that government accountable. The negative proof is not upon us. The moral presumption is sufficient for our action.

exist by any act of the constituted authorities, in whose hands alone is the power to create war.

SENATOR WESTCOTT.—Without a formal declaration of war and without the express authority of Congress, the President cannot issue commissions to privateers—issue letters of marque and reprisal—cannot authorize the blockade of the Mexican ports—cannot authorize the capture of Mexican vessels on the high seas as prizes of war. Without such declaration, Mexicans taken in arms, after defeat in attacking our citizens or soldiers, cannot be held by the Executive authority as prisoners of war—treason in aiding her troops may even go unpunished; and, above all, without it the observance of the duties of other nations toward us, the duty of neutrality, so likely to be violated, could not be properly enforced. Without such declaration, Mexico may be supplied with arms, ammunition, and munitions of war by other nations; and, if captured, they would not be liable to forfeiture as “contraband of war.” The declaration of war will in every way strengthen the Executive arm in this contest—at home, abroad, on the field of contest, and in these halls. It will increase the efficiency of the supplies of men and money we propose to give threefold. It will convince the world we are in earnest in this matter.

SENATOR CRITTENDEN.—He saw no reason for the advance of the troops to the Rio Grande—for the hazarding of those consequences which every sensible man must have foreseen. It was not for a moment to be imagined that the angry armies of two angry and quarreling nations should, day after day, face each other with cannons pointed at each other, and only a fordable river between them, and conflict not result. It was conceded that this was disputed territory. What right had the United States to take possession of it? Had not the other disputing claimant an equal right? But he would not prosecute that view of the subject at present. He was willing to consider the exigency as urgent as they pleased, and to make adequate preparation. As it was the wish of some Senators to rest with that in the meantime, he should be entirely content with that course, but he did not know that he would be willing to limit the Government to repelling invasion. Perhaps he would be satisfied with an expression of what he meant by repelling invasion. He meant by that, pursuing, beating down, till the borders were freed from danger of a repetition of the invasion.

A SENATOR.—“That would be war.”

MR. CRITTENDEN.—No; there was a shade of difference—a very perceptible one. He would be willing to give the means

A hostile army is in our country; our frontier has been penetrated; a foreign banner floats over the soil of the Republic; our citizens have been killed while defending their country; a great blow has been aimed at us; and, while we are talking and asking for evidence, it may have been struck and our army been annihilated. And what then? The triumphant Mexicans will march onward till they reach the frontiers of Louisiana, or till we receive such a formal certificate of the intentions of the Mexican Government as will unite us in a determination to recognize the existence of the war, and to take the necessary measures to prosecute it with vigor.

I have no doubt the boundary of Texas goes to the Rio del Norte. But I do not place the justification of our Government upon any question of title. Granting that the Mexicans have a claim to that country as well as we, still the nature of the aggression is not changed. We were in the possession of the country—a possession obtained without conflict. And we could not be divested of this possession but by our own consent or by an act of war. The ultimate claim to the country was a question for diplomatic adjustment. Till that took place the possessive right was in us; and any attempt to dislodge us was a clear act of war.

We have but one safe course before us. Let us put forth our whole strength. Let us organize a force that will leave no doubt as to the result. Let us enter the Mexican territory and conquer a peace at the point of the bayonet. Let us move on till we meet reasonable proposals from the Mexican Government; and if these are not met this side of the capital, let us take possession of the city of Montezuma and dictate our own conditions.

SENATOR BERRIEN.—The proposition of the Senator is that war exists. How does he prove it? Why, by the presence of a Mexican army around the United States army. Does he not thus decide the question of boundary? No. I beg to ask how that possession was acquired, and by whom? It was by the march of the United States army into the territory. If conceding that it was a disputed territory, the right of Mexico was equal with that of the United States to enter the territory. If our possession was derived from marching our army there, cannot Mexico exercise the same right? Does priority in an act of hostility vest a national right? The argument of the Senator is that the march of the Mexican army was an act of hostility. If so, I have demonstrated that the march of the United States army was an equal act of hostility. War does not, then, to the President for the purpose of repelling invasion and otherwise prosecuting hostilities till the peace of the country be secured from the danger of further invasion. He would move to strike out the preamble, of which he saw no necessity—there was none in the declaration of war in 1812.

Senator Crittenden's motion was negatived, 20 yeas, 25 nays. The question “Shall the bill pass?” was then put and resulted 40 yeas to 2 nays, Senators Berrien and Calhoun not voting, and Senator Crittenden voting “aye, except the preamble.”

On December 10, 1845, Stephen A. Douglas (Illinois), chairman of the Committee on Territories, introduced in the House of Representatives joint resolutions of the House and Senate to admit Texas into the Union. Remonstrances were presented from various Northern State legislatures and other bodies against admission of the State with slavery. After some debate the resolutions came to a vote on December 16 and were adopted by 141 yeas to 56 nays. While they omitted all direct allusions to slavery, permission to introduce it into the State was implicit in the statement of the resolutions that Texas should be “admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever.”

Julius Rockwell (Massachusetts) was the chief speaker in opposition to the resolutions.

This Texas slavery question was a new question now for the first time presented to the consciences of men. As one called to represent in part the people of his own ancient Commonwealth he must enter his solemn protest against the extension of slavery as an evil directed against the truest interests of his country; as militating directly against its prosperity and freedom, and darkening that national character which she ought to hold up to all nations and ages of the world; as being in opposition to the Constitution which had preserved us hitherto in concord; as against the principles of the fathers of the Republic, who lived themselves in slaveholding States, who would have saved us, if they could, from so great an evil, and who openly confessed that they trembled for their country when they remembered that God is just.

The joint resolution for admitting Texas into the Union with slavery was presented in the Senate on December 22, 1845, and was thoroughly debated, John M. Berrien (Georgia) speaking in the affirmative, and Daniel Webster (Massachusetts) in the negative. It passed by a vote of 31 to 14.

ADMISSION OF TEXAS INTO THE UNION

SENATE, DECEMBER 22, 1845

SENATOR WEBSTER.—While I hold, with as much integrity, I trust, and faithfulness as any citizen of this country to all the original arrangements and compromises in which the Constitution under which we now live was adopted, I never could and never can persuade myself to be in favor of the admission of other States into the Union as slave States, with the inequalities which were allowed and accorded to the slaveholding States then in existence by the Constitution. I do not think that the free States ever expected, or could expect, that they would be called on to admit further slave States having the advantages, the unequal advantages, arising to them from the mode of apportioning representation under the existing Constitution.

On looking at the proposition I find that it imposes restraints upon the legislature of the State as to the manner in which it shall proceed (in case there is a desire to proceed at all) in order to abolish slavery. I have perused that part of the constitution of Texas, and, if I understand it, the legislature is restrained from abolishing slavery at any time, except on two conditions: one, the consent of every master; and, the other, the payment of compensation. Now, I think that a constitution thus formed does tie up the hands of the legislature effectually against any movement under any state of circumstances, with a view to abolish slavery; because if anything is to be done it must be done within the State by general law, and such a thing as the consent of every master cannot be obtained.

Mr. President, I was not in the councils of the United States at the last session of Congress, and of course I had no opportunity to take part in the debates upon this question; nor have I before been called upon to discharge a public trust in regard to it. I certainly did, as a private citizen, entertain a strong feeling that if Texas were to be brought into the Union at all she was to be brought in by diplomatic arrangement, sanctioned by treaty; but it has been decided otherwise by both Houses of those who denounced it as unjust, though with the exception of Joshua R. Giddings (Ohio) they were willing to support the army now that hostilities had begun, were Giddings, Columbus Delano (Ohio), John W. Houston (Delaware), John Quincy Adams (Massachusetts) and Robert Toombs (Georgia).

"MY COUNTRY, RIGHT OR WRONG"

DEBATE ON THE MEXICAN WAR, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 13-19, 1846

MR. GIDDINGS.—The President in his message, as a pretext for sending our army to invade and conquer the country upon the Rio Grande, says:

"Texas, by its act of December 19, 1836, had declared the Rio del Norte to be the boundary of that republic."

This mere declaration on paper by the legislature of Texas could not change or alter the facts. They were entered upon the page of history, as well as upon the records of eternal truth; and no flagrant falsehood by that body, indorsed by a dignitary of this Government, can change or alter them. The truth is that Texas had agreed upon the Nueces as her boundary.

Were Mexico to declare, by a legislative act, that her eastern boundary is the "Hudson River," and, on paper, attach the whole of our States south and west of that stream to her congressional districts, and then, on paper, divide our seaboard into collection districts, without being able to enforce her laws in any way whatever, her president may, at the next meeting of her congress, adopt this portion of President Polk's message, and urge, with equal propriety, that Pennsylvania and Ohio are Mexican territory. But if Mexico possessed the power and disposition to enforce such views, we should regard the carrying them out to be an outrage unparalleled among civilized and Christian nations; and were a Mexican army to invade our country, in order to compel us to unite with their government, we should meet them sword in hand and would yield our country only with our lives.

I apprehend that much blood and much treasure will be expended before the people of New Mexico will be compelled to unite with slave-holding Texas. Those Mexicans love freedom. They have abolished slavery, for which they entertain an uncon-

Congress: and, whatever my own opinions may be, I know that many who coincided with me feel themselves, nevertheless, bound by the decision of all branches of the Government.

I discharge my own duty and fulfil the expectations of those who placed me here by giving this expression of their most decided, unequivocal, and entirely unanimous dissent and protest; and stating, as I have now stated, the reasons which have impelled me to withhold my vote.

I agree with the unanimous opinion of the legislature of Massachusetts; I agree with the great mass of her people; I reaffirm what I have said and written in the last eight years, at various times, against this annexation. I here record my own dissent and opposition; and I here express and place on record, also, the dissent and protest of the State of Massachusetts.

SENATOR BERRIEN.—The pledge of this Government has been given, and it must be redeemed. The only question, therefore, is whether the people of Texas have complied with the conditions specified in the joint resolution? Now, sir, I have given a somewhat attentive consideration to the constitution which they have adopted, and am of opinion that these conditions have been complied with. I see nothing in the provisions of that constitution on the subject of slavery which ought to prohibit the consummation of the measure as promised in the resolutions of the last Congress. Much to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers, the inhibition to the legislature, except on certain conditions, to pass laws of emancipation, it seems to me is somewhat beyond the province of Congress to entertain. It is perfectly open, as I have before said, to any Senator to question the propriety of the admission of Texas on the ground of its tendency to disturb the political balances between the States contemplated by the Constitution; but the question of emancipation, when, how, and under what circumstances to be allowed, it would appear to me should be left with her own Legislature, as a subject for domestic regulation, belonging exclusively to the State, and with which the Congress of the United States has no authority, either directly or indirectly, to interfere.

During the progress of the war a spirited debate took place in the House on the occasion of making appropriations for the support of the army. The speakers who defended the war as just were Stephen A. Douglas (Illinois) and J. H. Lumpkin (Georgia), and quersable detestation. If I had time, I should like to inquire of gentlemen from New England and from our free States what benefit our nation or the world are to receive from a conquest of that country and the extension of slavery over it?

354

But the President says this Mexican country "is now included in one of our congressional districts." These thirty thousand people who, so soon as the bill which passed this House yesterday shall receive the sanction of the Senate, and shall be approved by the President, will be in a state of war with this nation, are to be represented on this floor because Texas has on paper attached them to one of her congressional districts. If this act of the Texan legislature has any binding force whatever, it will render every Mexican who opposes our army a traitor against this Government, and will subject him to the punishment of death.

Yes, the men who burned their dwellings at Point Isabel and with their wives and little ones fled before our invading army are to be represented in this body. Should their representative, according to the democratic doctrine, carry out the views of his constituents, the President himself may, in an unguarded moment, find a "lasso" about his own neck, and the members of our body be assassinated agreeably to the hearty wishes of the people of that district.

I regard the message as having been put forth to divert public attention from the outrage committed by the President upon our own Constitution, and the exercise of usurped powers, of which he has been guilty in ordering our army to invade a country with which we are at peace, and of provoking and bringing on this war. I am led to this inevitable conclusion from the fact that he dare not rest his justification upon truth. He reminds us of the grievous wrongs perpetrated (as he says) by Mexico upon our people in former years, and alludes to the delay of that government in the payment of debts due our people, and mourns over the loss of our commerce with Mexico; all for the purpose of justifying himself in sending the army to the Rio Grande, and commencing the work of human butchery!

If the country be ours, why does he seek to justify the taking possession of it by reference to the fact that Mexico is indebted to some of our people? If it be not ours, and he has taken possession of it in order to compel Mexico to pay those debts, why not say so? The fact that Mexico has not paid the debts due to our citizens can have no legitimate connection with taking possession of our own soil. But the writer of the message was obviously conscious that this invasion of the Mexican territory could not be justified; and he endeavored to extenuate the act by assuring us that "the movement of the troops to the Del Norte was made under positive instructions to abstain from all aggressive acts toward Mexico or Mexican citizens unless she should declare war."

What aggressive acts toward a foreign power could our army commit while on our own territory? While the army was within the United States they could not commit violence upon Mexico. The order was also to abstain from all aggressive acts toward "Mexican citizens." It seems that the President expected General Taylor to find Mexican citizens located within the United States. And this sentence evidently alludes to the order of the Secretary of War, in which General Taylor was directed to take possession of the whole country "except that which was in the actual occupation of Mexican troops or Mexican settlements." Here is a distinct admission that this country, claimed by the President as a portion of the United States, was in the actual possession of Mexican troops and Mexican settlements. The idea that our army could peaceably surround those military posts occupied by Mexican troops could be entertained by no reflecting mind. The President must have known, and we all know, that those military posts were established for the sole purpose of protecting the country, and the sending of our army there must have been done with the moral certainty that war would ensue. The truth is most obvious to the casual reader. The President obviously intended to involve us in war with Mexico. No sophistry can disguise that fact. That truth will stand on the page of history in all coming time, to the disgrace of this nation and of the age in which we live.

Sir, I regard this war as but one scene in the drama now being enacted by this Administration. Our Government is undergoing a revolution no less marked than was that of France in 1792. As yet, it has not been characterized by that amount of bloodshed and cruelty which distinguished the change of government in France. When the Executive and Congress openly and avowedly took upon themselves the responsibility of extending and perpetuating slavery by the annexation of Texas, and by the total overthrow and subversion of the Constitution, and that, too, by the aid of Northern votes, my confidence in the stability of our institutions was shaken, destroyed. I had hoped that the free States might be aroused in time to save our Union from final overthrow; but that hope has been torn from me. The great charter of our political liberties has American, I would never sheathe my sword while an enemy remained upon my native soil.

Yesterday I was asked to declare to the world that "Mexico had made war upon us." That assertion I knew would be untrue, as I have already shown. I felt most deeply the impotence of this body, in thus attempting to change or alter great and important facts already entered upon the records of eternal truth, where they will remain while a God of truth shall exist. Sir, when we were about to assume upon ourselves the awful responsibility of involving our country in a serious and bloody war, with all its consequences; when about to appeal to a God of justice and of truth for his aid in maintaining our national rights, I dared not do so with an impious falsehood upon my lips.

But I hear it said that "we must go for our country, right or wrong." If this maxim be understood to require us to go with our country, or with the majority of our country, to commit a wrong upon other nations or people, either in time of peace or in time of war, I deny its morality; but if it be understood as imposing upon us, at all times and under all circumstances, the obligation of using all our influence and efforts to set our country in the right when we find her wrong, or to keep her right when we find her in the path of duty, then, sir, I yield my assent to its correctness. We are not to abandon our country because our Government is badly administered; but, in such case, we should use our efforts to correct the evil and place the Government in just and able hands.

Again it is said, "we must stand by our country." The man who would do otherwise would be unworthy of any country. He only is a true friend of his country who maintains her virtue and her justice; and he is not a true friend to his country who will knowingly support her in doing wrong. Tomorrow this nation will probably be in a state of war with Mexico. It will be an aggressive, unholy, and unjust war. It will then be my duty to use my efforts to restore peace at the earliest practicable moment that it can be done on just and honorable principles. But while the war continues efforts will probably be made to conquer Mexico, and we shall be called on to appropriate money and raise troops to go there and slay her people and rob her of territory. But the crime of murdering her inhabitants and of taking possession of her territory will be as great to-morrow, after war shall have been declared, as it would have been yesterday.

Justice is as unchangeable as its Author. The line of moral been tamely surrendered by our free States to purchase perpetual slavery for the South. Our Union continues, but our Constitution is gone. The rights of the several States and of the people now depend upon the arbitrary will of an irresponsible majority, who are themselves controlled by a weak but ambitious Executive.

Sir, no man regards this war as just. We know, the country knows, and the civilized world are conscious, that it has resulted from a desire to extend and sustain an institution on which the curse of the Almighty most visibly rests. Mexico has long since abolished slavery. She has purified herself from its crimes and its guilt. That institution is now circumscribed on the southwest by Mexico, where the slaves of Texas find an asylum. A gentleman from Matamoras lately assured me that there were in and about that city at least five hundred fugitives from Texan bondage. Experience has shown that they cannot be held in servitude in the vicinity of a free government. It has therefore become necessary to extend our dominions into Mexico in order to render slavery secure in Texas. Without this, the great objects of annexation will not be attained. We sought to extend and perpetuate slavery in a peaceful manner by the annexation of Texas. Now we are about to effect that object by war and conquest. Can we invoke the blessing of Deity to rest on such motives? Has the Almighty any attribute that will permit Him to take sides with us in this contest?

I know it is said that a large army and heavy appropriations will make a short war. God grant that the prediction may prove true. I apprehend that Mexico has maturely considered the subject, and enters upon the war with a solemn conviction that her existence as a nation depends upon her resistance to our aggressions. The devotion of her people at Point Isabel conclusively shows it. Why, sir, look at General Taylor's report, and you will see a devotion manifested by the officers and peasantry of Mexico that speaks in thunder tones to those who regard the conquest of that people as a trifling matter. See the females and children, at the approach of our troops, leave their homes, consecrated by all the ties of domestic life, and, while they are fleeing to the Mexican army for protection, see their husbands and fathers apply the torch to their own dwellings, and then fly to arms in defence of their institutions. I confess I was struck with deep solemnity when that communication was read at your table; and, in imitation of William Pitt, I was ready to swear that, if I were a Mexican, as I am an rectitude will never bend to our selfish passions. In the murder of Mexicans upon their own soil, or in robbing them of their country, I can take no part, either now or hereafter. The guilt of these crimes must rest on others; I will not participate in them; but if Mexicans or any other people should dare invade our country, I would meet them with the sword in one hand and a torch in the other; and, if compelled to retreat, like the Mexicans at Point Isabel, I would lay our dwellings in ashes, rather than see them occupied by a conquering army.

We may always justify ourselves for defending our country, but never for waging a war upon an unoffending people for the purpose of conquest. There is an immutable, an eternal principle of justice pervading the moral universe. No nation, or people, or individual ever did or ever will violate that law with impunity.

Suppose we send an army into Mexico and kill hundreds and thousands of her people, burn her cities, and lay waste her country; do you think we shall escape the dread penalty of retributive justice? I tell you, we shall not. As sure as our destiny is swayed by a righteous God, our troops will fall by the sword and by pestilence; our widows will mourn; and our orphans, rendered such by this unholy war, will be thrown upon our public charity.¹

But it is said that war is always popular. I deny this assertion. I believe that nine-tenths of our people regarded the Florida war with contempt.² Their disgust arose from the fact that it was unjust and cruel, and arose from an effort to sustain slavery. This war is equally unjust, and arises from the same cause, and must be viewed in the same light by the people. It is impossible, in the nature of things, for it to be otherwise. Our people feel no hostility to those of Mexico. The Mexicans have remained at home, "under their own vines and fig-trees"; they have not molested us or encroached upon our rights. It is true that their population is less intelligent than that of our free States; and it is equally true that they are more rapidly improving their condition than are those of our slave States. They are surely in advance of them in the diffusion of universal liberty among their people. The means of intelligence and enjoyment are open to all.

Indeed, taking the whole population of our slave States and of Mexico into consideration, I think we shall find the Mexicans the best informed, most intelligent, and most virtuous. Our people of the North have sympathized with them in their efforts to render their free government permanent and respectable. Can the lovers of liberty now desire to see a sister republic wantonly subverted while just coming into existence and struggling for the permanent establishment of civil freedom? It cannot be. You may declare war; display your banners, your glittering arms, your blazing uniforms; you may raise the battle-cry and sound your trumpets; but you cannot induce the intelligent men of the North to march to Mexico for the purpose of bathing their hands in Mexican blood for the extension of slavery. You may for the moment excite the young, the giddy and thoughtless; but their "sober second thoughts" will lead them to inquire for the cause of the war in which they are asked to engage. The true answer to that inquiry must overwhelm its authors with disgrace.

² The Seminole War. See Volume VIII, chapter VI.

There is, however, one cheering circumstance in the distant future. All history informs us that for ages no nation or people, once having adopted the system of universal freedom, was ever afterward brought to the maintenance of slavery. There are now probably eight or nine millions of people in Mexico who hate slavery as sincerely as do those of our free States. You may murder or drive from their country that whole population, but you can never force slavery upon them. This war is waged against an unoffending people, without just or adequate cause, for the purposes of conquest; with the design to extend slavery; in violation of the Constitution, against the dictates of justice, of humanity, the sentiments of the age in which we live, and the precepts of the religion we profess. I will lend it no aid, no support whatever. I will not bathe my hands in the blood of the people of Mexico, nor will I participate in the guilt of those murders which have been and which will hereafter be committed by our army there. For these reasons I shall vote against the bill under consideration and all others calculated to support this war.

MR. DELANO said: We were in the midst of a war which we had engaged in without authority of law and without being in the right, yet, now that war had begun, on the principle of "my country, may she be always right, but, right or wrong, my country," he was ready to adopt purely defensive measures. Where this war would end he could not predict. But we had not yet settled the Oregon question. He never had any confidence in the sincerity of the President's declarations of a purpose to maintain our rights in Oregon. He believed that enemies. America wants no friends, acknowledges the fidelity of no citizen who, after war is declared, condemns the justice of her cause or sympathizes with the enemy. All such are traitors in their hearts; and would to God that they would commit such overt act for which they could be dealt with according to their deserts.

I will not proceed to examine the arguments by which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Delano] and those with whom he acts pretend to justify their foreign sympathies. They assume that the Rio del Norte was not the boundary line between Texas and Mexico; that the Republic of Texas never extended beyond the Nueces—and consequently our Government was under no obligation, and had no right, to protect the lives and property of American citizens beyond the last-mentioned river. In support of this assumption, the gentleman has referred to the dispute which he says arose between the provinces of Coahuila and Texas, and the decisions of Almonte and some other Mexican general thereon prior to the Texan revolution, and while those provinces constituted a state of the Mexican Confederacy. I will direct the gentleman's attention to the various maps, records, histories, and authorities—Spanish, English, and French—by which it is shown that the Rio del Norte was the boundary line between the French province of Louisiana and the Spanish provinces of Mexico. The gentleman can also satisfy himself on that point if he will take the pains to read a dispatch (I might with propriety say a book, from its very great length) written by the American Secretary of State, John Q. Adams, to the Spanish minister [Don Onís] in 1819. He will there find the authorities all collected and reviewed with a clearness and ability which defy refutation and demonstrate the validity of the American title under the treaty of 1803 to the country in dispute, together with the expression of his opinion, by the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] that our title to the Del Norte was as clear as to the island of New Orleans. This was the opinion of Mr. Adams in 1819. It was the opinion of Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney in 1805. It was the opinion of Jefferson and Madison—of all our Presidents, and all Administrations, from the day of the purchase of Louisiana in 1803 to the fatal treaty of relinquishment to Spain in 1819. I give the gentleman the opinion of these men in opposition to the opinion of Almonte and his brother Mexican general, and then leave the question of boundary prior to the Texan revolution. Will he tell us and his constituents that those distinguished statesmen, including his friend from Mas-

he would give away all Oregon to prosecute this war for a territory not belonging to us.

We had declared war without notice. It came upon the country like a clap of thunder in a clear sky. The pirates were ready to be let loose upon our unprotected commerce. We had everything to lose—nothing to gain. Send your armies, in the prosecution of this illegal, unrighteous, and damnable war, to the mountains of Mexico, and disease and the foe will sweep them off in thousands. The passes and mountains of Mexico would become a charnel-house for our people, and their bones would be scattered all over its vast territory before this peace would be conquered.

MR. DOUGLAS said: What reliance shall we place on the sincerity of gentlemen's professions that they are for the country, right or wrong, when they exert all their power and influence to put their country in the wrong in the eyes of Christendom, and invoke the wrath of Heaven upon us for our manifold crimes and aggressions? With professions of patriotism on their lips, do they not show that their hearts are against their own country? They appeal to the consciences and religious feelings of our countrymen to unite in execration of our Government, army, citizen soldiers, and country, for prosecuting what they denounce as an unholy, unrighteous, and damnable cause. They predict that the judgment of God will rest upon us; that sickness, and carnage, and death will be our portion; that defeat and disgrace will attend our arms. Is there not treason in the heart that can feel and poison in the breath that can utter such sentiments against their own country, when forced to take up arms in self-defence, to repel invasion by a brutal and perfidious enemy? They for their country, right or wrong, who tell our people, if they rally under their country's standard, their bones will bleach on the plains of Mexico, and the enemy will look down from the mountain top to behold the destruction of our armies by disease and malarias, and all those mysterious elements of death which Divine Providence employs to punish a wicked people for prosecuting an unholy and unjust war! Sir, I tell these gentlemen that it requires more charity than falls to the lot of frail man to believe that these sentiments are consistent with the sincerity of their professions—with patriotism, honor, and duty to their country. Patriotism emanates from the heart, fills the soul, infuses itself into the whole man, and speaks and acts the same language. A friend of his country in war will feel, speak, and act for his country; will revere his country's cause and hate his country's sachusetts [Mr. Adams], as well as Mr. Polk and the American Congress, were engaged in an unholy, an unrighteous, and damnable cause in claiming title to the Rio del Norte?

362

But, sir, I have already said that I do not deem it necessary to rely upon these old authorities for the full and complete justification of our Government in defending possession of the country on the left bank of the Rio del Norte. There is better and higher evidence than this. The Republic of Texas held the country by a more glorious title than can be traced through the old maps and musty records of Spanish and French courts. She held the country by the same title that our forefathers of the Revolution acquired our territory and achieved the independence of this Republic. She held it by virtue of her Declaration of Independence, setting forth the inalienable rights of man, by men who had hearts to feel and minds to comprehend the blessings of freedom; by principles successfully maintained by the irresistible power of her arms, and consecrated by the precious blood of her glorious heroes. These are her muniments of title to the empire which she has voluntarily annexed to our Union, and which we have pledged our faith to protect and defend against invasion or dismemberment. We have received the Republic of Texas, with her entire territory, into this Union, as an independent and sovereign State, and have no right to alienate or surrender any portion of it.

Immediately after the battle of San Jacinto, Santa Anna made a proposition to the commander of the Texan army to make a treaty of peace, by which Mexico would recognize the independence of Texas, with the Rio del Norte as the boundary. In May, 1836, such a treaty was made between the government of Texas and Santa Anna, in which the independence of the republic of Texas was acknowledged, and the Rio del Norte recognized as the boundary. In pursuance of this treaty, the remnant of the Mexican army were ordered by Santa Anna to retire beyond the confines of the Republic of Texas, and take their position on the west side of the Rio del Norte, which they did in conformity with the treaty of peace.

MR. J. W. HOUSTON.—I wish to ask of the gentleman from Illinois was that treaty ever ratified by the Government of Mexico?

MR. DOUGLAS.—I will answer the gentleman's question with great pleasure. That treaty was never ratified on the part of Mexico by anybody except Santa Anna, for the very good reason that, in the year previous, Santa Anna had usurped the Government of Mexico, had abolished the constitution and the regularly established government, and taken all the powers of government into his own hands. This treaty was entered into by the Government of Mexico de facto, Santa Anna combining in his own person at the time all the powers of the government, and as such was binding on the Mexican nation.

MR. ADAMS.—I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois if Santa Anna was not a prisoner of war at the time, and in duress, when he executed that treaty?

MR. DOUGLAS, in reply.—Santa Anna was a prisoner of war at the time, and so was the entire Government of Mexico, he being the government de facto, and clothed with all the powers of government, civil and military. The government was a prisoner at the time, and in duress. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts contend that a treaty made with us under those circumstances would not be binding, because, forsooth, the government was a prisoner at the time? How is a conquered nation ever to make peace if the gentleman's doctrine is to prevail? They refuse to make peace before they are conquered, because they hope for victory. They are incompetent to do so afterward, because they are in duress! I fear that, if this doctrine shall prevail, these gentlemen will soon find their Mexican friends in a most pitiable condition. Perhaps, if that government should be reduced to captivity, these gentlemen would require that our armies should retire within our own territory, and set the government at liberty, before negotiations for peace could be opened. This may be their view of the subject, but I doubt whether it is the view which the American Government or the American people will deem it their duty to act upon. Our crude notions of things may teach us that the city of Mexico would be the most suitable place to form a treaty of peace.

MR. ADAMS.—Has not that treaty with Santa Anna been discarded by the Mexican Government since?

MR. DOUGLAS.—I presume it has; for I am not aware of any treaty or compact which that government ever entered into that has not either been violated or repudiated by them afterward. It is sufficient for my purpose that the treaty was entered into and sanctioned by the government de facto for the time being. The acts of a government de facto are binding on the nation as against foreign nations, without reference to the mode in which that government was established, whether by revolution, usurpation, or rightful and constitutional means.

MR. LUMPKIN.—The people of this country were, to some extent, divided as to the policy of admitting Texas as a State with Mexico as unauthorized, unjust, and damnable? Will you promote the success of our arms by destroying, if such a thing were possible, the influence of the President? Are you encouraging enlistments for the service of the country by proclaiming to your countrymen that your Government is the aggressor?—that the President has, in violation of the Constitution, without authority of Congress, made an aggressive, unjust, and damnable war against an unoffending sister republic? I beg such gentlemen to pause and reflect before they give utterance to such sentiments in this place at a time like this. Retrace your steps, and withdraw, for a time, these charges, perhaps inconsiderately and too hastily made, and come forward with the same ability you have displayed against the Executive in support of all the measures necessary to the efficient and successful prosecution of the war against Mexico, and, my word for it, the result will be such as to rejoice the patriots of all parties. If these charges are to be investigated, and if gentlemen will insist that they are made in good faith, and that they are prepared to sustain them before the greatest of all human tribunals—the enlightened public opinion of the civilized world—I call upon them, in the name of my countrymen of all parties, to postpone these bickerings and discussions until the rainbow of peace shall again span our country's horizon.

MR. TOOMBS remarked that it was a little remarkable, when the country was represented by the friends of the Administration to be suffering from foreign invasion, and that the blood of American citizens, shed, as was contended, on American soil, was calling aloud for immediate vengeance, instead of responding to those appeals to patriotism which had been made, even this occasion must be consecrated to party, and a preamble placed before the bill to cover the usurpations of the Executive—a preamble declaring what no man could rise in his place and say he knew, that war had been made by Mexico. They could have voted supplies to defend Texas as well without this preamble; but it was too precious an opportunity to be lost to appeal to the people to sanction the wrongs and the usurpations of the Executive. And all those who were unwilling to subscribe to this declaration, the truth of which they could not know, and which he believed to be false, were to be branded as enemies to their country—as destitute of patriotism. If this were patriotism, he hoped there were but few patriots in the country.

The true question was not whether we should vote supplies for our army or protect our citizens in Texas. These questions were extraneous to that which was the subject of discussion, into this Union. This, I admit, was an honest difference of opinion; and the measure was one about which the most patriotic might with propriety at that time disagree. But, sir, the question now assumes another aspect. Texas has been admitted into the Union, the people of both countries have been consulted, and they have solemnly determined to unite their destiny under the broad and ample folds of the American banner. The deed has been consummated and ratified by the action of both governments; and Texas has as much claim upon our protection as any other State in this Confederacy. The boundary of the United States is now extended to the western limit of Texas; her soil is our soil, her people our people; and her resources contribute to our greatness in peace and to our defence in war. We have done all this, and it is now too late to urge objections to the policy of this measure; and at a time like this, when our country has been invaded by hostile troops—when our soldiers have been captured, wounded, and killed in unequal and desperate conflict, and our army is exposed to peril from the overpowering numbers of the enemy, it is treasonable to withhold the supplies necessary for their relief; and no good but much evil must result from a prolonged discussion upon the policy of annexing Texas to the United States, and the propriety or impropriety of the conduct of the President in directing the occupation by the army of the country between the Nueces and the Rio Grande.

It is enough for us to know that our soil has been desecrated; that our country has been invaded; that a hostile band of armed soldiers have killed and wounded our citizens; and that the American army, under General Taylor, is in a hazardous situation and in need of assistance. At a time like this shall we be struggling for a mere party triumph? Can no circumstances or conditions of the country, no perils, however great, induce gentlemen in the opposition to cease their cavilling against the Administration or postpone their hostility to the President? Is not this an occasion when, for a time, all party distinctions and differences shall be forgotten, and, with one voice, with one heart, and with one hand, we all shall march forward in defence of the soil, the rights, and the honor of the country? Does patriotism require at your hands, as the faithful representatives of the people, that you should now, in your elevated position, denounce the President for a violation of the Constitution, by making an unauthorized and unholy invasion on the soil and territory of Mexico? Does your regard for the Constitution of the country require you to denounce this war viz.: the defence of the Executive. It was not a question of dividing the country, but a question, where is the boundary of the country? And it was a fact that should be borne in mind, that, out of fifteen or sixteen propositions for the annexation of Texas, there was but one that did not define its limits; and that one was passed by the House of Representatives and the Senate, and became a law. That left the question of boundary an open question, expressly declaring that "so much of the territory as rightfully belongs to Texas should be annexed to the United States." Congress could not untie the Gordian knot at that time, or define precisely what the boundary was; it was left for the Executive to do this, and Congress was called upon to sanction that act.

He proclaimed in the face of this House and the country that the marching our army to the Rio Grande was contrary to the laws of this country, a usurpation on the rights of this House, and an aggression on the rights of Mexico. Gentlemen were invited to make the most of this declaration.

Early in the second year of the war (1847) it was seen that the march to the city of Mexico to dictate terms of peace in the halls of Montezuma was not going to be the easy, quick, and inexpensive progress that had been prophesied by the Administration party, and a popular reaction occurred against the war. A number of Senators and Representatives found courage enough to vote against further appropriations for what they termed the "conquest" of a sister republic. Among these was Senator Thomas Corwin (Ohio), who, on February 11, 1847, justified his vote by a long and able speech of which the following was the peroration:

AGAINST THE MEXICAN WAR

SENATOR CORWIN

What is the territory, Mr. President, which you propose to wrest from Mexico? It is consecrated to the heart of the Mexican by many a well-fought battle with his old Castilian master. His Bunker Hills, and Saratogas, and Yorktowns are there. The Mexican can say, "There I bled for liberty! and shall I surrender that consecrated home of my affections to the Anglo-Saxon invaders? What do they want with it? They have Texas already. They have possessed themselves of the territory between the Nueces and the Rio Grande. What else do they want? To what shall I point my children as memorials of that independence which I bequeath to them, when those battlefields shall have passed from my possession?"

Sir, had one come and demanded Bunker Hill of the people of Massachusetts, had England's lion ever showed herself there, is there a man over thirteen and under ninety who would not have been ready to meet him—is there a river on this continent that would not have run red with blood—is there a field but would have been piled high with the unburied bones of slaughtered Americans before these consecrated battlefields of liberty should have been wrested from us? But this same American goes into a sister republic, and says to poor, weak Mexico, "Give up your territory—you are unworthy to possess it—I have got one-half already—all I ask of you is to give up the other!" England might as well, in the circumstances I have described, have come and demanded of us, "Give up the Atlantic slope—give up this trifling territory from the Allegheny mountains to the sea; it is only from Maine to St. Mary's—only about one-third of your republic, and the least interesting portion of it." What would be the response? They would say, we must give this up to John Bull. Why? "He wants room." The Senator from Michigan says he must have this. Why, my worthy Christian brother, on what principle of justice? "I want room!"

Sir, look at this pretence of want of room. With twenty millions of people you have about one thousand millions of acres of land inviting settlement by every conceivable argument. But the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] says we will be two hundred millions in a few years, and we want room. If I were a Mexican I would tell you, "Have you not room in your own country to bury your dead men? If you come into mine we will greet you with bloody hands, and welcome you to hospitable graves."

The demand for "room," said Senator Corwin, had been "the plea of every robber-chief from Nimrod to the present hour." The Senator called the roll of the great conquerors, with significant remarks about the fitting retribution which had been meted out to them for their rapacity.

Ammon's son (so was Alexander named), after all his victories, died drunk in Babylon! The vast empire he conquered

Montesquieu did not think highly of this way of "waking up." "Happy," says he, "is that nation whose annals are tiresome."

The Senator from Michigan has a different view of this. He thinks that a nation is not distinguished until it is distinguished in war; he fears that the slumbering faculties of Europe have not been able to ascertain that there are twenty millions of Anglo-Saxons here, making railroads and canals, and speeding all the arts of peace to the utmost accomplishment of the most refined civilization. They do not know it! And what is the wonderful expedient which this democratic method of making history would adopt in order to make us known? Storming cities, desolating peaceful, happy homes, shooting men—ay, sir, such is war—and shooting women, too!

This—this is the way we are to be made known to Europe. This—this is to be the undying renown of free, republican America! "She has stormed a city—killed many of its inhabitants of both sexes—she has room!" So it will read. Sir, if this were our only history, then may God of his mercy grant that its volume may speedily come to a close.

Mr. President, this uneasy desire to augment our territory has depraved the moral sense, and blunted the otherwise keen sagacity of our people. What has been the fate of all nations who have acted upon the idea that they must advance? Our young orators cherish this notion with a fervid, but fatally mistaken zeal. They call it by the mysterious name of "destiny." "Our destiny," they say, is "onward," and hence they argue, with ready sophistry, the propriety of seizing upon any territory and any people that may lie in the way of our "fated" advance.

Rome thought, as you now think, that it was her destiny to conquer provinces and nations, and no doubt she sometimes said as you say, "I will conquer a peace." And where now is she, the Mistress of the World? The spider weaves his web in her palaces, the owl sings his watch-song in her towers. Teutonic power now lords it over the servile remnant, the miserable memento of old and once omnipotent Rome. Sad, very sad, are the lessons which time has written for us. Through and in them all I see nothing but the inflexible execution of that old law, which ordains as eternal that cardinal rule, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's goods, nor anything which is his."

Since I have lately heard so much about the dismemberment of Mexico, I have looked back to see how, in the course of events, which some call "Providence," it has fared with other nations who engaged in this work of dismemberment. I see that in the

to "get room" became the prey of the generals he had trained; it was disparted, torn to pieces, and so ended.

I was somewhat amazed, the other day, to hear the Senator

THE LAND OF LIBERTY
Cartoon by Richard Doyle in "Punch," 1847

from Michigan [Lewis Cass] declare that Europe had quite forgotten us till these battles waked them up. I suppose the Senator feels grateful to the President for "waking up" Europe. Does the President, who is, I hope, read in civic as well as military lore, remember the saying of one who had pondered upon history long—long, too, upon man, his nature and true destiny?

latter half of the eighteenth century three powerful nations, Russia, Austria, and Prussia, united in the dismemberment of Poland. They said, too, as you say, "it is our destiny." They "wanted room." Doubtless each of these thought, with his share of Poland, his power was too strong ever to fear invasion or even insult. One had his California, another his New Mexico, and the third his Vera Cruz. Did they remain untouched and incapable of harm? Alas! No—far, very far, from it. Retributive justice must fulfill its destiny, too. A very few years pass off, and we hear of a new man, a Corsican lieutenant, the self-named "armed soldier of Democracy," Napoleon. He ravages Austria, covers her land with blood, drives the Northern Cæsar from his capital, and sleeps in his palace. Austria may now remember how her power trampled upon Poland. Did she not pay dear, very dear, for her California?

But has Prussia no atonement to make? You see this same Napoleon, the blind instrument of Providence, at work there. The thunders of his cannon at Jena proclaim the work of retribution for Poland's wrongs; and the successors of the Great Frederick, the drill-sergeant of Europe, are seen flying across the sandy plain that surrounds their capital, right glad if they may escape captivity or death. But how fares it with the Autocrat of Russia? Is he secure in his share of the spoils of Poland? No. Suddenly we see, sir, six hundred thousand armed men marching to Moscow. Does his Vera Cruz protect him now? Far from it. Blood, slaughter, desolation spread abroad over the land, and finally the conflagration of the old commercial metropolis of Russia closes the retribution she must pay for her share in the dismemberment of her weak and impotent neighbor. Mr. President, a mind more prone to look for the judgments of Heaven in the doings of men than mine cannot fail in this to see the providence of God. When Moscow burned it seemed as if the earth was lighted up, that the nations might behold the scene. As that mighty sea of fire gathered and heaved and rolled upward, and yet higher, till its flames licked the stars, and fired the whole heavens, it did seem as though the God of the nations was writing in characters of flame on the front of his throne that doom that shall fall upon the strong nation which tramples in scorn upon the weak.

And what fortune awaits him, the appointed executor of this work, when it was all done? He, too, conceived the notion that his destiny pointed onward to universal dominion. France was too small—Europe, he thought, should bow down before him. But as soon as this idea took possession of his soul he, too, becomes powerless. Right there, while he witnessed the humiliation, and doubtless meditated the subjugation of Russia, He who holds the winds in his fist gathered the snows of the north and blew them upon his six hundred thousand men; they fled—they froze—they perished. And now the mighty Napoleon, who had resolved on universal dominion, he, too, is summoned to answer for the violation of that ancient law, "thou shalt not covet anything which is thy neighbor's." How is the mighty fallen? He, beneath whose proud footstep Europe trembled, he is now an exile at Elba, and now finally a prisoner on the rock of St. Helena, and there, on a barren island, in an unfrequented sea, in the crater of an extinguished volcano, there is the death-bed of the mighty conqueror. All his annexations have come to that! His last hour is now come, and he, the man of destiny, he who had rocked the world as with the throes of an earthquake, is now powerless, still—even as a beggar, so he died. On the wings of a tempest that raged with unwonted fury, up to the throne of the only Power that controlled him while he lived, went the fiery soul of that wonderful warrior, another witness to the existence of that eternal decree, that they who do not rule in righteousness shall perish from the earth. He has found "room" at last.

And France, she, too, has found "room." Her "eagles" now no longer scream along the banks of the Danube, the Po, and the Borysthene. They have returned home to their old eyrie, between the Alps, the Rhine, and the Pyrenees; so shall it be with yours. They may carry them to the loftiest peaks of the Cordilleras, they may wave with insolent triumph in the Halls of the Montezumas, the armed men of Mexico may quail before them, but the weakest hand in Mexico, uplifted in prayer to the God of Justice, may call down against you a Power, in the presence of which the iron hearts of your warriors shall be turned into ashes.

One hundred millions of dollars will be wasted in this fruitless war. Had this money of the people been expended in making a railroad from your northern lakes to the Pacific, as one of your citizens has begged of you in vain, you would have made a highway for the world between Asia and Europe. Your Capitol then would be within thirty or forty days' travel of any and every point on the map of the civilized world. Through this great artery of trade you would have carried through the heart of your own country the teas of China, and the spices of India, to the markets of England and France. Why, why, Mr. President, did we abandon the enterprises of peace and betake path, I may add the only way of duty, of prudence, of true patriotism. Let us abandon all idea of acquiring further territory, and by consequence cease at once to prosecute this war. Let us call home our armies, and bring them at once within our own acknowledged limits. Show Mexico that you are sincere when you say you desire nothing by conquest. She has learned that she cannot encounter you in war, and if she had not she is too weak to disturb you here. Tender her peace, and, my life on it, she will then accept it. But whether she shall or not, you will have peace without her consent. It is your invasion that has made war, your retreat will restore peace. Let us then close forever the approaches of internal feud, and so return to the ancient concord and the old way of national prosperity and permanent glory. Let us here, in this temple consecrated to the Union, perform a solemn lustration; let us wash Mexican blood from our hands, and on these altars, in the presence of that image of the Father of his country that looks down upon us, swear to preserve honorable peace with all the world, and eternal brotherhood with each other.

Other statesmen began to exonerate themselves from having been parties to the conflict, and to charge each other with this responsibility. The most notable of these recriminations occurred in the Senate on February 24 when Thomas H. Benton (Missouri) charged John C. Calhoun (South Carolina) with being the author of the war while acting as Secretary of State under President Tyler,¹ and Senator Calhoun replied acknowledging responsibility for the annexation of Texas, and any defensive measures which that act involved, but throwing upon President Polk and his supporters, among whom Senator Benton might, for certain acts, be numbered, all the blame for involving the country in a war of invasion, thus putting the Government in the wrong, and presenting the United States before the world in the evil light of an aggressor.

LINCOLN'S "SPOT RESOLUTIONS"

On December 22, 1847, Abraham Lincoln (Illinois) introduced in the House his famous "Spot Resolutions," calling on the President for information:

ourselves to the barbarous achievements of war? Why did we "forsake this fair and fertile field to batten on that moor"?!

There is one topic connected with this subject which I tremble when I approach, and yet I cannot forbear to notice it. It meets you in every step you take. It threatens you which way soever you go in the prosecution of this war. I allude to the question of slavery. Opposition to its further extension, it must be obvious to every one, is a deeply rooted determination with men of all parties in what we call the non-slaveholding States. It is vain now to speculate about the reasons for this. Gentlemen of the South may call it prejudice, passion, hypocrisy, fanaticism. I shall not dispute with them now on that point. The great fact that it is so, and not otherwise, is what it concerns us to know. You nor I cannot alter or change this opinion if we would. These people only say we will not, cannot, consent that you shall carry slavery where it does not already exist. They do not seek to disturb you in that institution, as it exists in your States. Enjoy it if you will, and as you will. This is their language, this their determination.

How is it in the South? Can it be expected that they should expend in common their blood and their treasure in the acquisition of immense territory, and then willingly forego the right to carry thither their slaves, and inhabit the conquered country if they please to do so? Sir, I know the feelings and opinions of the South too well to calculate on this.

If, then, we persist in war, which if it terminate in anything short of a mere wanton waste of blood as well as money, must end (as this bill proposes) in the acquisition of territory, to which at once this controversy must attach—this bill would seem to be nothing less than a bill to produce internal commotion. Should we prosecute this war another moment, or expend one dollar in the purchase or conquest of a single acre of Mexican land, the North and the South are brought into collision on a point where neither will yield.

Oh, Mr. President, it does seem to me, if hell itself could yawn and vomit up the fiends that inhabit its penal abodes, commissioned to disturb the harmony of this world, and dash the fairest prospect of happiness that ever allured the hopes of men, the first step in the consummation of this diabolical purpose would be to light up the fires of internal war and plunge the sister States of this Union into the bottomless gulf of civil strife. We stand this day on the crumbling brink of that gulf—we see its bloody eddies wheeling and boiling before us—shall we not pause before it be too late! How plain again is here the

First. Whether the spot on which the blood of our citizens was shed, as in his message declared, was or was not within the territory of Spain, at least after the treaty of 1819 until the Mexican revolution.

Second. Whether that spot is or is not within the territory which was wrested from Spain by the revolutionary government of Mexico.

Third. Whether that spot is or is not within a settlement of people, which settlement has existed ever since long before the Texas revolution, and until its inhabitants fled before the approach of the United States army.

Fourth. Whether that settlement is or is not isolated from any and all other settlements by the Gulf and the Rio Grande on the south and west, and by wide uninhabited regions on the north and east.

Fifth. Whether the people of that settlement, or a majority of them, or any of them, have ever submitted themselves to the government or laws of Texas or of the United States, by consent or by compulsion, either by accepting office, or voting at elections, or paying tax, or serving on juries, or having process served upon them, or in any other way.

Sixth. Whether the people of that settlement did or did not flee from the approach of the United States army, leaving unprotected their homes and their growing crops, before the blood was shed, as in the message stated; and whether the first blood, so shed, was or was not shed within the inclosure of one of the people who had thus fled from it.

Seventh. Whether our citizens, whose blood was shed, as in his message declared, were or were not, at that time, armed officers and soldiers, sent into that settlement by the military order of the President, through the Secretary of War.

Eighth. Whether the military force of the United States was or was not so sent into that settlement after General Taylor had more than once intimated to the War Department that, in his opinion, no such movement was necessary to the defence or protection of Texas.¹

On January 12, 1848, Mr. Lincoln spoke upon his resolutions. His conclusion was as follows:

¹These resolutions Mr. Lincoln took great pride in at the time, considering them a political coup de main, if not, indeed, a coup d'état, but they proved to be a coup de grace to his immediate political aspirations. His opponents ridiculed them as "spot" resolutions, with such effect that Lincoln's constituents turned against him; he did not seek a renomination, and a Democrat was elected to succeed him.—Henry C. Whitney, "Life of Lincoln," vol. I, page 154.

ARRAIGNMENT OF PRESIDENT POLK

ABRAHAM LINCOLN, M. C.

If the President can show that the soil was ours where the first blood of the war was shed then I am with him for his justification. But if he cannot or will not do this then I shall be fully convinced of what I more than suspect already—that he is deeply conscious of being in the wrong; that he feels the blood of this war, like the blood of Abel, is crying to Heaven against him; that originally having some strong motive—what, I will not stop now to give my opinion concerning—to involve the two countries in a war, and trusting to escape scrutiny by fixing the public gaze upon the exceeding brightness of military glory—that attractive rainbow that rises in showers of blood—that serpent's eye that charms to destroy—he plunged into it, and has swept on and on till, disappointed in his calculation of the ease with which Mexico might be subdued, he now finds himself he knows not where. How like the half-insane mumbling of a fever dream is the whole war part of his late message! At one time telling us that Mexico has nothing whatever that we can get but territory; at another showing us how we can support the war by levying contributions on Mexico. At one time urging the national honor, the security of the future, the prevention of foreign interference, and even the good of Mexico herself as among the objects of the war; at another telling us that “to reject indemnity, by refusing to accept a cession of territory, would be to abandon all our just demands, and to wage the war, bearing all its expenses, without a purpose or definite object.” So, then, this national honor, security of the future, and everything but territorial indemnity may be considered the no-purposes and indefinite objects of the war!

As to the mode of terminating the war and securing peace the President is equally wandering and indefinite. First, it is to be done by a more vigorous prosecution of the war in the vital parts of the enemy's country; and, after apparently talking himself tired on this point, the President drops down into a half-despairing tone, and tells us that “with a people distracted and divided by contending factions, and a government subject to constant changes by successive revolutions, the continued success of our arms may fail to secure a satisfactory peace.” Then he suggests the propriety of wheedling the Mexican people to desert the counsels of their own leaders, and, trusting in our protestations, to set up a government from which we can secure a satisfactory peace; telling us that “this may become the only mode of obtaining such a peace.” But soon he falls into doubt of this, too; and then drops back onto the already half-abandoned ground of “more vigorous prosecution.” All this shows that the President is in nowise satisfied with his own positions. First he takes up one, and in attempting to argue us into it he argues himself out of it, then seizes another and goes through the same process, and then, confused at being able to think of nothing new, he snatches up the old one again, which he has some time before cast off. His mind, taxed beyond its power, is running hither and thither, like some tortured creature on a burning surface, finding no position on which it can settle down to be at ease.

Again, it is a singular omission in this message that it nowhere intimates when the President expects the war to terminate. At its beginning, General Scott was by this same President driven into disfavor, if not disgrace, for intimating that peace could not be conquered in less than three or four months. But now, at the end of about twenty months, during which time our arms have given us the most splendid successes, every department and every part, land and water, officers and privates, regulars and volunteers, doing all that men could do, and hundreds of things which it had ever before been thought men could not do—after all this, this same President gives a long message, without showing us that as to the end he himself has even an imaginary conception. As I have before said, he knows not where he is. He is a bewildered, confounded, and miserably perplexed man. God grant he may be able to show there is not something about his conscience more painful than all his mental perplexity.

On February 2, 1848, a treaty of peace known from the place where it was made as the “Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo,” was signed by Mexico and the United States, and on July 4 was proclaimed to be in force. The American negotiator was Nicholas P. Trist of Virginia. By the terms of this treaty the Rio Grande was established as the boundary of the eastern portion of the cession, and in the west the Rivers Gila and Colorado were so followed as to give the United States all the territory then known as New Mexico and Upper California. The United States agreed to pay Mexico $15,000,000, and to assume the payment of all claims

THE TRENT AFFAIR

Captain Charles Wilkes, U. S. N., of the San Jacinto, Takes John Slidell and James M. Mason, Confederate Commissioners, to Great Britain, from British steamer Trent—Act Is Approved by Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy—Negotiations with British Government—William H. Seward, Secretary of State, Delivers Up the Commissioners to Great Britain—Debate in the Senate on This Act: in Favor, Charles Sumner [Mass.]; Opposed, John P. Hale [N. H.].

IN the Civil War the chief hope of the Southern Confederacy lay in securing foreign intervention. In the beginning of the conflict it sent as commissioners to Great Britain ex-United States Senators James M. Mason (Virginia) and John Slidell (Louisiana). On October 12, 1861, they sailed with their families on the blockade-runner Theodora from Charleston to Havana, and there took the British mail steamer Trent sailing for England via St. Thomas, a Danish island in the West Indies. On November 8 Captain Charles Wilkes of the United States war frigate San Jacinto compelled the Trent, which had not yet arrived at St. Thomas, to stop; entering the British steamer he took the commissioners on board of his own vessel and carried them to Fort Warren in Boston harbor, where they were held as prisoners of war.

This act was approved by Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy. In his report to Congress on December 2, he said:

The prompt and decisive action of Captain Wilkes on this occasion merited and received the emphatic approval of the department; and if a too generous forbearance was exhibited by him in not capturing the vessel which had these Rebel enemies on board, it may, in view of the special circumstances, and of its patriotic motives, be excused; but it must by no means be permitted to constitute a precedent hereafter, for the treatment of any case of similar infraction of neutral obligations by foreign vessels engaged in commerce or the carrying trade.

However Lincoln's logical instincts engendered in his mind the opinion that Wilkes' action was technically unauthorized and would be seized upon by England as a pretext to involve the nation in a war. He therefore conferred with the Hon. Thomas Ewing [O.], a retired statesman of the preceding generation, who assured him that Captain Wilkes had been wrong by the law of nations. Accordingly, on November 30 a dispatch was sent to our minister recounting the facts, disavowing any complicity in Captain Wilkes' act, and expressing a desire to treat with England on the subject. On the same day the British minister for foreign affairs sent a note to Lord Lyons, the British minister at Washington, expressing the desire of the British Cabinet that our nation would disavow any authority in the affair, would yield up the prisoners, and make an apology; all of which were impressed with the force and authority of an ultimatum.

Long after the war it transpired (in the publication of the letters of Lord Palmerston, Prime Minister of Great Britain at the time of the Trent affair) that the legal advisers of the British Crown on November 11, 1861, two weeks before the seizure of the Confederate commissioners was known in England, had delivered an opinion by which an act such as that of Captain Wilkes was justified. This opinion was based on the uniform practice of Great Britain herself as upheld by no less an authority on maritime law than Sir William Scott, Lord Stowell. It was given in reference to an American war vessel (other than the San Jacinto) which was actually in an English port at the time, as to whether she had the right, by international law, to stop and search the West India packet then expected soon to arrive in England.

One of these letters of Lord Palmerston was to the editor of the London Times. It said:

THE TRENT AFFAIR

to denounce the surrender of the Confederate commissioners. Said Senator Hale:

To my mind a more fatal act could not mark the history of this country—an act that would surrender at once to the arbitrary demand of Great Britain all that was won in the Revolution, reduce us to the position of a second-rate power, and make us the vassal of Great Britain. I would go as far as any reasonable man would go for peace, but no further. I would not be unwilling to submit this subject to the arbitration of any of the great powers of Europe; but I would not submit to the arbitrary, the absolute demand of Great Britain, to surrender these men, and humble our flag even to escape from a war with Great Britain. No man would make more honorable concessions than I would to preserve the peace; but sometimes peace is less honorable and more calamitous than war. The Administration which is now in power ought to know what the feeling of the country is. If my friend from Indiana [Henry S. Lane] will permit me, I will repeat what he said to me this morning at the breakfast table. [Mr. Lane assented.] The honorable Senator said the State of Indiana has now sixty thousand men in the field, and she would double that number in sixty days if a war with Great Britain should be brought about. I have seen many gentlemen, and I have seen none, not a man can be found, who is in favor of this surrender; for it would humiliate us in the eyes of the world, irritate our own people, and subject us to their indignant scorn. If we are to have war with Great Britain it will not be because we refuse to surrender Messrs. Mason and Slidell; that is a mere pretence. If war shall come it will be because Great Britain has determined to force war upon us. They would humiliate us first and fight us afterward. If we are to be humiliated, I prefer to take it after a war, and not before. It is true, war would be a sacrifice to the people. I think I see its horrors, its disasters, its carnage, its blood, and its desolation; but, sir, let war come; let your cities be battered down, your armies be scattered, your fields barren, to preserve untarnished the national honor; a regenerating spirit among your people will restore your armies, and rebuild your cities, and make fruitful your fields. Francis the First of France, at the battle of Pavia, his army overthrown and scattered and himself a prisoner, exclaimed, "All is lost but honor!" That honor preserved then was the germ of the greatness and the glory of France to-day. I pray that this Administration will not surrender our national honor. I tell them that hundreds and thousands and hundreds of thousands will rush to the battlefield,

It appeared that according to the principles of international law laid down in our courts by Lord Stowell and practiced and enforced by us, a belligerent has a right to stop and search any neutral not being a ship of war and being found on the high seas and being suspected of carrying enemy's dispatches; and that consequently this American cruiser might by our own principles of international law stop the West India packet, search her, and if the Southern men and their dispatches and credentials were found on board either take them out or seize the packet and carry her back to New York for trial.

Two days later Lord Palmerston wrote to the Queen to the same effect.

However, it seemed good to the British Administration directly to reverse their policy in this matter. By acceding to this reversal the United States Government thereby secured the British acknowledgment of its contention, adhered to through war and peace from the beginning of the nation, that the "right of search" was in contravention of the true principles of international law. Secretary Seward therefore seized the opportunity thus afforded him, and on December 26 handed Lord Lyons a dispatch in which he waived the question of Captain Wilkes' right to do as he did, and, ingeniously taking advantage of the officer's infraction of the prize law (in not bringing the prisoners into a prize court for adjudication), he ordered their discharge. The Confederate commissioners were given over to the custody of a British vessel by which they were transported to London. There they made no political impression and remained abroad until they died, expatriated.

THE TRENT AFFAIR

SENATE, DECEMBER 26, 1861-JANUARY 20, 1862

Discussion of the Trent affair came up in the next Congress on December 26, upon a resolution of Senator John P. Hale (New Hampshire) asking the President to transmit to the Senate the correspondence with Great Britain regarding it, which motion, after speaking thereon, he withdrew, indicating that he wished merely and bare their breasts to its perils rather than submit to degradation.

If this Administration will not listen to the voice of the people they will find themselves engulfed in a fire that will consume them like stubble; they will be helpless before a power that will hurl them from their places. If war comes we shall not, Mr. President, be entirely without consolation and encouragement. If war shall be forced upon us, as some gentlemen suppose, we shall be fighting in a great cause—the cause of constitutional liberty, whose baptism centuries ago was in the blood which flowed in England from the scaffold, and which animates millions to-day on the face of the earth, even of Englishmen, whatever may be the policy of their administration. If this war is determined upon in England it will be because it is out of the hands of statesmen and in those of pettifoggers, who are called the law officers of the Crown, who, it seems, can rush us into war. If we are, sir, to preserve peace it must be with honor. But if we are to have war—I do not say that we shall—it will not be without its advantages. It will be a war that cannot be carried on without fighting; and if we only understand our true position we can proclaim to every man who speaks the English language on God's footstool the cause for which we are fighting; and this appeal will reach the hearts of millions of Englishmen, Irishmen, and Frenchmen.

We have heard, Mr. President, some fears expressed that Louis Napoleon is taking sides with England, and that we are to contend with the combined energies of both France and England. I do not believe it. I believe if Louis Napoleon harbors one single sentiment, if his action is guided by one single principle, if he has one single feeling that is predominant over all others, it is to have a fair field to retrieve the disastrous issue of Waterloo. And, besides, sir, all over this country, throughout Canada, and in Ireland, there are hundreds and thousands and hundreds of thousands of true-hearted Irishmen who have long prayed for an opportunity to retaliate upon England for the wrongs which for centuries that government has inflicted upon their fatherland. If we know our own position and our own strength—I refer to the strength of principle—there will be nothing to be afraid of in this contest. If war must come, let it come; but I tell you, and I do not pretend to be a prophet, I think the slightest sagacity in public councils will sustain me in the position that if England enters upon this war she will enter upon one of more than doubtful contingency. She will be at war with the spirit of the age, with the irresistible genius of liberty, and with the sympathies of her own best people; she will war with a cause that is dear to the hearts of patriots the world over; she will war with a cause upon which we may invoke with confidence the blessings of the God of Liberty, who will not fail in His own good time and in His own way to vindicate His own cause.

I again say, if this war must come, let it come; and let us thank God that He has made us the chosen instrument in His hand to vindicate His own cause. I withdraw my motion.

Senator Charles Sumner (Massachusetts) replied, renewing the motion in order to speak upon it. He begged the Senate not to judge the Administration on insufficient evidence.

I have myself a firm conviction that this question will be peaceably and honorably adjusted. I do not believe that it is a question to be settled by war; and I hail with gratitude the suggestion of the honorable Senator, that, in making his speech, which may, in a certain sense, be called a war speech, he has expressed a willingness to submit the question to arbitration. Let me not be understood as intimating that that mode is under consideration. I am not authorized to say anything on the question. I content myself with repeating what I have already said, that it is in safe hands, and that it will be better for us to reserve ourselves for the question when it shall be presented in a practical form, and not to speak on hypotheses which the facts may afterward show to have been false. I withdraw the motion.

The President voluntarily transmitted the correspondence on January 6, 1862. Senator Sumner thereupon moved its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and announced that he would speak later on the subject. He contented himself with saying:

There is, Mr. President, an important question of international law discussed in the papers, interesting not only to our own country, but to all foreign countries. As a precedent it will be of great value. If Great Britain has been well sustained in her recent course it is only because she has turned her back upon the practice and precedents of her history, and adopted for the moment the practice and the precedents of American history.

to advance, and which other European nations have accepted with regard to the sea. Indeed, Great Britain cannot complain except by now adopting those identical principles; and, should we undertake to vindicate the act, it can be done only by repudiating those identical principles. Our two cases will be reversed. In the struggle between Laertes and Hamlet the two combatants exchanged rapiers; so that Hamlet was armed with the rapier of Laertes and Laertes was armed with the rapier of Hamlet. And now on this sensitive question a similar exchange has occurred. Great Britain is armed with American principles, while to us are left only those British principles which, throughout our history, have been constantly, deliberately, and solemnly rejected.

An English writer put the case for his government as follows:

"It is not to the right of search that we object, but to the following seizure without process of law. What we deny is the right of a naval officer to stand in place of a prize court and adjudicate, sword in hand, with a sic volo sic jubeo on the very deck which is a part of our territory."

Thus it appears that the present complaint of the British Government is not founded on the assumption by the American war steamer of the belligerent right of search; nor on the ground that this right was exercised on board a neutral vessel between two neutral ports nor that it was exercised on board a mail steamer, sustained by a subvention from the Crown, and offered in part from the royal navy; nor that it was exercised in a case where the penalties of contraband could not attach; but it is founded simply and precisely on the idea that persons other than apparent officers in the military or naval service cannot be taken out of a neutral ship at the mere will of the officer who exercises the right of search, and without any form of trial. Therefore, the law of nations has been violated, and the conduct of Captain Wilkes must be disavowed, while men who are traitors, conspirators, and rebels, all in one, are allowed to go free.

Surely that criminals, though dyed in guilt, should go free is better than that the law of nations should be violated, especially in any rule by which war is restricted and the mood of peace is enlarged; for the law of nations cannot be violated without overturning the protection of the innocent as well as the guilty. On this general principle there can be no question. It is but an illustration of that important maxim, recorded in the Latin of Fortescue, "Better that many guilty should escape

¹ "So I will, so I order."

On January 20 Senator Sumner made the promised speech.

Mr. President, every principle of international law, when justly and authoritatively settled, becomes a safeguard of peace and a landmark of civilization. It constitutes a part of that code which is the supreme law, above all municipal laws, binding the whole commonwealth of nations. Such a settlement may be by a general congress of nations, or it may be through the general accord of treaties; or it may be by a precedent established under such conspicuous circumstances, with all nations as assenting witnesses, that it shall at once become in itself a commanding rule of international conduct. Especially is this the case if disturbing pretensions long maintained to the detriment of civilization are practically renounced by the power which has maintained them. Without any congress or treaties such a precedent has been established.

Here the Senator recounted the facts in the case.

While on their way, the ambassadors were arrested by Captain Wilkes, of the United States steamer San Jacinto, an accomplished officer, already well known by his scientific explorations, who, on this occasion, acted without instructions from his Government. If, in this arrest, he forgot for a moment the fixed policy of the Republic, which has been from the beginning like a frontlet between the eyes, and transcended the law of nations, as the United States have always declared it, his apology must be found in the patriotic impulse by which he was inspired, and the British examples which he could not forget. They were the enemies of his country, embodying in themselves the triple essence of worst enmity—treason, conspiracy, and rebellion; and they wore a pretended ambassadorial character which, as he supposed, according to high British authority, rendered them liable to be stopped.

If this transaction be regarded exclusively in the light of British precedents; if we follow the seeming authority of the British admiralty, speaking by its greatest voice; and especially if we accept the oft-repeated example of British cruisers, upheld by the British Government against the oft-repeated protests of the United States, we shall not find it difficult to vindicate it. The act becomes questionable only when brought to the touchstone of these liberal principles which, from the earliest times, the American Government has openly avowed and sought than one innocent man should suffer," with this difference, that in the present case a few guilty escape, while the innocent everywhere on the sea obtain new security. And this security becomes more valuable as a triumph of civilization, when it is considered that it was long refused, even at the cannon's mouth.

Do not forget, sir, that the question involved in this controversy is strictly a question of law—precisely like a question of trespass between two neighbors. The British cabinet began proceedings by taking the opinion of their law advisers, precisely as an individual begins proceedings in a suit at law by taking the opinion of his attorney. To make such a question a case of war, or to suggest that war is a proper mode of deciding it, is simply to revive, in colossal proportions, the exploded ordeal by battle, and to imitate those dark ages when such proceeding was openly declared to be the best and most honorable mode of deciding even an abstract point of law.

In similar spirit has it been latterly proposed, amid the amazement of the civilized world, to withdraw the point of law, now raised by Great Britain, from peaceful adjudication and submit it to trial by combat. But the irrational anachronism of such a proposition becomes more flagrant from the inconsistency of the party which makes it; for it cannot be forgotten that, in times past, on this identical point of law, Great Britain persistently held an opposite ground from that which she now takes.

A question of international law should not be presented on any mere argumentum ad hominem. It would be of little value to show that Captain Wilkes was sustained by British authority and practice, if he were condemned by international law as interpreted by his own country. It belongs to us now, nay, let it be our pride, at any cost of individual prepossessions or transitory prejudices, to uphold that law in all its force, as it was often declared by the best men in our history, and illustrated by national acts; and let us seize the present occasion to consecrate its positive and unequivocal recognition. In exchange for the prisoners set free we receive from Great Britain a practical assent, too long deferred, to a principle early propounded by our country, and standing forth on every page of our history. The same voice which asks for their liberation renounces in the same breath an odious pretension, for whole generations the scourge of peaceful commerce.

In municipal questions Great Britain drew inspiration from her own native common law, which was instinct with freedom; but in maritime questions arising under the law of nations this power seems to have acted on that obnoxious principle of the Roman law, positively discarded in municipal questions, Quod principi placuit legis vigorem habet,¹ and too often, under this inspiration, to have imposed upon weaker nations her own arbitrary will. The time has been when she pretended to sovereignty over the seas surrounding the British isles, as far as Cape Finisterre to the south, and Vanstaten in Norway to the north. But, driven from this pretension, other pretensions, less local but hardly less offensive, were avowed. The boast of "Rule, Britannia, rule the waves," was practically adopted by British courts of admiralty, and universal maritime rights were subjected to the special exigencies of British interests. In the consciousness of strength, and with a navy that could not be opposed, this power has put chains upon the sea.

The commerce of the United States, as it began to whiten the ocean, was cruelly decimated by these arbitrary pretensions. But the loss of property stung less than the outrage of impressment, by which foreigners, under the protection of the American flag, and also American citizens, without any form of trial, and at the mere mandate of a navy officer, who for the moment acted as a judicial tribunal, were dragged away from the deck which should have been to them a sacred altar. This outrage, which was feebly vindicated by the municipal claim of Great Britain to the services of her own subjects, was enforced arrogantly and perpetually on the high seas, where municipal law is silent and international law alone prevails. The belligerent right of search, derived from international law, was employed for this purpose, and the quarter-deck of every British cruiser was made a floating judgment-seat. The practice began early, and was continued constantly; nor did it discriminate among its victims. It is mentioned by Mr. Jefferson, and repeated by a British writer on international law, that two nephews of Washington, on their way home from Europe, were ravished from the protection of the American flag, without any judicial proceedings, and placed as common seamen under the ordinary discipline of British ships of war. The victims were counted by thousands. At our Department of State six thousand cases were recorded, and it was estimated that at least as many more might have occurred, of which no information had been received. If a pretension so intrinsically lawless could be sanctioned by precedent, Great Britain would have succeeded in interpolating it into the law of nations.

Protest, argument, negotiation, correspondence, and war debates, extending over at least two generations, we have been wrong.

But it has been sometimes said the steam packet having on board the rebel emissaries was on this account liable to capture, and therefore the error of Captain Wilkes in taking the emissaries was simply an error of form and not of substance. I do not stop to consider whether an exercise of summary power against which our Government has so constantly protested can be under any circumstances an error merely of form, for the policy of our Government, most positively declared in its diplomacy, and also attested in numerous treaties, leaves no room to doubt that a neutral ship with belligerent passengers—not in the military or naval service—is not liable to capture, and therefore the whole proceeding was wrong, not only because the passengers were taken from the ship, but also because the ship, howsoever guilty morally, was not guilty legally in receiving such passengers on board. If this question were argued on English authorities it might be otherwise; but according to American principles the ship was legally innocent.

Here the speaker cited numerous treaties.

But still another question occurs. Beyond all doubt there were "dispatches" from the rebel belligerents on board the ship—such "dispatches" as rebels can write. Public report, the statement of persons on board the ship, and the boastful declaration of Jefferson Davis in a public document that these emissaries were proceeding under an appointment from him—which appointment would be a "dispatch" of the highest character—seem to place this fact beyond denial. Assuming this fact, the ship was liable to capture and to be carried off for adjudication, according to British authorities—unless the positive judgment of Sir William Scott in the case of the Atalanta (6 Robinson R., p. 440), and also the Queen's proclamation at the commencement of this rebellion, where "dispatches" are enumerated among contraband articles, are treated as nullities, or so far modified in their application as to be words, and nothing more. But, however binding and peremptory these authorities may be in Great Britain, they cannot be accepted to reverse the standing policy of the United States, which here again leaves no room for doubt. In order to give precision to the rights which it claimed and at the same time accorded on the ocean, our Government has sought to explain in treaties what it meant by contraband. As early as 1778, in the treaty with France, itself—unhappily the last reason of republics as of kings—were all employed in vain by the United States to procure a renunciation of this intolerable pretension. The ablest papers in our diplomatic history are devoted to this purpose; and the only serious war in which we have been engaged, until summoned to encounter this rebellion, was to overcome by arms this very pretension which would not yield to reason. Beginning in the last century, the correspondence is at last closed by the recent reply of Mr. Seward to Lord Lyons. The long-continued occasion of conflict is now happily removed, and the pretension disappears forever—to take its place among the curiosities of the past.

But I do not content myself with asserting the persistent opposition of the American Government. It belongs to the argument, that I should exhibit this opposition and the precise ground on which it was placed—being identical with that now adopted by Great Britain. And here the testimony is complete. If you will kindly follow me, you shall see it from the beginning in the public life of our country, and in the authentic records of our Government.

Here the speaker quoted extensively from opinions of various American Secretaries of State: Thomas Jefferson, Timothy Pickens, John Marshall, James Madison, Daniel Webster, and Lewis Cass, and of Presidents John Adams, James Monroe, and John Quincy Adams. He also quoted an expression of the British doctrine made by the Prince Regent (afterwards George IV) on January 9, 1813, in refusing an armistice which had been proposed by President Madison on condition that Great Britain abandon her practice of searching American vessels and impressing seamen thereon on the ground of their being British subjects:

"His Royal Highness can never admit that, in the exercise of the UNDOUBTED and hitherto undisputed right of searching neutral merchant vessels in time of war, the impressment of British seamen, when found therein, can be deemed any violation of a neutral flag. Neither can he admit that the taking of such seamen from on board such vessels can be considered by any neutral state as a hostile measure or a justifiable cause of war."

The war was closed by the treaty at Ghent; but perversely the British pretension was not renounced.

Such is an authentic history of this British pretension, and of the manner in which it has been met by our Government. If Captain Wilkes is right, then throughout all these international negotiated by Benjamin Franklin, after specifying contraband articles, without including dispatches, it is declared that

390

"Free goods are all other merchandise and things which are not comprehended and particularly mentioned in the foregoing enumeration of contraband goods."—Statutes at Large, Vol. 8, p. 26.

This was before the judgment of Sir William Scott, recognizing dispatches as contraband; but in other treaties subsequent to this judgment, and therefore practically discarding it, after enumerating contraband articles, without specifying "dispatches," the same provision is introduced.

Clearly, then, according to American principles and practice, the ship was not liable to capture on account of dispatches on board.

But there is yet another question which remains. Assuming that dispatches may be contraband, would their presence on board a neutral ship, sailing between two neutral ports, render the voyage illegal? The mail steamer was sailing between Havana, a port of Spain, and St. Thomas, a port of Denmark. Here, again, if we bow to British precedent, the answer will be prompt. The British oracle has spoken. In a well-considered judgment, Sir William Scott declares that dispatches taken on board a neutral ship, sailing from a neutral country and bound for another neutral country, are contraband; but that, where there was reason to believe the master ignorant of their character, "it is not a case in which the property is to be confiscated, although in this, as in every other instance in which the enemy's dispatches are found on board a vessel, he has justly subjected himself to all the inconveniences of seizure and detention, and to all the expenses of those judicial inquiries which they have occasioned." (The Rapid, Edwards's Rep., 221.) Such is the law of nations according to Great Britain.

But even if this rule had not been positively repudiated by the United States it is so inconsistent with reason, and, in the present condition of maritime commerce, so utterly impracticable, that it can find little favor. If a neutral voyage between two neutral ports is rendered illegal on this account, then the postal facilities of the world, and the costly enterprises by which they are conducted, will be exposed to interruptions under which they must at times be crushed, to the infinite damage of universal commerce. If the rule is applicable in one sea it is applicable in all seas, and there is no part of the ocean which may not be vexed by its enforcement. It would reach to the Mediterranean and to the distant China seas as easily as to the Bahama Straits, and it would be equally imperative in the chops of the British channel. Not only the stately mail steamers which traverse the ocean would be liable to detention and possible confiscation, but the same penalties must attach to the daily packets between Dover and Calais. The simple statement of such a consequence, following directly from the British rule, throws an instant doubt over it which the eloquent judgment of Lord Stowell cannot remove.

And now, as I conclude what I have to say on contraband in its several divisions, I venture to assert that there are two rules in regard to it, which the traditional policy of our country has constantly declared, and which it has embodied in treaty stipulations with every power which could be persuaded to adopt them: First, that no article shall be contraband unless it be expressly enumerated and specified as such by name. Secondly, that when such articles, so enumerated and specified, shall be found by the belligerent on board a neutral ship, the neutral shall be permitted to deliver them to the belligerent whenever, by reason of their bulk in quantity, such delivery may be possible, and then the neutral shall, without further molestation, proceed with all remaining innocent cargo to his destination, being any port, neutral or hostile, which at the time is not actually blockaded.

Such was the early fixed policy of our country with regard to contraband in neutral bottoms. It is recorded in several of our earlier European treaties. Approximation to it will be found in other European treaties, showing our constant effort in this direction. But this policy was not supported by the British theory and practice of international law, which was especially active during the wars of the French Revolution; and to this fact may, perhaps, be ascribed something of the difficulty which our Government encountered in its efforts to secure for this liberal policy the complete sanction of European states. But in our negotiations with the Spanish-American states the theory and practice of Great Britain were less felt; and so to-day that liberal policy, embracing the two rules already stated touching contraband, is among all American States the public law of contraband, stipulated and fixed in solemn treaties.

Of course this whole discussion proceeds on the assumption that the rebels are to be regarded as belligerents, which is the character already accorded to them by Great Britain. If they are not regarded as belligerents, then the proceeding of Captain Wilkes is indubitably illegal and void. To a political offender, however deep his guilt—though burdened with the undying it the most offensive pretension that ever stalked upon its waves. To such conclusion Great Britain is irrevocably pledged. Nor treaty nor bond was needed. It is sufficient that her late appeal can be vindicated only by a renunciation of early, long-continued tyranny. Let her bear the rebels back. The consideration is ample; for the sea became free as this altered power went forth upon it, steering westward with the sun, on an errand of liberation.

In this surrender, if such it may be called, our Government does not even "stoop to conquer." It simply lifts itself to the height of its own original principles. The early efforts of its best negotiators—the patriot trials of its soldiers in an unequal war—have at length prevailed, and Great Britain, usually so haughty, invites us to practice upon those principles which she has so strenuously opposed. There are victories of force. Here is a victory of truth. If Great Britain has gained the custody of two rebels, the United States have secured the triumph of their principles.

If this result be in conformity with our cherished principles it will be superfluous to add other considerations; and yet I venture to suggest that estranged sympathies abroad may be secured again by an open adhesion to those principles, which already have the support of the Continental governments of Europe, smarting for years under British pretensions. The powerful organs of public opinion on the Continent are also with us. Hautefeuille, whose work on the Law of Nations is the arsenal of neutral rights, has entered into this debate with a direct proposition for the release of these emissaries as a testimony to the true interpretation of international law. And a journal, which of itself is an authority, the Revue des Deux Mondes, hopes that the United States will let the rebels go, simply because "it would be a triumph of the rights of neutrals to apply them for the advantage of a nation which has ever opposed and violated them."

But this triumph is not enough. The sea-god will in future use his trident less; but the same principles which led to the present renunciation of early pretensions naturally conduct to yet further emancipation of the sea. The work of maritime civilization is not finished. And here the two nations, equally endowed by commerce, and matching each other, while they surpass all other nations, in peaceful ships, may gloriously unite in setting up new pillars, which shall mark new triumphs, rendering the ocean a highway of peace, instead of a field of blood.

The congress of Paris, in 1856, where were assembled the execrations of all honest men, and bending beneath the consciousness of the ruin which he has brought upon his country—the asylum of a foreign jurisdiction is sacred, whether on shore or on sea; and it is among the proudest boasts of England, at least in recent days, that the exiles of defeated democracies as well as of defeated dynasties have found a sure protection beneath her meteor flag. And yet this power has not always accorded to other flags what she claimed for her own. One of the objections diplomatically presented by Great Britain at the beginning of the present century to any renunciation of the pretension of impressment was "that facility would be given, particularly in the British Channel, by the immunity claimed by American vessels, to the escape of traitors" (State Papers, Vol. 3, p. 86), thus assuming that traitors—the companions of Robert Emmett, in Ireland, or the companions of Horne Took, in England—ought to be arrested on board a neutral ship; but that the arrest could be accomplished only through the pretension of impressment. But this flagrant instance cannot be a precedent for the United States, which has always maintained the right of asylum as firmly as it has rejected the pretension of impressment.

If I am correct in this review then the conclusion is inevitable. The seizure of the rebel emissaries on board a neutral ship cannot be justified according to our best American precedents and practice. There seems to be no single point where the seizure is not questionable, unless we choose to invoke British precedents and practice, which beyond doubt led Captain Wilkes into the mistake which he committed.

Mr. President, let the rebels go. Two wicked men, ungrateful to their country, are let loose with the brand of Cain upon their foreheads. Prison doors are opened; but principles are established which will help to free other men, and to open the gates of the sea. Never before in her active history has Great Britain ranged herself on this side. Such an event is an epoch. *Novus sæclorum nascitur ordo.*¹ To the liberties of the sea this power is now committed. To a certain extent this cause is now under her tutelary care. If the immunities of passengers, not in the military or naval service, as well as of sailors, are not directly recognized, they are at least implied; while the whole pretension of impressment, so long the pest of neutral commerce, and operating only through the lawless adjudication of a quarter-deck, is made absolutely impossible. Thus is the freedom of the seas enlarged, not only by limiting the number of persons who are exposed to the penalties of war, but by driving from "A new order of the ages is born."

plenipotentiaries of Great Britain, France, Austria, Prussia, Russia, Sardinia, and Turkey, has already led the way. Adopting the early policy of the United States, often proposed to foreign nations, this congress has authenticated two important changes in restraint of belligerent rights; first, that the neutral flag shall protect enemy's goods except contraband of war, and secondly, that neutral goods, except contraband of war, are not liable to capture under an enemy's flag. This is much. Another proposition, that privateering should be abolished, was defective in two respects: first, because it left nations free to employ private ships under a public commission as ships of the navy, and, therefore, was nugatory; and, secondly, because, if not nugatory, it was too obviously in the special interest of Great Britain, which, through her commanding navy, would thus be left at will to rule the sea. No change can be practicable which is not equal in its advantages to all nations; for the Equality of Nations is not merely a dry dogma of international law, but a vital national sentiment common to all nations. This cannot be forgotten; and every proposition must be brought sincerely to this equitable test.

But there is a way in which privateering can be effectively abolished without any shock to the Equality of Nations. A simple proposition, that private property shall enjoy the same immunity on the ocean which it now enjoys on land, will at once abolish privateering, and relieve the commerce of the ocean from its greatest perils, so that, like commerce on land, it shall be undisturbed except by illegal robbery and theft. Such a proposition will operate equally for the advantage of all nations. On this account, and in the policy of peace, which our Government has always cultivated, it has been already presented to foreign governments by the United States. You have not forgotten the important paper in which Mr. Marcy did this service, or the recent efforts of Mr. Seward in the same direction. In order to complete the efficacy of this proposition, and still further to banish belligerent pretensions, contraband of war should be abolished, so that all ships may freely navigate the ocean without being exposed to any question as to the character of persons or things on board. The Right of Search, which, on the occurrence of war, becomes an omnipresent tyranny, subjecting every neutral ship to the arbitrary invasion of every belligerent cruiser, would then disappear. It would drop, as the chains drop from an emancipated slave; or, rather, it would only exist as an occasional agent, under solemn treaties, in the war waged by civilization against the slave trade; and then it would be proudly recognized as an honorable surrender to the best interests of humanity, glorifying the flag which made it.

With the consummation of these reforms in maritime law, not forgetting blockades under international law, war would be despoiled of its most vexatious prerogatives, while innocent neutrals would be exempt from its torments. The statutes of the sea, thus refined and elevated, will be the agents of peace instead of the agents of war. Ships and cargoes will pass unchallenged from shore to shore; and those terrible belligerent rights, under which the commerce of the world has so long suffered, will cease from troubling. In this work our country began early. It had hardly proclaimed its own independence before it sought to secure a similar independence for the sea. It had hardly made a Constitution for its own Government before it sought to establish a constitution similar in spirit for the government of the sea. If it did not prevail at once, it was because it could not overcome the unyielding opposition of Great Britain. And now the time is come when this champion of belligerent rights "has changed his hand and checked his pride." Welcome to this new alliance. Meanwhile, amid all present excitements, amid all present trials, it only remains for us to uphold the constant policy of the Republic, and to stand fast on the ancient ways.

CHAPTER XIV

THE PURCHASE OF ALASKA

William H. Seward, Secretary of State, Negotiates Treaty with Russia for the Purchase of Alaska—Senate Confirms Treaty, and United States Enters into Possession—Debate in the House on Appropriating $7,200,000 for the Purchase: in Favor, General Nathaniel P. Banks [Mass.], Rufus P. Spalding [O.], General Robert C. Schenck [O.], Thaddeus Stevens [Pa.], Leonard Myers [Pa.], William Higby [Cal.]; Opposed, Cadwalader C. Washburn [Wis.], Benjamin F. Butler [Mass.], John A. Peters [Me.], Samuel Shellabarger [O.], Hiram Price [Ia.], Dennis McCarthy [N. Y.]—Bill Is Passed with Preamble Implying That Consent of the House Is Essential to a Treaty; Senate Rejects Bill on This Account; Compromise Preamble Is Adopted Which Is a Virtual Victory for the House, and Bill Is Passed by the Senate and Approved by President Johnson.

ON March 30, 1867, William H. Seward, Secretary of State in President Johnson's administration, formed a treaty with Russia (absolute in its terms, not referring to the ratification of the Senate and the appropriation by Congress of the purchase price), whereby the United States purchased Alaska (then known as Russian America) for $7,200,000 in gold (equivalent to more than $10,000,000 in "greenbacks"). The ratification of the Senate was readily granted, there being but two dissenting votes, but there was much opposition in the House to making the required appropriation. Indeed it was not attempted to do this until more than a year after the treaty had been made. With a view to forcing Congress to make the appropriation the astute Secretary of State, immediately after the treaty, took formal possession of the country in the name of the United States.

On May 18, 1868, General Nathaniel P. Banks (Massachusetts) introduced in the House a bill making the necessary appropriation to effect the treaty. It came before the House for discussion on June 30.

PURCHASE OF ALASKA

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JUNE 30-JULY 14, 1868

General Banks held that, a treaty being the "supreme law of the land," it was the duty of Congress to give effect to that law by such legislation as was necessary to carry it into effect. He gave a review of the origin of the treaty.

It was suggested by those inquisitive, energetic, enterprising, and powerful men who have made this continent what it is; by men who went from my own section—Massachusetts and Maine—when the trumpet sounded for emigration to California, and who, with a still more adventurous spirit than that which sent them to California, were led to the more northern territory, which was then thought to be a bleak and barren wilderness. They looked upon the broad Pacific Ocean, the innumerable islands and bays that skirt and cluster upon and crown the northern Pacific, and they saw, from their experience in New England and in the British provinces, what they believed to be the germ of an inappreciable wealth and power for themselves and their country. They applied to the Russian Government for the privilege to share in what they might do to increase the prosperity of that country. The Russian Government refused it. Russia had ceded to the citizens of the United States by the convention of 1824 the right of fishery in those waters near the shore and other privileges connected with it. Russia believed that the privileges of that convention had been abused by American citizens; and when, at the end of ten years, the privileges expired by limitation, she declined to renew them, and thus deprived American citizens of the liberty of fishing in those waters.

Russia had always been liberal and friendly toward this Government. The Administration, perceiving the necessity and importance of this privilege, applied for a renewal of the treaty. But, upon a full discussion of that question and with a statement of her interests which we could not resist, she declined to accord it, and we were thus without any other right than that of pursuing our course upon the Pacific as upon the Indian or the other oceans of the globe. The enterprising citizens to whom I have referred, regarding with an experienced eye the importance of this privilege to our citizens on the Pacific coast, endeavored to persuade the Government to obtain for them the privileges which had been lost. The Russian Government declined as before, but it conceded what was better than the right of the extension of fishery; it conceded to this Government the right of purchase, and the territory to which the fisheries were incident was purchased for $7,200,000.

The territory that has been transferred to us by the treaty of 1867 is substantially contiguous territory to the United States. I speak of its contiguity, not as being entirely without interruption, but as contiguous to territory long claimed and unwisely surrendered by us, and as a part of the continent which we could not allow to pass into the hands of any other people on the face of the earth. It is necessary for the defence of this country, for the preservation of its institutions and its power. It cannot in the nature of things remain with perfect certainty, and possibly not for a long time, in the possession of Russia. It is likely to be conceded and transferred to some other power, and it is indispensable to us that in such an event it should in the nature of things be transferred to the United States. It is five hundred and seventy-four thousand square miles in extent, three hundred and ninety-four thousand miles on land and one hundred and twenty-six thousand on the sea, making in land and water jurisdiction between five and six hundred thousand square miles. It commands a most important portion of this continent which we cannot afford to leave to the control of other nations. The peninsula of Alaska, from the central part, extends into Behring's sea. It is continued by a succession of islands—one hundred or more—which carries the jurisdiction of the United States into Behring's sea within five or six hundred miles of the Asiatic coast, and thus offers to the American people a territorial connection and a political jurisdiction which bring us to such a point that the citizens of this country can pass in an open boat, not being at any one time more than two days at sea, from the American coast on the Pacific to the Asiatic countries on the same ocean.

It is said that this territory is worthless, that we do not want it, that the Government had no right to buy it. These are objections that have been urged at every step in the progress of this country from the day when the forefathers from England landed in Virginia or in Massachusetts up to this hour. Whenever and wherever we have extended our possessions we have encountered these identical objections—the country is worthless, we do not want it—the Government has no right to buy it.

Here the speaker reviewed the objections urged against the acquisition of Louisiana, Texas, and California.

It was said at a later day in the Senate that the valley of the Columbia river was useless to us, costing more every year for its government than its entire value. "We are going to war," it was said, "for the navigation of an unnavigable river."

Upon representations like these we surrendered British Columbia to Great Britain. Mr. John Quincy Adams said in this House that she had no title to it whatever. We acquired it by the treaty of Ghent, then unsettled our title by joint occupation, and finally gave it up altogether upon the pretext now urged in regard to Russian America, that it was worth nothing, costing more than its value every year to govern it.

It is but a few years since the whole world regarded the country between the hundredth meridian of longitude and the Oregon cascade as barren and worthless. It was compared by the officers of the Government in 1863 to the Asiatic deserts. This country is now organized into prosperous States and Territories, and in 1870 will contain more than six hundred thousand people; and one of the States of this region has given us in five years an industrial product of more than fifty million dollars.

The Hudson Bay Company's possessions in British America were constantly described in the House of Commons as "sterile, ice-bound, unfit for the support of human beings." It is now called "the fertile belt," which, through the medium of colonization and a Pacific railway, is to bind together the British American colonies, and preserve to the mother country her waning power on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. During the present month it was declared in the House of Commons that "The British possessions on the Pacific united to the colonies east of the Rocky Mountains would make the finest dominion in the world."

Now, sir, I propose for a few moments to consider what advantages Alaska possesses for the United States. Is it worthless? Do we need it? Has the Government the right to buy it? And, first, I speak of its geographical, commercial, and political importance. No man who looks upon the political condition of Europe can fail to see that it is quite possible it may be thrown at a day not distant into the vortex of a terrible war. There are to be great changes in the future; and it is certain that Russia will be among the first and the greatest of the powers of that future, whatever it may be. Whoever is engaged against her will strike for the conquest of this territory on the Pacific rendered it to England with the agreement that Vancouver should belong to her, but that the island of San Juan, between Vancouver and the continent, should be a part of the American possessions. The language of the treaty was that the boundary should be the strait which "separates Vancouver from the continent." But since that time England has interpreted the treaty to mean a strait which "separates the continent from Vancouver's Island," thus establishing a boundary which gives her the island of San Juan as well as that of Vancouver.

Thus the British Government extends her claims—and if the philosophy for which gentlemen now contend here is allowed to prevail she is likely to be successful not only in obtaining possession of San Juan, but of adjacent territory, upon the general plea that it is worthless, that we do not want it, that it will cost more to govern it every year than it is worth, and that the Government has no right to maintain possession of worthless territory held by disputed or doubtful titles. We agreed to a joint occupation of this island with England a few years ago, and having accomplished a joint occupation she is likely to get undisputed and permanent possession without any consideration whatever if the philosophy now urged upon us is allowed to prevail.

Transatlantic communication between England and the Pacific coast was proposed by Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton when at the head of the colonial offices thirty years ago, as necessary to preserve that coast to Great Britain. And, sir, within this month, on the 9th of June, there occurred in the House of Commons an elaborate discussion of this subject. Lord Milton, who has, perhaps, written the best work on the British colonial policy on this continent, declared that "the time had arrived when it was necessary for the English Government to consider whether it wished to keep the Pacific colonies in their present state of loyalty; and that if anything was to be done to establish a through communication from the Atlantic to the Pacific they must look to the Pacific colonies rather than to the Atlantic; for the British Pacific colonies," he said, "derived even their food from the United States. There was every year a great influx of Americans into the colonies, and there was a growing desire on the part of the colonists to join the United States."

And this is while Alaska is in the possession and under the control of the Russian Government, the Russian American Fur Company, and the Hudson Bay Company, and before it has gained any strength from its transfer to the American Government. Napoleon, at the siege of Toulon, pointed out the place which did belong to her, and which will still belong to her if we refuse to execute the treaty for its purchase. This is not mere supposition. During the Crimean war the French and English squadrons in the Chinese sea secretly departed in 1853 for the purpose of taking possession of the Russian possessions in America. The Russian admiral, Putzujelm, illy prepared as he was for their attack, encountered them successfully and they were defeated.

The British Colonist, published in Vancouver, speaking in view of these events and on this subject, declared in 1853 that the Russian possessions must be English possessions. The Canadians at the same time echoed the same sentiment. Mr. Roebuck said in the House of Commons ten years ago that it was "the destiny of England to establish British colonies in India, Africa, and the whole of North America." And it is at least probable, if not certain, that if in the war in which we were recently engaged there had been a failure of our Government promptly to maintain its power and position, Russian America might in the end have gone to England, Mexico to France, and the Pacific coast would have been divided between them.

Now, sir, what is this territory? It begins at the parallel of 54° 40', running north to the seventy-second parallel north latitude. The territory has about the same extent in width. The southern portion, commencing at latitude 54° 40', the northern boundary of British Columbia, is the first feature of importance. It is a strip about three hundred miles in length and thirty miles wide, fronting upon British Columbia, and excluding it to this extent from the ocean. Governor Simpson said in reference to this strip of Russian America, which had been leased by the Hudson Bay Company from the Russian Government, that without it the British possessions on the Pacific would be comparatively worthless. It was leased upon that view by the Russian Government out of regard for the English interest on that coast. This reduces the ocean frontage of the English on the Pacific coast to the possession of Vancouver's Island, and a small strip of coast further north, which, however, without Vancouver's Island, would be of comparatively little or no value to them.

In the controversy upon the Oregon question it was the wish of a portion of our people, regarding it as a possession of small importance, to surrender altogether that territory; and in the final settlement, to use the language of Mr. Adams, the Government gave up six degrees of latitude to England without any consideration whatever, and with it Vancouver's Island, which was as clearly ours as any territory we ever possessed. We sur-to the members of the constituent assembly, and he said to them, "there is Toulon." When we speak of Alaska in view of such declarations in the House of Commons as those I have quoted in regard to the loyalty of the British colonies on the Pacific, we may very well point the House to the territory between the forty-ninth and fifty-fourth parallels north, and say "there is Alaska!" The silent and irresistible influence of the American people will control the Pacific coast from the southern limit of California to Point Barrow on the Arctic Ocean.

A colony thrust in upon us on the Pacific by an arrangement unjust to this country, affecting its society and never satisfactory to its people, and which cannot long exist, a colony which is restrained from coming to us by the active intervention of the parent government, and is maintained upon considerations of foreign interest waiting for a moment when hostile demonstrations may be within its power, such a colony has not a natural existence, and can claim of us no consideration or support. It is not within the rule of international comity to insist upon maintaining and perpetuating its power by exterior aid where it has no self-supporting capacity, which alone gives governments a just claim to the respect of the nations of the world.

Well, sir, let me speak now of the advance of our power upon this continent, and what is likely to be its effect. The government of the world changes once or twice every century, and the theater of human history is transferred to different parts of the globe in the course of one or two centuries. A change of this character is now dawning upon us. Hitherto the Atlantic ocean has been the theater of its power and its triumphs. The control of the world hitherto has been in European hands, because Europe was the sovereign of this great sea. So long as the Atlantic ocean controls the destinies of men, so long the destiny and the idea of that control will be European, and so long as it is European it will stand in the way of the progress of civilization and bar the movements of the people to the acquisition or the resumption of the power that by the laws of nature belongs to them. How can it be changed? By intervention, by war? No, sir. The providence of God arranges other means for the control of the great families of men than such methods of violence. The changes in the theater of operation point out new fields, new pastures, green and beautiful, to which the children of creation may go. They come from the Atlantic, and they take their position upon what is called the great ocean of the world—the Pacific Ocean. That, with the Indian Ocean, which is part of the Pacific, so spoken of by geographers, covers
